Sean MacBride's Address to the National Press Club

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it was a distinct honor for me to attend the luncheon given by the National Press Club in honor of Sean MacBride, Minister of External Affairs for Ireland. The speech by Mr. MacBride was interesting, direct, and to the point and was extremely well received by the Cabinet members, the newspapermen, and the Members of the House and Senate in attendance.

In this particular week, preceding the celebration of St. Patrick's Day, Sean MacBride has undertaken a difficult schedule. Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Washington will be visited by him and in all these cities, he will be at home because he will be among friends.

Ireland is to be complimented for having such an outstanding leader in these troublous times and America is grateful that, out of his busy life, he has found time to visit us and to discuss problems of mutual interest.

To Sean MacBride, we wish the greatest possible success in his efforts to solve his country's problems. We want to assure him that Ireland holds a particularly warm spot in the hearts of Americans and that we look upon him as a true exponent of the ideals which have made Ireland great down through the centuries.

ADDRESS BY SEAN MACBRIDE, MINISTER OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OF THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND, AT THE NATIONAL PRESS CLUB LUNCHEON, WASHINGTON, D. C., MARCH 14, 1951

The honor you have done me in asking me to be your guest here is one which gives me a very special pleasure. I have been a newspaperman myself, and I have come here today simply as a colleague who happens to be Foreign Minister of a small nation which has very strong and ancient ties with America to tell you something of how that nation stands today.

I am told that Irish names are not unknown in American journalism, and, if so, there must be among you many whose parents and grandparents came from Ireland. The land they left was vastly different from the Ireland we know today. The Ireland of the last century was, in the material sense, one of the poorest countries in Western Europe. Her population was in process of being halved by the results of a famine on a scale that had been unknown in Western Europe since the Middle Ages. Today Ireland is on the road to economic progress and development. Our wealth is reasonably well divided; we have no very great extremes of rich and poor. The rural slums, the ramshackle cabins are nearly a thing of the past, and although there are slums still in certain of our cities we shall, unless a general war or acute shortages wreck our plans with those of the rest of the world, get rid of these within about 10 years. Our population, which had been falling steadily, although at a decreasing rate, since the famine of the last century is now taking an upward turn. Work is progressing on a $120,000,000 land-development scheme, and on drainage, rural electrification, and hospital-building schemes of a similar scale. The number employed in industry, though still small, is rising steadily.

I don't know if any of you, Americans with your history which has been no less prosperous than glorious, can appreciate what that means to an Irishman. It means that a nation which was nearly killed, whose life had almost ebbed away in the course of a long and agonizing struggle, is at last on the turn. The efforts of many Irishmen have gone to make this change, and, not least, those Irishmen who worked and fought to secure for us the independence without which a nation cannot work out its own salvation. Since a measure of independence was obtained, successive governments have played their parts—that of Mr. Cosgrave, that of Mr. De Valera, and now Mr. Costello's government, of which I am a member. None of these governments has been infallible, but under all of them the work has gone ahead and is still going on. While the Ireland of today is no utopia, one finds that atmosphere of hope and confidence which is lacking in many other countries today.

Much of the progress made in the last couple of years is attributable to the Marshall plan, and in particular to the really constructive and helpful cooperation which we received from the ECA. The direct financial aid which we received was valuable but far more important in any view was the economic planning which we had to undertake in conjunction with the ECA. I have always held the view that in the long run the most permanent benefits that will accrue to Europe from the Marshall plan will be technical assistance and the system of economic analysis and cooperation resulting from a policy answered by ECA. I would like to avail of this opportunity of paying a public tribute to the far-sighted and constructive approach initiated by the ECA in Europe under the leadership of men like Paul Hoffman, Averell Harriman, and Bill Foster.

It is often suggested or implied by critics that Ireland is so preoccupied with her own affairs that she cares nothing for what goes on around her. I think it would be hard to put forward a suggestion that was more wholly misleading. It is not a question of whether the Irish people want to be internationally minded or not; they cannot help being internationally minded for they are an international people. An ordinary Kerry family may well have two uncles and an aunt in New Jersey, Chicago, and Springfield, Mass., a cousin in Montreal and another in Melbourne, and probably a son or daughter in England or Scotland as well. With most of these they regularly correspond, and I think that if some of our older people in, say Galway, were asked to draw a map of the world they might, if they were not careful, show New York as being nearer than Dublin.

The people of Irish origin, scattered throughout the world and now playing their parts as citizens of other countries, still retain many of the characteristics of the people of the mother country. They are, for the most part, whether they be Catholic, Protestant, or Jewish, religious folk, and they constitute a moral force and go to reinforce the stabilizing elements in the countries in which they are. They are a virile and active force within the community of free nations, the very sort of people, tainted neither with communism nor reaction, of which the west stands most in need. While they remain fondly attached to Ireland and look to Ireland for moral leadership they certainly do not look to Ireland for political leadership. They are loyal Americans, Australians, and Canadians, or citizens of the country in which they have settled. At home our wish is to play our part with them, as well as with the ancient European nations to whose sisterhood Ireland belongs, in the building and preserving of a just and free society.

What part is Ireland, in fact, playing in international affairs? I think that question is best answered by reference to the four international organizations with which we might be directly concerned: the United Nations, the Council of Europe, the OEEC, and the North Atlantic Treaty organization.

As regards the United Nations, the position is that we applied for membership several years ago, being willing to undertake the full responsibilities of such membership. We were, however, kept out by the veto of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—Russia. Ironical as it may sound, Russia says that she cannot regard us as a democratic or peace-loving country.

As regards the Council of Europe and the OEEC, we are members of both these organizations. In both of them our representatives have consistently adopted the progressive policy of favoring developments which tended toward a united Europe. In the OEEC we have favored greater liberalization ple—How Prepared?" is simple. We certainly are not adequately prepared. The fact is that if world war III is close upon us we are not prepared in any important phase of the activities in which it is necessary to be prepared if we are to meet Russia on anything like equal terms.

The great danger of our dilemma is that if we do face world war III we dare not be unprepared because our failure may be fatal.

In ordinary living when we face life or death decisions we do not take chances. Surely in the life of a whole nation we dare not be less cautious. This is all the more true because a decision for or against world war III does not rest with the United States; it rests solely with the evil men in the Kremlin. They need appeal to no legislative body; they have no Congress to consult; they can decide in the twinkling of an eye without public discussion or approval or responsibility whether it will be peace or war. That being so, it is clear that the decision that Russia takes may be life or death for the United States, if we are unprepared. As a Nation, we dare not run that risk.

We can only be safe if we are prepared for the worst. Therefore we must be fully prepared; prepared physically, mentally, morally and spiritually. We must be so strong that Russia dare not risk the danger of war with us because of the fear of our power of annihilatory retaliation.

America was aroused to the necessity of military preparation by the sudden and unprovoked outbreak of war in Korea. But strangely enough, the longer that war lasts, the more our fears seem to subside; and this despite the fact that every analysis of the situation shows that the longer the Korean War lasts the more conclusively it proves that Russia is willing to risk world war III rather than reach a peaceful end to the war in Korea.

Surely we must soon all realize that America cannot carry on war in Korea or anywhere else, or undertake a vast preparation program, and at the same time carry on business as usual, politics as usual and ordinary pleasures as usual. The fact that we are taking the situation in Korea so casually proves beyond doubt that as a nation we have temporarily lost contact with the hopes and the fear and the aspirations of our boys in the battle line and with the threat they are there to meet. Certainly the boys who are fighting and dying for us half-way around the world have a different appraisal of how serious it is.

For one, I firmly believe that right now we do face the risk of all-out war. Consequently, the American people are confronted by the greatest crisis in our history. This being true, we are merely fooling around by our preparations to date. What we have done is unequal to the challenge because that challenge is the challenge of survival.

Certainly we must now realize that the Communists are united. They have a common purpose and a common determination. Their intention is to destroy every nation which opposes them. In the final analysis the supreme objective of today's communism is the destruction of the United States of America and everything it stands for, because we alone block the way to world domination by communism.

Our people must understand both the threat and the problem if as a nation we are to be as serious as we must be if we are to face this challenge of survival.

If Russia desides to bring on world war III, such a war will require the maximum of everything that we are and everything that we have. All the industrial, military and economic power of our people must be energized to the very maximum if we are to win through when this real test comes upon us.

Therefore, first of all, if we are to be adequately prepared we must reach a decision upon what we face. Not whether we face a war—because we are right now engaged in a war in Korea where we have already lost 50,000 men but whether we face an all-out war with Russia. That is the supremely important problem to every American.

We in America must understand both the threat and the problem. Clearly, if America is to exercise the leadership of the free people of today's world—and that leadership is ours whether we want it or not—we can only exercise it effectively by uniting the free people outside America, and to do that we must be united inside America. Division at home can only result in division abroad. Consequently, it is clear that the foreign policy of the United States must be on a bipartisan basis. If politics are to determine important matters of foreign policy, that policy cannot conceivably be successful.

A bipartisan foreign policy cannot be determined by one person or one party. It is just as important for the Democratic administration to realize that fact as it is for the Republican Party.

I also feel that at this critical hour it is a tremendous disservice to arouse distrust of our military leaders. Because the conduct of the military strategy of world war III, if it is coming up, or prevention of world war III, if it can be prevented, must in the final analysis be determined by our military leaders. If we are to have no confidence in them, if we are to treat military problems on any other than a military basis, we will not only render a great disservice to the military but we will make it impossible to prepare our people properly for the ordeal that confronts us.

Any mistrust the American people have in the foreign policy of the United States, and any impartial observer must know that many do, can only be changed and fears allayed by a fully accredited bipartisan foreign policy. And it cannot be done in any other way.

In the final analysis, the President should take the Congress more fully into the details of his confidence. When there is time for consultation there should be consultation. There is time now for the national administration to do more than it has done in the way of creating good will and confidence in the Congress. Proper procedures will render an immense service, at this critical juncture, in uniting the American people and creating thereby not only firmer support for our military leaders but also renewed confidence in our leadership of the free people everywhere.

These facts being true, and I am sure they are, it is clear that in the most essential part of our preparation, we are not ready.

The generation to which we belong has already fought the two bloodiest wars in history. In our generation more people have been killed; there has been more hatred, more bigotry, more transplanting of people out of the places where they were born to other places where they were strangers; there have been more changes of national boundary lines, more revolution of ideas, more changes of attitude with respect to world problems than in any generation in history. This is the character of the time in which we live. It is a time when it is the part of wisdom to be prepared for the worst possible contingencies.

The American people want peace. But it isn't a question of what we want. We live in a time when it is a question of what challenges we face. We have already suffered tremendous losses in Korea. We will suffer still more. As a Nation we will groan under the highest taxes we have known. We must pull in our belts and arouse ourselves to the real seriousness of the implications of the facts of the time in which we live. We will be unprepared at the critical time of our lives as a people unless we prepare ourselves now for a period of sparse and bitter living. And as of now we are not so prepared.

We want peace. Every sensible person wants peace. We must have peace because war may destroy victor and vanquished alike.

But the best hope for peace for America is a thorough preparation for war. The dictators start war only against the unprepared. The peril that faces the world today is due to the dismemberment of the armed forces of the free nations when Russia kept her armed power moving toward an increasing maximum. The hope for peace can be sustained only by a preparation that will convince aggressor nations that we are too strong to be attacked. Only if we make ourselves strong enough to discourage the Russians from attack will we avoid world war III. A strong America with strong allies in Western Europe is the one sure guaranty for world peace.

Finally we must remember there is the chance that the Russian threat may continue not for a year or 2 years, or 5 or 10, it may continue for a generation. Therefore it is imperative that we keep our Government in a sound condition financially. That means that we must cut out all fat from the budget. There must be no budgetary set-up except for the very necessities of decent living in addition to our military preparation. We must decide now the full scope of what is necessary to be done to be ready to meet this crisis. Then with no politics, with no log rolling, with no back scratching, and with a bipartisan foreign policy we must unite the American people for a united free world in order to stand united against the greatest threat to modern civilization.

As of now we are not prepared. The question for every American to answer is, What do you intend to do about it?

Medicine in Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN O. PASTORE
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two more articles in the series entitled "Medicine in Crisis," by Mr. Selig Greenberg, writer for the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, published in the city of Providence, R. I.

These articles will be most interesting to the Members of the Senate in their consideration of S. 337, which is a bill to provide an emergency program of grants and scholarships for education in the medical fields.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Providence Journal of March 3, 1951]

MEDICINE IN CRISIS—CURBS ON MEDICAL TRAINING ARE LAID TO RESTRICTIONISM—ALTHOUGH AMA DENIES DEVICE OF SETTING EDUCATION STANDARDS TO HOLD DOWN GRADUATES, RESPONSIBLE OBSERVERS BELIEVE MOTIVE NOT DISINTERESTED

(This is the sixth of a series of articles on the problems of medical education within of trade, and we are in a position to do so since our own trade policies are among the most liberal in Europe. In the Council of Europe we have supported every measure which tended to strengthen the Assembly as against the Committee of Ministers, that is to say, every measure which represented a step on the road to a Parliament of Europe. This was the attitude which was taken up by a country which has been represented as stubbornly or narrowly nationalistic. In fact no nation has been so prompt as we have been to support the uniting of Europe and the free and voluntary merging of individual sovereignties. We are, however, quite as stubbornly nationalistic as the United States would be when it is suggested that we should surrender our rights or a portion of our sovereignty to another nation.

As regards the last organization, that of the Atlantic Pact powers, the position is this: We were asked to join and we refused. You will want to know why.

I think on this vitally important question I cannot do better than take as my point of departure the cardinal principles of your own foreign policy, as set out in an admirable document, Our Foreign Policy, issued by your State Department.

These are the three points:

"We are an independent nation and we want to keep our independence."

"We attach the highest importance to individual freedom and we mean to keep our freedom."

"We are a peaceful people and we want to get rid of wars and the threat of wars."

We, in Ireland, would subscribe wholeheartedly to every one of these principles but, being historically less fortunate than you, we are forced to state them for ourselves in a somewhat different manner. This is how we have to state them:

"We are not an independent nation because a portion of it is still unfree but we want to achieve our independence.

"We attach the highest importance to individual freedom but many of our people have not got that freedom.

"We are a peaceful people but part of our territory has been taken from us by war and the threat of war."

These points which, as you will surmise, refer to the fact that part of our country, the six northeastern counties, is held under British rule, may seem exaggerated to you. They do not seem exaggerated to us or to the people, the majority in the greater part of the British held territory, who want to be with us. I do not bring this problem before you because I expect that you, with the vast problems which you must debate every day, can concern yourselves with the intricacies of the methods by which this small territory, in defiance of geography, is held as part of Britain. I am not going to discuss, nor, I am sure, do you want to hear of the finesses of boundary drawing. Discrimination, gerrymandering, and political police by which the entity known as Northern Ireland was set up and is maintained, but I do want you to know that that partition is the cause of such feeling in Ireland that no Irish Government could attempt, without immediately being driven from office, to enter into a military alliance with the power which is responsible for it. This is not one of those ancient grievances which we are supposed to hug to our bosoms. It is quite modern and very real and very present. It would be as impossible for an Irish Government to accept the article of the Atlantic Pact which binds each participant to respect the territorial integrity of the others as it would have been for Abraham Lincoln to accept the Mason and Dixon's line as an international frontier. You do not accept the territorial integrity of a neighbor who is encamped in your garden. We are, I need hardly say, fully conscious of the gravity of our decision. Indeed in our reply to the invitation to join the pact we suggested that, in the interests of the greater safety and strength of the chain of Atlantic defense, the members might discuss ways and means of solving the problem which precluded us from membership. Unfortunately, this suggestion was not acted on.

I wish to make it clear that there is no question of bargaining on this matter. It would be unworthy, both of the great issue involved—the future of the Atlantic community—and of the historic tradition of the Irish Nation, were we to attempt to bargain on this. We are seeking our full freedom and independence as of right and we intend to get it.

The position then, in short, is that Ireland is willing and anxious to play her full part in international affairs, that she is already making a certain contribution but is prevented from doing her full share by two outside powers, Russia and Britain. I do not say that the policies or actions of these two powers are the same, or even comparable. All I do say is that they are inclined to look rather alike from where we sit. Both are powers with imperial traditions and to imperial powers the partitioning of small nations has always seemed expedient and, therefore, just. This was, and is, the policy of Russia in Poland. It has been the policy of Russia in Korea. In both cases the Russians found some Poles and some Koreans to support them, but in both cases the partition of a nation, a disaster in itself, leads to other disasters.

A nation is not a vague territory that can be cut up at will. It is a living, breathing thing. It is not easy to dig the grave of a nation, and when you have dug it, it is an unquiet grave. I think that you in this room who do so much to mold the policies of your great Nation, cannot do better than to reflect upon the cases of Poland, of Korea, and of Ireland, and to believe, contrary to the imperialist maxim, that what is unjust can never be expedient, since there is something in humanity which stubbornly rejects, and in the long run overthrows, an unjust solution. I think that the greatest and the most effective political leaders, those whose work has been solid and enduring, are not the showy Machiavellians, or modern totalitarian dictators, with their contempt for people, and especially for people who were militarily weak or numerically insignificant, but the leaders who, like Washington and Lincoln, believed in human freedom as a guiding principle. Those who stand for that freedom have always been reputed damnably awkward people. It is, therefore, with no shame but with pride, that I say the Irish still stand for freedom and democratic rule and, therefore, may still be portrayed to you as "damnably awkward people."

Fallacy of Socialism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN L. McCLELLAN

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Teacher Shows Fallacy of Socialism," which appeared in the Arkansas Democrat of Monday, March 12, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEACHER SHOWS FALLACY OF SOCIALISM

Socialism is one of the great delusions of our time. It is perilous because it appeals to the weakness in men—to the desire of millions of us to get along as easily as possible.

So while these millions might reject socialism in total, they are voting it into our Government by bits and pieces. They do not see that the end of continued handouts, aids, and regulations will be to bring the full, deadening grasp of socialism onto the Nation.

A New York city teacher, Thomas J. Shelley, reveals to his pupils the fallacy and the danger of socialism with a brilliant illustration. He explains:

"When one of the brighter or harder-working pupils makes a grade of 95 on a test, I suggest that I take away 20 points, and give them to a student who has made only 55 points. Thus each would contribute 'according to his ability,' and—since both would have a passing mark—each would receive 'according to his need.'"

Then the teacher points out the results of that policy. The higher-grading pupils would take their work easier. Why strive to make a high grade when an authority gives part of it to someone else?

And the pupils who benefited would also let down. Since they were going to get by anyway, why should they study and worry to do their best?

Then, the teacher points out, the authority would have to adopt compulsory methods, with punishments for those who lagged behind.

And that, he sums up, is just what a Socialist government must do sooner or later. It comes eventually to a living death for all except the authorities and a few of their favorite lackeys. And he adds that most of his pupils understand. They see socialism for what it is—a glittering trickery—a flowered road to an economic desert.

We'd all better be thinking hard on this subject. The fine-promising politicians will ignorantly or wilfully deliver us to socialism if we continue to follow false leaders.

Necessity for Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES H. DUFF

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. DUFF. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me at the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin Forum, held at the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, Philadelphia, Pa., last Tuesday evening. The subject of my address was Our Preparedness To Meet Any Threat of War.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Our people—how prepared? To answer that question it is necessary to ask another. Do we face now the threat of all-out war with Russia, or can we look forward to a long period of cold war without actual fighting? If world war III is just around the corner, then the answer to the question, "Our Peo-

Dr. Cloyd H. Marvin, president of George Washington University and secretary of the commission, has been particularly outspoken in this respect. He recently accused the Association of Medical Colleges of being one of the educational groups which have permitted themselves to become dominated by professional groups for their own purposes. This, he asserted, is tending to turn professional schools into agents of the economic objectives of professional guilds and is increasingly removing these schools from control of the universities.

CAN BE USED TO RESTRICT

Dr. Samuel P. Capen, chancellor of the University of Buffalo and former president of the Association of Urban Universities, has also expressed concern over the AMA's accrediting function.

Conceding the laudability of the AMA's interest in high educational standards, he noted that accrediting can also be used "to restrict entry into a profession." By limiting enrollment, he said, "the number of professional practitioners can be regulated with almost absolute precision."

All of which raises still another important issue. Shouldn't there be some group in this country, representing not only the medical profession but also the public, whose job it would be to reassess periodically the adequacy of our supply of doctors and to regulate that supply? Spokesmen for the AMA and the medical school association deny that they are doing this now. But it is pretty clear that this is exactly what they are doing.

Dr. Thomas Parran, former Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service and now dean of the Graduate School of Public Health at the University of Pittsburgh, has complained that "we are producing our annual output of doctors in this country not by plan but by happenstance," under the present set-up, this "happenstance" has not always been governed exclusively by the public interest.

The Late Honorable O. S. Warden

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I am inserting in the RECORD the news story on the passing of Montana's greatest citizen and also an editorial covering the event. The news story and the editorial are both carried in the Great Falls Tribune, which he nurtured and reared so faithfully.

A great and simple man has gone to his reward.

O. S. WARDEN, 85, PUBLISHER OF TRIBUNE, DIES AT HOME

O. S. Warden, 85, publisher of the Great Falls Tribune, Democratic national committeeman for Montana, and an active figure in the development of this State, died at 2 o'clock this morning at the family home, 500 Fourth Avenue North, following an illness of about 2 months.

The publisher's death ended a career crowded with achievement—a lifetime devoted to public service. He had remained active in his business and in the future development of Great Falls, Montana, and the West until his recent illness.

Warden saw Montana history made—from the Territorial days to the present. He witnessed the final session of the constitutional convention in 1889, and he had a major hand in the State's development for 60 years thereafter, with scarcely a day's interruption.

While he traveled frequently throughout his lifetime, nearly every trip was made in the interest of some phase of Montana development—irrigation, highways, power projects, or aviation.

Although he served from 1934 until his death as Democratic national committeeman for Montana, Warden's services to the State knew no party lines. His willingness to devote his own time and finances to the upbuilding of his adopted State was quickly recognized by leaders of both parties. For years he had been associated with city, State, regional, and national bodies in public work.

This started in 1924 with his appointment by Republican Gov. Joseph M. Dixon to the newly created Montana Highway Commission. He served for a decade, spearheading through the Tribune and by personal effort, enactment of the first referendum bill to provide State finances to match Federal-aid money to get Montana out of the mud.

Because of his interest in highways, he was vice president of the Y-G Bee Line Highway Association, then vice president and later president of the National Association of State Highway Officials.

After retirement from the State commission, Warden retained a continuing interest in the highway program to the last. As chairman of the goods roads committee of the Great Falls Chamber of Commerce, he waged a continuous battle for completion of the central Montana highway, the last main artery of Montana's Federal-aid system. This fight included the bitter struggle over completion of the Rogers Pass link of the road between Great Falls and Missoula. Through his efforts, the Circle-Sidney section was added to the primary system within the last year. The highway, shortest route across the State when finally completed, will be one of many lasting monuments to the memory of O. S. Warden.

In 1936 he was appointed a member of the Montana Water Conservation Board by Gov. W. E. Holt. He later was called upon to act as vice chairman and secretary of the water board by Gov. Sam C. Ford, another Republican. From being Montana director of the National Reclamation Association, he was elected president in 1934 and was reelected nine times.

He was a leader in the construction of a vast system of unrelated and interrelated water storage and irrigation projects, ranging from those which would irrigate only a few acres to the Broadwater-Missouri project in Broadwater County that diverted water near Toston for 5,000 acres and provided a supplemental supply for 10,000 acres additionally.

While he long had been interested in development of the Sun River irrigation project west of Great Falls, and in later years stressed importance of the lower Marias project, his crowning achievement in the field of reclamation was in bringing the Canyon Ferry reclamation project through the dream stage to reality.

Warden, convinced additional storage facilities must be made available on the Missouri if the reclamation possibilities above Fort Benton were to be fully utilized, prevailed with private power interests and State and Federal officials until it finally was authorized as part of the Missouri Basin development program.

In July 1949 the first blast for excavation in connection with construction of Canyon Ferry Dam, 17 miles east of Helena, occurred and Warden was chosen to set it off. Michael Straus, Reclamation Commissioner and principal speaker, declared:

"Men of vision made today possible and Mr. Warden is one. Over the years, wherever men of the West have planned to develop their water resources, I have found they have been guided by the gentle, persuasive wisdom of Mr. Warden."

W. G. Sloan, former regional director and later chairman of the Missouri Basin Interagency Committee, hailed Warden as the grand old man of reclamation.

Warden's first civic activity was as a member of the Great Falls Board of School Trustees, serving from 1896 to 1910. His service to the local chamber of commerce included perennial directorship and the presidency, 1920–21. He was an active member of the sugar-beet and airways committees. It was partially through his efforts that Inland Air Lines, now the Inland division of Western Air Lines, was extended from Billings to Great Falls, giving this city direct air service to Denver.

From 1933 to 1938 he was a director of the United States Chamber of Commerce, first as director at large and then as representative of the eighth district. In 1944 he served as Montana governor of the National Aeronautics Association, and was active in organizing the Great Falls chapter.

He had been a director of the Associated Press for many years, being the first director to be elected from the Rocky Mountain area for newspapers under 50,000 circulation. He maintained a continuing interest in the school of journalism at Montana State University. Warden was president of the Montana Press Association in 1924, and served as vice president of the Inland Daily Press Association.

Oliver Sherman Warden was born at North Haverhill, N. H., August 19, 1865, the only child of Alexander and Lucy Flint Warden. His middle name was derived from the popular Civil War general, William Tecumseh Sherman.

After attending elementary school at Monroe, N. H., and high school at McIndoes, Vt., Warden was graduated from St. Johnsbury Academy, St. Johnsbury, Vt. He earned his bachelor of arts degree and Phi Beta Kappa key at Dartmouth, graduating with the class of 1889. A few weeks later he arrived in Montana to accept a position on the news staff of the Great Falls Leader.

En route to Great Falls, Warden stopped in Helena, where on August 19, 1889, he watched the constitutional convention that was shaping the government of the soon-to-be born Treasure State. Montana was admitted to statehood several weeks later.

In 1895, in association with William M. Bole, another New Englander, he purchased the Great Falls Tribune and became its business manager. Bole assumed the editorship. In 1900, this newspaper was purchased by the late William A. Clark, when Clark sought election to the United States Senate. Warden remained as business manager, while Bole moved to Bozeman and purchased the Chronicle.

After Clark's election, the Tribune was sold to W. G. Conrad, who resold it to Warden and Bole in 1905. Bole returned to the editorship, a post he held until his retirement in 1927. He died at Bozeman in 1932.

The Tribune, starting with nine employees, including the two owners, developed steadily through the years. Its present building was completed in 1916. Long recognized as the stalwart of independent Montana journalism, the Tribune never has been subsidized by any person or interest. Tribune associate properties include the Great Falls Leader, the Montana Farmer-Stockman, Tribune Printing & Supply Co., and radio station KMON.

Warden's community service over a long period was as director and trustee of the YMCA, member of the North Montana State Fair board since 1931, and chairman of the Great Falls Park Board. He was a charter member of the local Rotary Club, a charter member of the Great Falls Elks Lodge, a member of Euclid Lodge 58 of the Masons, and one of the organizers and corporate members of the Meadow Lark Country Club.

the context of the broader issues of medical care and practice.)

(By Selig Greenberg)

The high cost of medical education is the major reason our facilities for training doctors have failed to keep up with the Nation's needs.

But there is ground for believing that restrictionism has also been a factor.

The American Medical Association denies using the device of setting educational standards or any other means to hold down the number of graduates and restrict competition. It insists that the medical profession's major concern has always been to protect the public.

The disinterestedness of the AMA's motives has been questioned by a number of responsible observers. Some of these have charged that the raising of standards has been used not only to train better doctors but also to curtail their number. Others have said that while restrictionism may not be deliberate, the profession's trade union motivation had certainly contributed toward its lack of vigor in pressing for expansion of medical education.

HARD TO GET AT MOTIVES

One of the loudest bombshells in this controversy was exploded last year at the annual meeting of the American Conference of Academic Deans.

A committee named by the deans of the liberal arts colleges reported after a year's investigation that the limited opportunities for training doctors constituted "a most serious threat to the continued health and well-being of the American people" and accused the medical profession of "Petrillo economics." The reference was to James C. Petrillo, high-handed president of the A. F. of L.'s American Federation of Musicians.

It is extremely difficult to get to the bottom of this matter. It would require an exhaustive analysis of the motives, acts, and influence of each group involved in controlling entry into medicine—the AMA and its council on medical education and hospitals, the medical schools and their national association, and the State boards of medical licensure and their national federation. Even then, as one man commented, "you'd have to psychoanalyze these people to get definite proof of their motivation."

While describing the Petrillo economics charge as probably too sweeping, a number of the experts interviewed by this reporter—all of them physicians—said they were convinced that guild economics was a factor in the profession's thinking. They said they knew personally of cases where doctors had made it difficult for new practitioners to come into communities and were fairly certain that the same motivation played a part in keeping down expansion.

TENDENCY TO DISCOURAGE

One educator who had served with an AMA representative on a committee to consider the case of a 2-year basic science school which wanted to convert into a 4-year medical school, recalled that the AMA man was the only one to oppose the move.

"You run quite frequently into this sort of inside opposition," this man said. "The tendency all along has been to discourage expansion of existing schools or establishment of new ones. The same thing has happened with regard to DP doctors. The AMA hasn't made it easy for these foreign physicians to get into practice here."

"Restrictionism is probably a relatively minor factor now that most doctors have more business than they can handle," said another authority I consulted. "But it was pretty clearly in evidence during the depression."

COMMISSION REPORTED SURPLUS

This set me off on a search through the back files of the AMA Journal and the Journal of the Association of American Medical Colleges. The story pieced together from those files is instructive.

In 1932 a study made by a commission of the Association of Medical Colleges reported that there was a surplus of doctors. Discussion then began to shape up within both the AMA and the medical school association that it was time to raise educational standards and cut down the number of students.

In 1933 the AMA Council on Medical Education adopted a formal resolution inviting "the active support of the Association of American Medical Colleges in bringing about a substantial reduction of their enrollment."

At the annual meeting of the Association of Medical Colleges later that year, Dr. William D. Cutler, then secretary of the AMA council, spelled this out in greater detail.

"Not everyone who aspires to a professional career," said Dr. Cutler, "has the God-given right to receive a long and highly technical training at public expense. Recently only half, or less than half, of those applying have been accepted, but the number which each school admitted was based on its own determination of the number which it could effectively teach without any regard to the needs of the profession or of the country as a whole. The time has come when we must still further limit the enrollment of our medical schools.

"The achievements of the last three decades in raising the standards of medical education are without parallel in history. But is the process complete? The time is ripe for an advance all along the line. Together we should be able to set up a new and higher standard."

A year later the AMA council reported that "seven schools have definitely stated that their enrollment will be decreased, and others have indicated adherence to the council's principles."

Between 1935 and 1938 the number of freshmen admitted by the medical schools was slashed by 841, or 13 percent. There was a drop of 1,617 in over-all enrollment between 1935 and 1940. It is true that general college enrollment also went down during the depression years. But the decline was neither as drastic nor as prolonged.

"It is certainly more than a coincidence," observed one educator, "that when the sledding got tough the doctors became interested in improving the quality of medical education."

"It was appallingly short-sighted to take the bottom of the depression as a guide for the country's future health needs," commented another prominent physician.

MEDICINE IN CRISIS—DOCTORS CONTROL CHANNELS LEADING TO MEDICAL CAREER—STANDARDS SUBJECT TO THEIR O. K. DETERMINE ENROLLMENT AT SCHOOLS

(This is the seventh of a series of articles on the problems of medical education within the context of the broader issues of medical care and practice.)

(By Selig Greenberg)

The training of doctors in the United States is a monopoly tightly controlled by the medical profession.

This raises the vital question as to where the interest of the public—the 152,000,000 consumers of medical care—comes in.

In the opinion of eminent medical and lay authorities, this is an issue which far transcends in importance the question of whether the profession has misused its control of the output of physicians to limit their number.

"I don't know—and, as far as I can see, there is no means of proving it definitely one way or another—whether there has been deliberate restrictionism in keeping down the supply of doctors," said one of the men consulted by this reporter. "But the mere fact that there is a group having the power to do so points up the danger of the present situation."

"TO PROTECT THE PUBLIC"

Dr. Willard C. Rappleye, dean of Columbia University's College of Physicians and Surgeons, concedes that "legally the practice of medicine is a monopoly in the sense that the source of supply of physicians is restricted to those institutions which are recognized for the purpose of medical licensure."

"The intent of this monopoly," Dr. Rappleye has said, "is not to create benefits for the medical profession but to protect the public."

The public has undoubtedly been protected by the establishment of high standards in the medical schools. But many observers feel that the public interest has been hurt rather than protected by the profession's lack of vigor in expanding the facilities for training doctors so as to keep up with the country's needs. They feel strongly that the consumers are entitled to have something to say about the matter.

Control of entry into medicine is now vested in three groups, all of them in the hands of the medical profession. These groups are the American Medical Association and its Council on Medical Education and Hospitals, the medical schools and their national association, and the State boards of medical licensure and their national federation.

UNUSUAL DEGREE OF AUTONOMY

Medical school standards, which among other things determine enrollment, are subject to approval by both the AMA Council on Medical Education and the Association of American Medical Colleges. Representatives of the two organizations have for years made joint inspections of the schools. The laws or licensure board regulations of virtually all States permit only graduates of schools accredited by both organizations to take examinations for admission to practice. As a rule, the licensure boards are made up exclusively of doctors appointed with the consent of the State medical societies.

In theory, the public has some representation under this set-up through the Association of Medical Colleges. Theoretically, the medical schools are the creatures of the universities with which they are affiliated and which pay their bills. But, in practice, many of the medical schools have over the years acquired an unusual degree of autonomy.

All but a handful of the medical school deans are doctors and so are members of the faculties. The AMA and the Association of Medical Colleges have been disagreeing lately with increasing frequency and have formally split on the issue of Federal subsidies for medical education. But the AMA has long exercised a powerful influence over the medical school association, particularly with regard to standards and enrollment, through what one prominent educator has described as "a variety of interlocking directorships."

ONE OF PRINCIPAL TARGETS

The influence of trade organizations in medicine and other fields of professional education through the accrediting role they have arrogated to themselves has long worried the heads of many of the universities and they are now trying to do something about it.

The Association of American Universities and several other leading educational groups last year set up the National Commission on Accrediting. This commission is investigating various professional accrediting bodies in an effort to establish whether their activities are in the public interest. The AMA's control over the medical schools and their association is obviously one of the commission's principal targets.

East, states that a study of Negro court-martial cases for 3 months of last summer indicates that most of them were largely the result of low morale induced by the segregation policies still maintained by General MacArthur. While the NAACP spokesman criticized court-martial procedure as it applied to whites as well as to Negroes, he held that Negroes had been the principal sufferers—and that segregation was at the root of much of the evil. To the extent that segregation is still practiced in the Army it surely is contradicting the principles enunciated time and again by the President of the United States.

As the President has noted, however, there are spheres in which real progress is being made. Among the most notable advances in recent weeks is the action of the Georgia Legislature in tearing masks off the Ku Klux Klan, a very great victory for progressive forces in the South. The mere fact that a stringent antilynch bill has been introduced in the South Carolina Legislature is encouraging; and steps to abolish the poll tax have just been taken in one or two more southern States. The battle for civil rights, particularly in times of stress, has to be waged on many a front.

But surely among the most important and urgent of all these fronts is, in a literal sense, the fighting front. Out there in the lonely hills and valleys of Korea courage knows nothing of segregation, and death has yet to learn a color line.

Russia Seen Waiting for Chaos in United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Frank R. Kent from the Washington Star:

RUSSIA SEEN WAITING FOR CHAOS IN UNITED STATES—WRITER SAYS OUR BANKRUPTCY WOULD BE SOVIET VICTORY

(By Frank R. Kent)

For a long time now there have been two schools of thought among men in Washington supposedly better informed than the average citizen concerning the international crisis that exists because of Russian behavior in the United Nations and elsewhere in the world.

One school firmly believes a third world war inevitable; that this will be precipitated by a new Soviet aggresison this year against Yugoslavia; that unless we and our allies are able to check this advance of the Red armies all Western Europe will be overrun and the worst conflict in history ensue. The other school contends there will be no war; that Russia has not and does not now plan an all-out war; that her strategy has never included such a thing; that on the contrary, it is exactly the thing she does not want.

It is interesting to note that while recently there have been many converts from the "war is inevitable" group to the other, we are wholeheartedly proceeding on the assumption that the first group is right. The reason is clear—we just cannot afford to take the chance. Our great trouble is utter lack of certainty about Soviet intentions.

On the other hand, Mr. Stalin and his friends do not have to have a spy system or an intelligence service here to know our plans, strength, weaknesses, and problems. All they have to do is read the newspapers and listen to the radio. They have complete certainty as contrasted with our complete uncertainty—and that is a great advantage. Being intelligent men, they know that neither the British nor curselves will fight unless war is forced upon us.

If, it may be asked, the Soviet rulers are so sure they are in no danger of attack from the free nations of the world, what then is the point of their ceaseless and violent propaganda denouncing us as warmongers and insisting that the United States is determined to bring about a third world war? Those of the second school, who hold that the Russians do not want war, provide the answer—first, that the Russians do not want war with us primarily, as Dr. Vannevar Bush says, because they know our present superiority in atomic weapons would destroy them. This is the great deterrent. If this were not so and they wanted war, it would be idiotic for them not to start the big fight now instead of waiting and watching while our mobilization gets rolling and we get stronger and stronger as the months go by.

From either their standpoint or ours, if the Soviets mean war, this waiting policy makes no sense. It only makes sense if they plan to make the whole world communistic not through military conquest but by promoting economic chaos. That explains everything the Russians do and have done. The argument is based on the axiom that out of economic chaos communism almost inevitably comes. This, it is argued, is why Soviet policy in the last 5 years has been so threatening and provocative as to force us into the expenditure of many billions, the imposition of enormous taxes, and an added strain on the Federal fiscal structure, which no one knows whether we can bear or not. On the assumption that these immense outpourings are the only way to insure peace, we cannot stop to consider the size of the debt or the depth of the deficits. In a year and a half we will be far more powerful than the Russians, but we easily may have spent ourselves into national bankruptcy, which would be a victory for them.

We would then appear to be the most gigantic suckers in all history. Still we have got to become strong enough to conquer even though we never have to fight. But if this idea of Russian strategy is sound, nothing makes sense except the taking of every possible step to guard Federal finances against collapse.

As Freemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT M. COLE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Leavenworth (Kans.) Times of March 9, 1951:

AS FREEMEN

One thousand employees of the Kansas Power & Light Co., the northeast Kansas utility which supplies Leavenworth its gas and electricity, have signed a petition proclaiming their belief in God and the American way of life.

The unusual fact about the petition is that it was a spontaneous action by the employees themselves; management of the KPL had nothing to do with it until it was presented to them.

And management felt it was of sufficient significance to be reproduced. A copy of proclamation and the thousand-odd signatures are on display in the window of the local KPL office.

Art Johnson, local office manager, said today the company is not sure where the petition got started. There are many signatures of local employees on the proclamation.

The text follows:

"As freemen we proclaim—

"Our belief in the divinity of God, the dignity of man and the destiny of our country.

"Our belief in a fair day's work for a fair day's pay.

"Our belief that a man should live within his income and pay his honest debts, and that our Government should operate on the same sensible basis.

"Our belief that under the American way of life we always have a higher standard of living than any other governmental system has ever offered—let alone delivered.

"Our belief that as freemen, proud of our achievements and jealous of our rights, that there is no place in our midst for Communists, fellow travelers, and other cranks who by wild accusations and empty promises would lead us down the trail of political and economic slavery.

"Our belief that it is our duty as freemen to speak out in defense of our American ways of life and to go on record to that end.

"So we proclaim, with the firm conviction that 99 percent of all Americans subscribe to the above sentiments that we—the undersigned employees of the Kansas Power & Light Co.—herewith and henceforth endorse and pledge our wholehearted support to the same. May God be with us."

This started out to be a routine news story but it soon became obvious that it was more than just a bit of news. It is a concrete manifestation of faith in American Democracy by those who build and keep America strong.

As long as such citizens as these are willing and glad to go on public record as they have done this country cannot be destroyed by enemies from without or within.

Overtaxation on Wine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT B. SCUDDER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, the economic welfare of the State of California is primarily dependent on agriculture, with 1,515,245 bearing acres of fruit, nuts, and vine products in the State.

One-third of all this acreage consists of vineyards, making grapes the largest single crop in the agricultural economy.

Primary outlet for grapes is the wine industry, operating on a year around basis and providing employment for 111,000 persons.

A proposal by Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, now before the Ways and Means Committee, has created turmoil among grape growers, vintners and allied industries throughout the entire State of California.

This proposal would raise Federal excise taxes on dessert wines from the present 60 cents to $1.50 per gallon; and

Mr. Warden was married first to Etta A. Scott, of Lawrence, Mass., in 1895, the year he became co-owner of the Tribune. She died in 1919 and four of six children born to this union survive. They are Alexander and Robert D. Warden, business manager and managaging editor, respectively, of the Tribune; Mrs. G. A. Hansen, of Great Falls, and Mrs. Virginia Morrell, of Worcester, Mass.

In 1936, he was married to Eleanor G. McRae, of Helena, who survives. They have a son, Jock Finley. Other survivors include eight grandchildren and two great-grandchildren. Three half-brothers and two half-sisters, residing in the East, also survive.

Funeral arrangements are in charge of the W. H. George Co.

HE LEAVES HIS INDELIBLE MARK

In the waning summer of 62 years ago O. S. Warden, freshly graduated from his New England college of Dartmouth, journeyed from his home State of New Hampshire to the then territory of Montana. As he arrived in Helena the historic 1889 constitutional convention for Montana statehood was in session. Continuing to Great Falls he embarked in what was to be his whole business life, that of a working newspaper man.

When, in association with William M. Bole, he purchased the Great Falls Tribune in 1895, the Tribune's whole crew consisted of nine people, including the two owners. Throughout the years the growth of the newspaper and its related endeavors has been closely allied to the growth of this community and the Treasure State.

Throughout his many years in Great Falls he devoted constant attention and time to the advancement of his adopted community and State in many fields. His accomplishments in Montana welfare will stand as his most fitting memorial. They bear eloquent witness to an untiring zeal and an unflagging effort that bore bountiful fruit through all the years of this century.

Those who worked with him in his own business and those associated with him in wider fields can best appreciate how well he directed this course. They may now gain inspiration from his life and accomplishments, to carry on their efforts.

Use of American Troops in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN WELKER

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. WELKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter I have received from my friend, Katharine S. Eakin, superintendent of schools of Jerome County, Idaho.

As Senators will note from her letter, this fine educator is sending to me excerpts from a letter she has received from a friend of hers in France. For obvious reasons I have deleted the name of the French lady who has written to my Idaho friend her observations on our current and proposed foreign policy. I commend this letter to my colleagues for thoughtful reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JEROME, IDAHO, February 6, 1951.

The Honorable HERMAN WELKER,
United States Senator from Idaho,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WELKER: I am writing this separately as this will be a personal letter about an entirely different matter. I am writing now, concerning the sending of our boys as a land army into Central Europe, in my capacity as a citizen and a mother who lost one son in World War II and has but one remaining son, a senior at MIT, age 22 years. I agree wholeheartedly with the stand of ex-President Hoover and Senator TAFT that we will fulfill our obligations to our allies more successfully by using air and naval power coupled with a clear-cut and unmistakable warning that we intend to protect the territorial integrity of Central Europe with any means at our command, rather than by sending troops into Europe to be at the mercy of submarines, planes, and hordes of land soldiers, not to mention the very real danger from Communist soldiers at their sides clad in the uniforms of allies. While I have been deeply concerned over General Eisenhower's report, feeling it far too optimistic a picture of the possibility of large and loyal land forces to be raised there, I probably would not have written you about this had I not received a letter from France just while I was working on these other matters ready to write to you about them.

Before quoting from this letter, may I explain that the author is the widow of a very outstanding Evangelical minister to whom members of our church (the Presbyterian) have been sending gifts since the war. He was a chaplain in the French Army and spent a number of months in a concentration camp, where he taught many of the prisoners geology, as he had studied that in college before deciding upon the ministry. His parish in Paris is among the laboring class and, besides five children of his own, who are now in their late teens, he worked largely with French youth. While my niece and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Merwin, now of Washington, D. C., were in Paris with the United Nations they called on this family and were impressed with their intelligence and culture. The biography lately completed of him, which was sent us here, shows him to have been a man of wide knowledge and deep understanding. Although he passed away last spring, his family has remained in this same neighborhood and is in constant contact with these people. Therefore, when this letter arrived, I felt impelled to send you excerpts from it (omitting personal bits) in order that you may see how one sincere Christian woman of Paris feels concerning this situation.

Excerpts from the letter written January 30 by Mme. ———. (Please do not quote her by name, as I would not cause her any difficulty for the world.)

"We, all of them, are also very troubled by the war noises. In spite of the sayings of our statesmen, I know that there is no enthusiasm in France for another war. We suffered much, twice, for awful occupations which left us weak physically and morally. I read in statistics that the French money power in the working class and amongst industrial workmen is five times smaller than in America; our workmen are not paid enough to live properly; they are also awfully lodged (the number of our hovels is a shame for our Government)—that is why, we understand, the communism of most of them. If our Government and, first of all, the industrial employers, did sacrifices and increased sufficiently the salaries, that would be their best interest and would save France from communism. There are beautiful cases of Christian employers; but, alas, most of the employers in reality are selfish, some are black-market people who did scandalous fortunes during the war, while people hungered—that is why most of our intellectual young men are so anxious, wondering where is the truth in all the sincerity of their souls—all of them are studying social problems—all of them are condemning the church with great severity—and even if the churches are doing great efforts for comprehension and sacrifices, it seems in many ways too late, though we have many apostles.

"All this explains also the small enthusiasm of all our workers for a new war—they have suffered too much. If they fight again, I am afraid there would be first of all a civil war. Most of them would fight for a Communist government, for all of them are upset, and you know, alas, that Moscow profits by these conditions for her propaganda.

"You see how, in these conditions, the part of a pastor is simply to be an apostle, to shake the selfishness, and to help the poor—and that is complicated and how difficult."

The rest of the letter is personal, concerning some packages, etc.

Please protect her name as she has had much suffering, and I would not add one iota to her load, but I could not help but write this part of her letter to you.

Thanks for your patience. Is there any way mothers can persuade the Government to stop giving the boys beer and encouraging their use of stronger liquor while in the Armed Forces? This is a matter of deep concern to many of us. Surely there is something we can do, for it is bad enough for them to take our boys without placing about them temptations, urged on by their superior officers, which undo all that Christian homes have tried to accomplish.

Sincerely and gratefully,

KATHARINE S. EAKIN.

Equality and Equal Opportunity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an excellent editorial entitled "No Color Line," which appeared in the New York Times on March 4, last.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO COLOR LINE

President Truman restated last week his oft-expressed belief in the importance of preserving our individual liberties at the same time that we take steps to assure our national security. His words in this respect are always welcome, and will encourage all who believe in giving greater substance to the American tradition of equality and equal opportunity.

Yet it is impossible to avoid noting the disconcerting contrast between the tone of his statement and that of a commentary, made the same day, on a very vital civil-liberties question as it affects the Army in Korea. A representative of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, just back from a trip to the Far

The bills I am introducing today would give the Food and Drug Administration sufficient authority to require individuals who are using chemicals in the production and processing of food to furnish adequate proof that these chemicals are not harmful.

There has been a tremendous development in the field of chemistry since the war. A great many chemicals were developed during the war and are now being used. This may or may not be to the good. It may be just a step in the parade of progress. You can pick up almost any issue of a technical magazine and you will find it calling attention to certain chemicals that can be used to an advantage by the food industry.

There are a great many emulsifying agents of softeners used by the baking industry which may or may not be good for the food that gets into the blood stream. We human beings like to take a pill to relieve our ills; or vitamins, that are supposed to give us some pep. It is a trait of human nature, and we are often misled, to be interested in advertising over the radio and in the press about certain food products being better as a result of the addition of certain chemicals or vitamins. It does seem to me that there are certain loopholes in the Food and Drug Act, which ought to be plugged up in order to protect the health of the people.

Our committee will soon be proceeding with additional hearings. There is a wide field that needs to be investigated. The question of the use of hormones now being used extensively in the poultry and animal industries should be carefully considered. It is quite possible there are many evil effects of these hormones, when they get into the blood stream of the individual.

I know also that the impact upon agriculture is tremendous when we find two baking companies using some 10,000,000 pounds of softener and other substitutes which partially replace the use of eggs, milk, lard, and wheat in baking products.

I trust the committee to which these bills will be assigned will see fit to give them an early hearing. The hearings need to be extensive. These bills are of interest to all of the people who consume food.

House Cleaning Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from today's Washington News:

HOUSE CLEANING NOW

Time finally came when a man who had been fired in a policy disagreement with the Truman administration was willing to tell his story (see article on p. 6). He is Dr. Alan Valentine, former Economic Stabilization Director, who was let out by President Truman on the ground that he did not move drastically enough.

Too often a man who resigns or is dismissed remains silent. He may feel a loyalty to old associates, or he may hope fortune will return him to office, or he may suspect what he has to say will impair confidence in the Government.

What Dr. Valentine has to say does impair confidence, but it was time somebody was taking the risk. He left as Stabilization Director on January 19 after having served since October 6. Yesterday, after 2 months of silence, he spoke out.

Dr. Valentine soon discovered here that he was relied upon to deliver Democratic patronage, which he wouldn't do. He told of his unpopularity with organized labor, the White House "secretariat" and the Democratic National Committee. In vivid terms he described a second government—the political organization—which functions, he said, with few scruples and little or no sense of public responsibility.

As Dr. Valentine said, only President Truman can demolish this undercover government now. When the President returns from Florida he will find this emergency waiting for him. It worsens daily in its progressive impairment of public confidence.

The people can clean up the mess eventually. But in the face of the greater international emergency the President must act at once. The decay of confidence becomes a genuine peril to the Republic.

Point 4 Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, I have read carefully the report submitted to the President by the International Development Advisory Board, which is headed by Nelson A. Rockefeller, entitled "Partners in Progress," and I hope that all the Members of Congress will take the time to read this excellent survey.

It has to do with what is generally known as the point 4 program and by reading this document it can be readily appreciated that a very careful and exhaustive study has been made of this whole proposition. This report will provoke great discussion, not only among legislators but also among men of business, and thoughtful discussion on this subject is greatly needed so the idea may be thoroughly digested and the proposals made as practical as possible. What appeals to me as much as anything in this excellent report is the point that by helping the world help itself toward a better standard of living, the cause of peace, contentment, and appreciation of each other's neighbors' problems is promoted. If this objective can be furthered through the active interest and participation of private capital, the gospel of our American free economy will be preached throughout the world.

The report contains a recommendation in the sum of $2,000,000,000 needed for this program, and the thought of such a large amount of money in times like these makes all of us shudder, but if we really desire to promote good will on earth, we should not let the expense hinder a thorough study and exploration of this constructive plan which must be aproached on the basis that Government cannot and should not be entirely responsible for it.

The excellent editorial which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune on March 14 points out one of the important conclusions of this report that "American policy must treat both tasks—defense and economic aid—as important and as interconnected." It is my opinion that that is the cornerstone of the foundation for such a program and it will take great wisdom, unselfish zeal, and tremendous nobility of character to work out the details. It is a challenge to American ingenuity, American good will, and American wisdom. The editorial follows:

DEFENSE AND DEVELOPMENT

The International Development Advisory Board appointed by President Truman last November to reappraise American policy toward the world's underdeveloped areas has finished its labors by facing up directly to our hard problem of combining a very costly and restrictive program of rearmament with one of economic aid to the many friendly countries that are poor in capital and low in living standards. The Board's most important conclusion is that American policy must treat both tasks as important and as interconnected. We must not slacken our effort to increase defensive strength. But we will not be able to advance toward a world that is secure and mutually respecting unless we support now the efforts of underdeveloped countries to overcome the bitter handicap of a late and slow start toward economic self reliance. The danger these countries now face "is that in the pressures of mobilization their need may be forgotten."

Mr. Nelson Rockefeller, whose work in this field has been outstanding, and the other members of his widely representative Board will help us not to forget. Their report amounts to a definition of issues on which important policy decisions ought to be made. Its nature is more that of an agenda, indeed, than of an articulated program such as Congress might consider in one piece of legislation. Congress may very well wish to take up individually many of the major recommendations of the Rockefeller Board. Some of them cannot be implemented without international negotiation and agreements of treaty status. So long as this is all understood, there is little danger that the report will provoke hasty judgment here or raise false hopes abroad.

But deliberate judgment and separate consideration must not be used as excuses for inaction. The Board is perfectly correct in warning that we have underestimated the importance of development aid. The group's recommendations that the forms of aid (investment, loan or grant) should be tailored to the special economic and strategic nature of development projects deserves extended application. Logic supports its call for a unification of American agencies dealing in development work. This emphasis on our need to place major financial reliance on increasing the flow of private investment could appropriately be given expression in revisions in our tax laws. Surely none of its recommendations deserves more early attention than the proposal that the needs of other countries for essential materials and equipment be considered in a systematic, organized way. from the present 15 cents to 50 cents per gallon on table wines.

On a tonnage basis, the proposal would increase the present $24 per ton tax on table wine grapes to $80; and the present $48 tax on grapes for dessert wine to $120 per ton.

Percentagewise, this tax proposal reflects increases of 150 percent and 233⅓ percent, respectively.

Placed in the unfortunate position of being taxed out of business, are the 26,000 grape-growing farm families in California. Of 506,000 acres planted to vineyards, 167,000 acres are planted to varieties of grapes for which the only commercial outlet is wine products.

It takes 5 years to bring a grape vineyard into production and the supply cannot be adjusted to demand, except on a long-term basis. Since the end of World War II, the grape and wine industries have been in a depressed condition.

In normal years of production many varieties of grapes are readily sold for eating purposes in the fresh state and a great quantity are dried and processed for raisins. Culls also find a ready use in the production of brandy.

In 1946 withdrawal of the Government from its fruit-buying program, coupled with an extremely heavy crop, resulted in more grapes going into wine than the market could absorb. During 1947–49 this oversupply of grapes and wine depressed grower returns, they getting $29 per ton, or about 60 percent of parity. Similarly depressed were returns to vintners during those same years. The Bureau of Internal Revenue excess-profits tax listings of depressed industries classifies wine making as the only food or food-products industry that was depressed during that approximate period.

By 1950 supply and demand had been brought more into line, but only as the result of nearly 4 years of moving wine in volume at ruinously low returns to grape growers and vintners. The 1950 crop returned $61 per ton, which is still below parity, bringing the 1947–50 average returns to $37 per ton.

Tax rates become a fixed charge on the operation of converting grapes to wine and moving them to market. This is no time to change the historic tax basis for wine, it being the least stable of agricultural food products.

The wine industry must undergo further development if the grape industry is to move its surplus crops and survive. It is manifestly impossible for the wineries to carry this new load in regard to overhead and still maintain the customary returns to growers.

In order to do so, the retail price of wine would, of necessity, have to be increased to such a level that it would destroy the retail outlet. Eighty percent of the wine-consuming public are in the low- and middle-income brackets.

This proposed tax increase would make of wine a luxury product instead of keeping it on the present level or near there. Wine is a product for temperate drinking, considered more as a food necessary and common to the everyday diet of the great majority of those who consume it.

By placing the wine products out of the reach of these people, through the imposition of higher retail prices which would be necessary to meet tax demands, the grape growers would be forced into the unfortunate position of being without their outlet.

By taxing wine at this proposed high rate, families who have invested their funds and years of hard work into productive vineyards would find themselves divested of their livelihood.

As a further indication of the harmful effect this excessive tax would have upon the economy of California is the fact that in 1950 grapes had a farm value of $156,772,000. This is more than twice as large as that of the second ranking crop, oranges, which were valued at $74,585,000.

There are 383 wineries in California, dependent upon the grape growers and their ability and incentive to supply the necessary grape varieties.

Capital investment in vineyards and winery property total $500,000,000—a major factor in keeping our economy on a sound basis.

By hindering this huge industry through the medium of overtaxation, the Federal Government stands to lose revenue, rather than gaining. On a Federal basis, the industry now pays taxes at the rate of $61,600,000 annually.

It has been admitted that the imposition of this increased excise tax on wine would cut consumption by 20,000,000 gallons, which represents approximately 16 percent of all wine consumed in the country. That figure in itself represents considerable loss in revenue and it is not out of reason to assume the consumption would decline even further.

As a whole, the grape growers and the wine industry are willing to carry their fair share of the tax load. But they are protesting the Treasury Department's proposal as being ruinous, discriminatory, and completely unjustifiable. Under the present law any citizen can make and have 200 gallons of wine per year for personal use which is nontaxable. Should the proposed unreasonable tax be levied I am fearful that the practice which prevailed during prohibition days will be resorted to and open the possibility of law violations. Grape growing is not strictly a California industry but is common to most States of the Union to a more or less degree.

California's grape industry is making a very determined effort to aid itself through marketing agreements and other self-help, industry-wide devices. It is very probable that imposition of an excessive tax burden would counteract the results obtained thus far.

Being unable to meet and carry the added financial burden this tax would impose, many small businesses would be forced to curtail operations. In California, as in wine-producing sections of the United States, the great majority of vineyards are of the small farm type and most of the wineries are family operations. They would be forced out of existence by the larger concerns with financial backing in sufficient amount to carry the added burden.

Normal consumption of wine is the only way that a sound grape industry can exist. Strangle this outlet and marketing of all varieties of grapes will be damaged, leading to bankruptcy for many.

In addition to the farm families directly dependent upon a stable outlet, there are approximately 200,000 persons engaged in businesses connected with supplying the needs of the grape industry. These include such enterprises as the manufacture of crates, bottles, corks; reproduction of labels by the printing and lithography trades. Any action to curtail normal function of this segment of our agricultural economy would lead into larger problems centering around surpluses, unstable markets, and unemployment.

Being familiar with the problems of grape growers and the wine industry it is my firm belief that if enacted as currently proposed this overexcessive tax recommendation would cause irreparable harm to befall not only those immediately connected with the industry, but would adversely affect areas in which grapes are grown and would be particularly injurious to the agricultural economy as a whole.

Use of Chemicals in Food and Soap

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing four bills dealing with several phases of the use of chemicals in food and soap.

I would call your attention to the fact that at present the Food and Drug Administration lacks the proper authority to bring in and question, under oath, individuals or corporations using these chemicals, particularly in the production and processing of food. I am a little scared at the harm that may come to the health of the people because some of these individuals, even though they are good men, after but a few experiments, recommend that certain chemicals be introduced into food that is widely consumed.

I would call your attention further to the fact that there are nearly 842 chemicals knocking at the door of the food industry, demanding a place at the table of the consumer. Of these nearly 428 chemicals are now being used in some part of the production, processing, and handling of food. It is my understanding there are about 70 chemicals, presently being used, which have not had sufficient analysis or experimental work, to determine their effect upon a human being.

The hearings before the Select Committee on Chemicals in Food Production, have produced a great deal of evidence that a few chemicals used in food have recently been found to be harmful to the human being and, in most cases, their use has been discontinued. There are other chemicals whose effect upon the human being, has not been entirely established.

St. Lawrence Seaway Is Not a War Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, what we need now is money for our national defense and not heavy expenditures for boondoggling projects such as the St. Lawrence seaway. We won World War I without the St. Lawrence seaway, and likewise World War II, and we can come out of this present emergency in a more solvent manner if we spend our money only for those projects that are vital to our national defense.

The editor of the Indianapolis (Ind.) Star, in an editorial in the December 17, 1950, issue, said as follows:

SEAWAY NOT A WAR EMERGENCY

The war outlook and the enormous cost involved, stupendous as these reasons are, do not seem to have slowed up the St. Lawrence waterway proponents. They have come forth with new impetus to urge it as a secure route by which to bring in millions of tons of iron ore from Labrador and Quebec fields.

Regardless of what might be the ultimate usefulness of the proposed seaway, nobody can defend it successfully as an emergency war measure. It is not a must on any present item of war preparedness. In fact it could not possibly be placed in use before many years.

We need things now, in our defense program, not something we might get 5 or 10 years later.

We have only vague guesses at present as to the waterway's cost. A recent estimate of $1,200,000,000 for a 35-foot channel adaptable to modern shipping is based on most favorable conditions. Engineers have no adequate data on how much of the dredging for channels and locks would be through rock and what it would cost. The seaway project, at least, can wait its turn on our national agenda.

American Peace Crusade Exposed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT P. MORANO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. MORANO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following transcript of a radio broadcast by Mr. Earl Godwin, made over the facilities of NBC on March 14:

The meanest and bitterest fake now being foisted upon so many millions of people in this whole world shapes up here as the American peace crusade. It is a shame to have to expose a peace movement as a fake and a booby trap into which we might fall. But declare peace on Communist terms and we would find out that we have been disarmed by a nation of cruel bandits who would attack us, ravish us and our country and America would be blacked out into slavery just as Czechoslovakia was and Poland too. That is difficult for us to realize, we who have been so honest and aboveboard about peace, we who have been the only Nation to put forward a practical plan for the reduction of arms and armaments, we who stuck to our program of reducing arms expenditures and were left dangerously far behind by other nations who always promised and laughed at us.

Now comes this American peace crusade which will flood Washington this week with a sugar-flavored poison. I think a striking example of what Americans should do is in the news today of how Representative MORANO of Greenwich, Conn., has rebuffed a group of his own constituents who wanted to see him and probably grease him up with their fake peace ointment.

Dr. Jerome Davis, of West Haven, Conn., had asked to lead in a group of these constituents tomorrow. MORANO said, "Nothing doing," and he pinned Jerome Davis down under the strong light of scrutiny in a reply which is now a part of the records of Congress.

"You, Mr. Davis, have been cited personally by the House Un-American Activities Committee as belonging to from 41 to 50 Communist-front organizations. Your American peace crusade has been cited as 'an organic part of the Communist peace offensive' and once again as 'organized by Communists.' Until such time that I am convinced your aims are constant with the best interests of the Nation, I must refuse to meet with you or any of your group."

The man Jerome Davis is the author of a recent book called Character Assassination in which he painted in brilliant colors the one-time Commerce Department official, William Remington, who was booted out by a loyalty board, then restored by a higher board. That is where Jerome Davis came in with the sob-sister stuff about how someone is always picking on men of a liberal mind.

The book had not been out more than a few days when this same Remington was convicted in New York for perjury in that he had sworn falsely as to his Red connections.

The phony peace crusade is all set for as much of a gigantic swoosh as possible throughout Washington tomorrow. It is time to bring out every possible expression to show that this harbinger of peace is a butcher bird in dove's clothing.

Girding for Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. LYLE, JR.
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, this excellent article written by Mr. Hickerson reveals the great contribution of Texas to the national defense effort:

GIRDING FOR DEFENSE—TEXAS SUPPLIES MORE GAS, OIL, RUBBER, AND PLANES FOR DEFENSE

(By Clayton Hickerson)

DALLAS, March 15.—The mobilization program has Texas humping, with three things most noticeable:

1. More oil, gas, and synthetic rubber are being drawn out of the fabulously rich soil.

2. A growing stream of military planes—from small liaison craft and the world's fastest jets to the giant strategic bomber, the famed B–36—is coming from Texas manufacturing plants.

3. Air Force bases are being reactivated wholesale, to turn out more trained warriors and technicians.

EMPLOYMENT AT ALL-TIME HIGH

With the employment index in Texas at an all-time high, much of the defense employment data is restricted.

But some examples are enlightening.

About 50,000 Texans are engaged in aircraft production in the Dallas-Fort Worth area alone. More than half of these are in the cavernous Consolidated Vultee plant at Forth Worth working on stepped-up B–36 bomber orders.

Two companies at Houston are building small arms. Another is building heavy artillery. Other Houston area firms opened up new tank assembly and repair shops.

SYNTHETIC RUBBER PLANTS

Almost everything in the air line is being built within a 40-mile circle that includes Dallas, Fort Worth, and suburban Garland.

The Federal Government reactivated synthetic rubber plants along the Texas Gulf coast, and also encouraged farmers to plant guayule—a strange plant from which natural rubber can be processed.

Reynolds Aluminum Co. announced plans to build one of the greatest aluminum plants in the Nation near Corpus Christi. It will cost at least $80,000,000. Three or four nearby towns will have great reduction plants.

Plans for Texas' second fully integrated steel processing plant were announced by Lone Star Steel Co., which will erect it at Daingerfield in east Texas. Sheffield's plant at Houston is so far Texas' only plant which produces plate steel from raw ore.

THOUSANDS RECRUITED

Heavy chemical industries recruited several thousand new workers at Beaumont and Port Arthur. Red River ordnance plant at Texarkana added several thousand in its stepped-up ammunition production program.

Texas' great oil industry is putting heavy emphasis on high-octane aviation gasoline.

When World War II started, Texas refinery capacity was 4,956,599 barrels daily. Daily crude runs now are hitting a record of 6,600,000 barrels, compared to 5,000,000 a year ago. Refinery capacities reached a record 6,732,200 barrels daily last year, and oilmen expect to add 100,000 in 1951.

Oil production is barely holding its own at 2,800,000 barrels daily in Texas. But the industry expects the Texas Railroad Commission—which regulates the industry—to allow greater production.

REFINERIES EXPANSIONS PLANNED

Of the many refinery expansions being planned, those announced include Gulf Oil's multi-million-dollar ethylene gas plant at Port Arthur. Ethylene is used in making synthetic rubber and plastics.

Magnolia Petroleum Co., a Standard affiliate, has completed two cracking units to speed up the output of higher-valued chemicals essential to aviation fuel. Continental Oil Co. plans a $10,000,000 catalytic cracking plant (modern refinery) at nearby Lake Charles, La.

West Texas is in on the mobilization efforts as well as the industrial coast and Dallas-Fort Worth areas.

AEC MYSTERY PROJECT

On a 4,000-acre tract east of Amarillo, the Atomic Energy Commission has a mystery project. AEC has been noncommunicative about what is going on except to say it does not involve radioactive materials. The site is 17 miles from Amarillo and was Pantex Ordnance Plant in World War II. About 1,000 persons will work there.

To the south, the Midland-Odessa area has at least one order for 100,000,000 gallons of high-octane aviation gasoline.

Biggest military center is San Antonio, site of Lackland Air Force Base, Fort Sam Houston, and Randolph Air Force Base.

Lackland—where reports of overcrowding and lack of facilities for Air Force recruits drew a senatorial investigation—is handling one of the greatest floods of manpower in Air Force history. Randolph AFB, assigned a new $30,000,000 aeromedical center, will be the top military medical center in the world, according to Representative KILDAY, Democrat, of Texas.

The Air Force wants more than $50,000,000 for work at Amarillo Air Force Base. Sheppard Air Force Base at Wichita Falls is bulging with Air Force recuits rerouted there from San Antonio. Carswell Air Force Base at Fort Worth—home of the B-36—will get new space for its superbomber fleet at a cost of more than $2,000,000.

New barracks will go up at Fort Hood in central Texas. Fort Bliss in far west Texas is assigned a guided-missile center and an antiaircraft firing center. Camp Wolters at Mineral Wells is being reactivated as a training site for Air Force construction engineers.

American Enterprise Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, several days ago Members of the House received an offer from an organization calling itself the American Enterprise Association, in which such organization offered its services in the digesting of legislation introduced in the Congress. Of course, Congress needs all the information on such matters as it can receive. Helpful organizations with sincere motives are to be complimented in their willingness to give aid.

However, Members of the Congress should be fully advised as to the background and interests of individuals promoting such programs. Accordingly, in order to make available to the Members of Congress such background material on the membership of the American Enterprise Association, I am having the following inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The list of officers has been taken from the stationery used by the Enterprise Association:

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE
ASSOCIATION, INC.,
New York, N. Y., March 5, 1951.

HON. WAYNE N. ASPINALL,
The House of Representatives, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ASPINALL: This is to advise you and your staff that the American Enterprise Association has reopened its Washington office and has resumed the services heretofore made available to, and utilized by, Members of Congress.

The offices of the association are located at 839 Seventeenth Street NW., Washington, D. C. The telephone number of the association is Executive 8205.

The American Enterprise Association will continue to offer to Members of Congress, without charge, its bill analyses of important legislative proposals before the Congress for consideration. The bills which will be analyzed are those which the staff of the association select as most likely to be actively considered by the Congress, as indicated by current public announcements, and by the advice of the leadership and the chairman of the various committees of the Congress.

If you desire these bill analyses, or an analysis of any particular bill of special interest to you not included in our general bill analyses series, the association, within the limits of its staff facilities, will be glad upon request to make an analysis of a special bill for you.

Each bill analysis contains a synopsis, which on quick reading will give the substance of the content of the bill, a detailed analysis of the bill, section by section, and the legislative history of the bill.

The association will also make available upon specific request an interrogatory containing questions, the answers to which it is believed will bring out the fundamental issues and problems involved in the bill.

In addition to the bill analyses, the association also issues, from time to time, on general questions deemed to be of special public interest, studies prepared under the direction of its advisory board. In each instance a recognized and specialized expert in the academic or economic field is carefully selected to prepare the study. These studies are the independent works and opinions of the experts selected, and are available to you upon request.

The association also supplies Members with a spot research service, and on request, prepares for them summaries, digests, and compilations of factual and authoritative data on various subjects of current legislative interest or on any specially requested subject.

In charge of staff and research activities is Dr. Felix E. Sklagen, former Acting Coordinator of Information for the House of Representatives, and assistant to the association's first Washington representative, Mr. J. Frederick Richardson.

Mr. James O'Connor Roberts has again been retained as special counsel for the association. His offices are in the Bowen Building, 815 Fifteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.; telephone, Executive 4822.

We are advising all Members of Congress of this resumption of our service, and of its availability to them. If, therefore, you desire to receive this service, please advise the association, addressing your communication to the association at its Washington office, 839 Seventeenth Street NW., Washington, D. C.

Thanking you, I am
Sincerely yours,

N. BAXTER JACKSON.

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN ENTERPRISE ASSOCIATION, INC.

"It Is Reported That Mr. Stalin Said, 'If the Peoples Were to Learn the Truth, There Would Be No New World War'—I Certainly Agree With That Statement"—Dr. John R. Steelman

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, again Dr. John R. Steelman, the Assistant to the President, brings another battle report from Washington to the people of these United States.

Battle Report, Washington, the teledocumentary sent out over the air on the coaxial cables of the National Broadcasting Co., every Sunday afternoon, is now becoming one of the most popular and best known of all televised news programs. I, myself, never fail to tune in on channel four to hear it through to its conclusion without realizing that it is, as its name implies, a true report with respect to the most important incidents happening on the Washington front as of that time—from the Federal Government to the citizen taxpayers of this Nation.

Last Sunday, Dr. John R. Steelman brought to the microphone Mr. Homer M. Byington, Director of the Office of European Affairs of the State Department; Brig. Gen. Donald M. Yates, Director of Research and Development of the United States Air Force; Rear Adm. Arleigh A. Burke, Deputy Chief of Staff to the Commander of the United States Naval Forces in the Far East, and Mr. Michael DiSalle, Director of the Office of Price Stabilization.

Unlike the bombastic ravings done by Soviet officials—

Dr. Steelman said, in his opening statement—

these men will bring you the simple facts. It is fitting and proper and the way of freemen who live under a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Mr. Speaker, it was certainly heartening to hear Mr. Byington tell of the decline of Communist strength in Western Europe—and only today I read of the sabotage of the electric light plant in Peking—carried out in China by the anti-Communists in that communistic stronghold and capital. Certainly, Europe is witnessing an economic, but a moral, recovery of remarkable proportions—directly due to the fundamental aid and assistance afforded them by the Marshall plan.

Nevertheless, now with spring, comes the traditional rumblings of war talk from out of the Balkans—Marshall Tito has already told of the hordes of Russian Communist soldiers and other troop movements that are seemingly directed toward Yugoslavia—and so, despite all that has been done, the world still moves toward global warfare.

Our own defenses, viewed in the light of the facts, reported by Brigadier General Yates of the United States Air Force, are particularly heartening. He told of a still newer type of aircraft—the United States Air Force B–52—announced last week by Secretary Finletter—which will provide our country with a strategic weapon of even greater capability and performance than the B–36, or any other plane now in existence. Only last week, Dr. Vannevar Bush stated it to be his opinion that the A-bomb and the ability of our Air Force to deliver it was the sole deterrent that kept the Red army from rolling at the time the Air Force started and successfully carried on the Berlin lift.

The United States Navy has no officer more distinguished, nor one with a more enviable record, than the Deputy Chief of Staff to the Commander of the United States Naval Forces in the Far East—Rear Adm. Arleigh A. Burke—31-knot Burke. Admiral Burke's word picture of the contribution which our Navy is making in the Far East to the Korean war was certainly a first-hand report to the people. His dramatic portrayal of naval action in Korean waters constitute one of the most dramatic highlights so far achieved on Battle Report, Washington.

Mr. Speaker, I particularly do wish that every Member of this House would take time out to read the wonderfully clear and concise statement made by the Nation's Price Stabilizer. I know of no man under heaven that could have undertaken a more difficult task than that of pleasing every segment of this Nation's economy in his efforts to ward off or even control price inflation, than the Honorable Michael DiSalle, one of the Nation's finest public officials.

Mr. Speaker, now hear me well on this—if for no reason other than to make it possible for my colleagues to read of the objectives sought and of the problems confronting our price stabilization activities as expressed by the Price Stabilizer himself, the Honorable Michael DiSalle, I ask the unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and include in the RECORD of proceedings the twenty-eighth Battle Report, Washington.

This telecast reads as follows:

BATTLE REPORT, WASHINGTON

Mr. MCCORMICK. As the attention of this peace-loving Nation is forced by world events upon Operation Killer across the Pacific, NBC television once again brings its cameras into focus on the Nation's Capital for another "Operation Battle Report."

Washington, where the will to see this battle through is now fast being matched by the armament with which to do it, and Korea, where news comes that our arms are helping our troops to write new successes in the mud and mountains above Hoengsong.

Today, Battle Report's cameras greet a top official of our State Department—an Air Force general, a Navy admiral—and the Nation's Price Stabilizer. All this so that you may be better informed on the struggle for freedom, not only on the battle front, but elsewhere throughout the world, and here at home. But first, the man who this week helped bring peace to the Nation's railroads. The assistant to the President, Dr. John R. Steelman.

Dr. STEELMAN. This afternoon, I want to announce publicly that I agree wholeheartedly with one of the statements Premier Stalin made in his recent interview with representatives of Pravda. It has been reported that Mr. Stalin said, I quote, "If the peoples were to learn the truth, there would be no new world war."

I certainly agree with that statement. Furthermore, practically everyone in the free world also agrees with it.

Unfortunately, however, there are many millions of persons who are not permitted to learn the truth. They are imprisoned behind the iron curtain. They are spied upon by ruthless secret police. They jeopardize their very lives if they listen to a broadcast or read a newspaper which has not been approved by the tyrants in the Kremlin. And, what sort of information do they get from their own radio stations and newspapers? Men of the free world are called criminal imperialists; we are pictured as warmongers who are planning the destruction of our fellow men, particularly those in the Soviet Union, our people are described as wretched slaves, half-starved, poorly clothed, and scourged by the lash of money-mad tyrants. Day in and day out the cowardly propaganda pours forth, teaching hatred, preying upon every human weakness, and filling the minds of men with falsehoods. Yet, Mr. Stalin is right. If the Russian people were told the truth, there would be no new world war. They would soon learn that the truth shall make them free and there is nothing a tyrant fears more than freemen.

This afternoon, we have four distinguished visitors. First, we will hear from Mr. Homer M. Byington, Director, Office of European Affairs of the Department of State. He has some encouraging news for us from Western Europe, which has just been received. Brig. Gen. Donald N. Yates, of Research and Development for the Air Force, will tell us of the progress being made in building the greatest air defense in the world. Rear Adm. Arleigh A. Burke is known to most of you as 31-knot Burke. He has just returned from the Pacific and will bring us up to date on the Navy's activities in the waters around Korea. Our fourth guest has one of the most difficult jobs in Washington. He is Mr. Michael DiSalle, Director of Office of Price Stabilization. During the past week, Mr. DiSalle has issued some very important orders and he is here to tell us what they mean to us, the consumers.

Unlike the bombastic ravings done by Soviet officials, these men will bring you the simple facts. It is fitting and proper—and the way of freemen who live under a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Continuing the UN offensive that began Wednesday, United States troops on the central front pursue the enemy beyond strategic Hoengsong and run into fierce resistance. On the flanks—the Ninth Corps in the west and the Tenth in the east—more up under fire to keep the UN line straight. The Reds we fight are not all in Korea, however. Throughout Europe in the past months—marching, demonstrating, rioting—they, like the puppets, have been acting up every time Moscow pulled the strings. These scenes are from the rehearsed spontaneous demonstrations that greeted General Eisenhower's survey of Western Europe's strength. But, much like a barking dog, it's beginning to look as if the noise they make is far out of proportion to their bite. And here to testify on that score is the State Department's Director of the Office of European Affairs, Homer M. Byington.

Mr. BYINGTON. Communist strength in Western Europe is declining. I am only able to give you estimates. These are the figures, and they speak for themselves: Belgium, 1946, 100,000—today, 35,000; Denmark, 37 percent of 1946; France, down 30 percent; Western Germany, down 34 percent; Austria, down 34 percent; Italy, the Communists admit a loss of 200,000. A reliable estimate places their loss at over half a million. Defections from the Italian Communist Party are now in the headlines; Luxemburg, down 84 percent; Netherlands, 1946, 50,000—now 33,000; Norway, down 65 percent; Sweden, down 45 percent; United Kingdom, in 1946, only 60,000 members—today, 40,000.

The followers of Stalin are losing ground despite the glitter of their false promises, strong-arm tactics, threats, and pressures of all kinds.

We are witnessing an economic and moral recovery in Western Europe of remarkable proportions. In 1945, international communism seemed ready to take over. Today, we find that the living conditions of the people have greatly improved and that democratic government, where it was once weak, has been strengthened. This is proof of the moral fiber and intelligence of these peoples and their leaders. It justifies our confidence that in the next 5 years the picture will be correspondingly better than it is today.

The part of the American people in this recovery is fundamental. With the aid of the Marshall plan, Western Europe has rebuilt its industry, made its railroads run again, and resumed its important role in the world economy.

We are now joined with them in a great military effort to confront the threat of Communist aggression. Only by achieving united moral and military strength can we hope to prevent aggression and ensure an enduring peace. Korea has shown that small free nations are no longer to be devoured one by one and that aggression does not and will not pay.

International Communists are using every propaganda trick in the book to undermine the free nations. At the same time, they hold out a completely false exaggerated picture of their own aims and way of life. The Department of State has undertaken to counter these lies with a campaign of truth through the Voice of America, overseas press, films, and libraries. Between the United States and these free nations, there is a continuing exchange of teachers, students, leaders of labor, industry, and government. These activities are a very important part of American foreign policy.

The encouraging report I bring you today is a tribute to the peoples of Western Europe who, although directly in the path of Communist aggression, nevertheless are growing stronger and better able to resist the Communist danger. It is also a tribute to you, the American people, who through the Marshall plan and North Atlantic Treaty, have had the courage and foresight to undertake the responsibility of leadership in preserving the free world.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Strafing, rocketing, and dropping their napalm bombs, United States jet planes swarmed over northwest Korea this week end, smashing at enemy supplies moving forward toward the front. All along the battle line they lent close air support to our ground troops, and tangled with Russian MIG's whenever the opportunity presented itself. And they have made the Reds very wary of the famous "Tiny Tim" rockets, which they have learned to use with deadly accuracy. But Tiny Tim is less than a baby brother to this giant rocket, ready for its test somewhere in the Nation. As it zooms into the air with its promise of greater American might to meet any future challenge to our security, Battle Report turns its cameras on the Director of Research and Development for the Air Force. His subject, The Development of New Air Power. His name, Brig. Gen. Donald N. Yates.

Brigadier General YATES. Plans to authorize production of a new aircraft, the B–52, were announced last week by the Secretary graph of anything is to take the photograph of the things that you have before you. So we picked February 24 in order to get a picture of those items that we were attempting to control. We required the retailer to list each one of those items, his cost, and his mark-up. Then we asked him to file with us his average margin or his initial mark-up on items that existed in the year prior to Korea.

That's from June 1949 to June 1950. Then we asked him to file, alongside of that, his present average margin or initial mark-ups, or whatever records he may have available. Then we have three different techniques that we think are practical in restoring pre-Korea mark-ups. First of all we feel that the retailer, rather than file with us an abnormal mark-up, will restore his mark-up to the pre-Korea period. Secondly, if he doesn't, we have the authority to do so, and we will—either by department or by store. Thirdly, if we find generally that the mark-ups are great, we can reduce by a specified percentage the entire percentage that is now permitted. And so we feel that we have an effective and enforceable means of price controls that will enable us to do a better job than if we had attempted to take some sort of phony picture that was brought in to us and we have no way of checking.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will you actually crack down on some of these people if you find they're completely out of line?

Mr. DISALLE. There isn't any question about it, Bob. We're here to do a job and we're going to do a job.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, I'd like to ask you something else, too. Do you think this is going to mean that there will be more consumer goods and legitimate business houses at legitimate prices? In other words, will there be less black markets?

Mr. DISALLE. We're definitely convinced that this type of regulation will produce that result. Already, since January 25, when we issued our general freeze, retailers were keeping off the shelf those items which they were unable to sell at a reasonable profit. This retail mark-up regulation will bring those items back out on the shelves. It will enable us to do a better enforcement job, better able to restore the ordinary course of business, and it will furnish the consumer much greater protection than some sort of a regulation that we were not able to enforce ourselves, or that would require some unusual or unnecessary work on the part of the retailer.

Mr. McCORMICK. You use that word—reasonable. Are the retailers convinced that this is a reasonable margin that you're giving them?

Mr. DISALLE. Well, we feel that since laborers complained about it and since the retailers complained about it that the public will no doubt be served properly by the regulations.

Mr. McCORMICK. Has the public complained yet?

Mr. DISALLE. Well, we've had complaints, but mostly from people who haven't taken the time to analyze the regulation or to understand its working effect.

Mr. McCORMICK. Could you tell us as a practical matter—will this mean very much in the way of roll-backs, or aren't roll-backs really desirable?

Mr. DISALLE. Well, yes; roll-backs are desirable, and we feel in most cases where there have been abnormal mark-ups, this will mean indefinite roll-backs.

Mr. McCORMICK. In other words, it is only in the places where they have been badly out of line there will be any roll-backs?

Mr. DISALLE. That's right; and that's the only place where there should be roll-backs.

Mr. McCORMICK. Well, thank you very much, Mr. DiSalle. I'm sure, whether we agree or not, we now know more than we did.

Migratory Farm Workers Need Real Protection

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, I have submitted the following statement to the Committee on Agriculture. I understand it has not been included in the record of hearings held by that committee, relative to migratory farm workers. While I have been promised a hearing at a later date on H. R. 2955, I believe that the views expressed in my statement may be of interest to the Members of the House, should the Agriculture Committee report favorably on H. R. 3048 before holding hearings on H. R. 2955.

STATEMENT OF SAMUEL WILLIAM YORTY RELATIVE TO H. R. 2955, THE DEFENSE FARM LABOR ACT OF 1951, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, EIGHTY-SECOND CONGRESS

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in order to keep the record straight, I am submitting herewith a copy of a letter addressed to me by the distinguished chairman of this committee, dated March 9, and my reply of March 12.

As stated in the correspondence, the notice to me was entirely too short to permit me to bring witnesses from California for the purpose of presenting an analysis of the farm-labor problem as we see it. Although the Governor of California was desirous of cooperating and was willing to send a representative, this could not be arranged on such short notice, and I would need at least 10 days' notice to insure attendance of California witnesses whom I think the committee should hear.

I wish to reiterate the fact that Public Law No. 601, Seventy-ninth Congress, rule XI (I) (g), seems to clearly require that H. R. 2955 be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. Said committee has jurisdiction over wages and hours of labor, regulation or prevention of importation of foreign laborers under contract, child labor, labor statistics, labor standards, and welfare of miners. It seems to me the plain wording of the act leaves no room for doubt concerning the jurisdiction of the Labor Committee over the subject matter of H. R. 2955. Furthermore, the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture, as set forth in that rule, does not include the subject matter of H. R. 2955. I therefore respectfully request that the committee have the bill rereferred to the Committee on Education and Labor, where it clearly belongs.

The plight of the migratory farm worker, as I have seen it in my own State, is a disgrace to the Nation. These people are treated with far less consideration than farm animals, and it is particularly distressing to see the condition of children who are not receiving proper education, medical attention, or even proper nutrition, although working in the midst of the rich agricultural areas. The whole system of handling migratory labor has created nothing but misery, hostility, and social tensions. It seems unbelievable that we have delayed this long in attempting a real solution of this problem in spite of the fact that the conditions that exist today have been prevalent for many years. To say that we have been un-Christian and calloused in permitting the situation to exist is to put the matter mildly indeed. If we should deliberately set out to drive a group of people into the arms of the subversive forces who exploit class antagonisms, we could not do a more effective job than we are doing in glossing over or ignoring the human equations involved in the migratory farm labor problem.

In California last year, the Governor appointed a committee to survey the agricultural labor resources of the San Joaquin Valley. The executive director of this committee was Dr. Paul Prasow, whom I had hoped to bring here to testify relative to H. R. 2955. Dr. Prasow was very anxious to come but could not arrange to do so because of the shortness of the notice that I was able to give him. The committee, which was representative of all phases of California life, held a number of hearings in the San Joaquin Valley, and if anything was evident, it was the fact that the migratory farm labor problem must be handled on a national level because of the interstate movement of the workers. No single State can control the enticing advertisements placed in the papers of other States, such as those which appeared in some Southern States describing the "gold row" in the San Joaquin Valley of California. These advertisements do not tell the whole story. They omit the fact that the work is highly seasonal. One cannot help feel that some of the advertisements stem from a desire to have an oversupply of farm labor on hand at the farms to suit the selfish purposes of some of the employers. Obviously, this condition requires control at the national level.

The lack of protection for migratory farm workers and their children is too well known to everyone to require detailed reiteration. Farm workers are not protected by the National Labor Relations Act. Most of them are not covered by social security or State unemployment insurance systems. They are buffeted about on the economic tides without any anchor or semblance of security.

California suffers from a lack of enforcement of the immigration laws, both in the matter of the exclusion of illegal aliens and in the enforcement against employers who violate the law by knowingly harboring aliens illegally in this country. Among the so-called "wet-backs" are many who shuttle back and forth across the border as they are repeatedly apprehended and returned to Mexico, only to turn around and reenter the United States. The lax enforcement along this border permits the entry of subversive agents and is a real danger to the security of this Nation.

Among persons who have studied the migratory farm labor problem objectively, there is a growing feeling that the farm laborers desiring to settle in a locality are actually discriminated against and discouraged by employers who prefer migratory laborers not apt to become a political force in a community or to obtain the benefits of collective bargaining and union protection.

Labor contractors who recruit migratory workers must be placed under Federal control in order to correct their activities which are, in many cases, interstate in scope, and therefore partly or wholly beyond the jurisdiction of any one State.

It is my feeling that if farm labor conditions were sufficiently improved along the lines proposed in H. R. 2955, a much greater supply of farm labor could be obtained within the United States. As long as American farm workers are treated as outcasts, it is obvious that they will abandon farm labor as fast as they can possibly do so. As pointed out by Clarence J. McCormick, Undersecretary of Agriculture, in his statement to this committee, "the average cash farm wage in 1950 was about 56 cents per hour. While this was more than 3 times the average wage for the 1935–1939 period, it was still only 38 percent of the average factory wage of $1.46 an hour prevailing last year."

of the Air Force, Mr. Finletter. It is expected that the B–52 will perform an extremely important role by providing us with a strategic weapon of greater capability than any now in existence. How does it happen that such a plane is available? Is it simply the result of chance? Definitely not. Whenever you see a new airplane streaking overhead remember that plane represents about 5 years of hard work by thousands of people—designers, engineers, specialists in every field from fuels to aerodynamics.

The Air Force conducts a vigorous research and development program. This effort is directed in 10 major categories and objectives. The first of these is basic research. Nearly all great inventions have their origin in undirected investigation in the fields of pure science. For example, the atom bomb is a direct result of intensive research in the field of nuclear physics.

The second area is applied research. In working for the Air Force the applied scientist becomes both a military philosopher and strategist. Using the results of basic research, his aim is to obtain, at a minimum cost, the most effective weapons and weapons systems.

Next comes quite an obvious objective—flight at greatly increased speeds coupled with the efficient transport of heavier loads. Here aircraft design and power-plant development are the fundamental problems. We have progressed from supersonic speeds throughout the field of manned and unmanned aircraft. Our ranges are increasing along with our capacity for heavier loads.

A fourth area includes the location, recognition, and hitting of targets. In this field our principal problem involves overcoming the obstacles of bad weather and darkness.

Next come the means of target destruction. Some targets are attacked best by penetrating bombs, others by air bursts, and still others may require lateral dispersion. We are working on new types of war heads and fuses for both our bombs and guided missiles.

Our sixth objective is to be able to operate regardless of weather and darkness. Weather can't be ignored, but means can be devised to fly around, through, or over it with minimum interference. The most serious problem is still taking off and landing. The Berlin airlift stimulated considerable progress in this field. As to the prediction of weather, our geophysical-research program is endeavoring to cut down the ever-present error.

Our seventh problem is the defeat of enemy interference. An efficient retaliatory striking force must incorporate adequate defensive qualities. Fighters, rockets, and missiles can be utilized to overcome enemy interference. Development continues in these fields.

Our eighth problem is the perfection of communications. The required integration of any large-scale air operation demands the refinement of communications systems to be adequate in range, clear in reception, and to offer the opposing force a minimum prospect of successful interception.

Our ninth problem is the defense of home territory. Although a constantly modernized long-range strategic air force-in-being constitutes our hope for peace by deterring aggression, we must continue to develop our radar network, interceptor planes, guided missiles, all integrated into a more efficient air defense system.

Lastly, we are faced with the problem involving efficient utilization of human resources. Efficient use of our manpower must substitute for numerical superiority. Simplicity of operation, coupled with the right man in the job, is our aim.

In these areas I have mentioned, the Air Force, along with the Army and Navy, is working closely with science and industry. This team—science, industry, and the military forces, is concentrating today on the weapons of tomorrow, working to insure the technological superiority so essential to the defense of the Nation.

Mr. McCORMICK. Against this backdrop of destroyer activity in World War II, we bring you our next guest, a man with one of the most enviable records in the United States Navy. Former commander of the destroyer squadron known as "Little Beavers." He covered the landing at Bougainville in 1943 and, subsequently, participated in 22 separate engagements. His decorations testify to the character of service. He was awarded the Distinguished Service Medal, Navy Cross, Legion of Merit, Presidential Unit Citation, Silver Star, Purple Heart, and commended for his "extraordinary heroism." He has just returned from Korea where his ships—as you see them here bombarding the coast—helped make life on shore decidedly unhealthy for the Communist Chinese.

For a report on the Navy in Korean waters, we proudly present the Deputy Chief of Staff to the Commander of the United States Naval Forces in the Far East, Rear Adm. Arleigh A. (31-Knot) Burke.

Real Admiral BURKE. I am glad for this chance to talk to you of the television audience about your Navy in the Far East. In Korea, the time is 5:15 in the morning. As I speak to you, Navy planes are warming up on the flight decks of carriers off Korea, preparing to take off at dawn. Guns of Navy ships offshore are blasting coastal targets.

Tomorrow morning, you will read in your paper, or hear on the radio, that Navy planes loaded with napalm and rockets flew so many sorties and destroyed so many warehouses, or killed so many enemy troops. You will read that Navy guns damaged so many bridges or dispersed so many troop concentrations.

From day to day, that is the picture you get of your Navy in action off Korea. But that is not the complete picture. We are proud of what our planes and guns have done and are doing, but they are, after all, only a part of the total Navy effort.

To control and exploit control of the seas around Korea we have a Navy and Marine force numbering more than 90,000 men. Broadly speaking, the forces afloat consist of the Seventh Fleet, commanded by Vice Admiral Struble and three major task forces—Task Force 77, 90, and 95. Task Force 77 is our main striking force—our Sunday punch. Task Force 90 is our amphibious force. Task Force 95 is our blockade and escort force. The blockade and escort force includes our mine-sweeping fleet and the ships of eight nations. The fleet is able to stay at sea day in and day out without returning to port because of another force—the service force. This is the force that serves as a giant floating supermarket, service station, department store, and ammunition depot. Then, of course, we have our sea- and land-based patrol squadrons—the eyes of the fleet.

Since seven-tenths of the earth's surface is covered by water, control of the seas will always be important. In Korea, it is particularly important because we are fighting over and on a peninsula from an island base. All but a negligible number of men and amount of equipment has been delivered in Korea by sea. The flow is unobstructed because we control the seas and are prepared to deal with any threat to that control. The sea is the main highway over which we project our military power.

From the 3d of July our carriers have roamed at will, carrying the fight to the enemy—destroying his forces and his means of waging war. Our surface forces have completely dominated the coasts of Korea, denying the enemy not only the sea but also the use of his important coastal roads and railroads. We have forced him to fight inland. We have forced him to rely on notoriously inadequate inland roads and railroads to resupply his forces. The enemy may move out of range of our guns, but he cannot move out of range of our carrier-based aircraft, which have been attacking in almost continuous close and deep support of the Ground Forces.

Control of the seas and the air over the sea made Inchon possible. Control of the seas made Hungnam possible. It was at Hungnam that, for the first time in history, an entire army, with all of its equipment, was successfully redeployed by sea in the face of enemy pressure. The Navy and Marine amphibious assault at Inchon is already regarded as a classic in the projection of military power.

The mere presence of our sea power is a threat with which the enemy must contend, and against which he must plan and deploy his forces.

You may be proud of the job the men of the Navy and Marine Corps are doing in Korea. However, I don't think any of them, regardless of how hard he fights or how long he works, feels that he is giving or doing any more than the hour demands. In the fight against communism we will always be at battle stations.

Mr. McCORMICK. Scene: Korea. In the midst of a big push trucks drive up to provide tanks with the supplies they'll need to do business, namely, fuel and ammunition. But as more war goods find their way to the right places in Korea, here at home the supply-and-demand story is just a wee bit different. Here, for example, you see huge supplies of tender cuts of meat cramming New York's meat-packing houses. Reason: Housewives, who'd love to serve some for dinner, are boycotting the butcher because of high prices. Though porterhouse and sirloin steak has fallen a nickel a pound as a consequence, the dealer's "beef" is he can't make a profit, for, while his prices have been frozen, the prices he must pay for livestock have not. Mike DiSalle, the Nation's Price Stabilizer, is here with us today. Just this week he announced new margin-type orders to put prices on a fairer and more equitable basis than the last freeze. As these orders go into effect, from coast to coast, the cash register continues to chime this all-too-familiar story.

Mr. DiSalle, I've heard an awful lot of complaints because you picked February 24 as the date—the model date—by which you judge margins. Now, why didn't you pick a pre-Korean War date? Was February 24 really very fair?

Mr. DISALLE. Well, Bob, first of all, by way of background, you remember that night not quite 5 weeks ago that I dashed into this studio just a few minutes after issuing the general freeze order? At that time, we knew that we were going to have to issue some tailored regulations to fit various segments of business. The regulation issued last week was one of those regulations. These regulations, of a highly technical nature, are very complex. You attempt to cover, in one regulation, the annual volume of business, $30,000,000,000, and hundreds and hundreds of thousands of items—they can't be very simple, and I'd like to compare those regulations with the refrigerator that you might have in your own kitchen. We know that as long as it operates you just plug it in and it works, but how it operates, very few of us know as individuals. If something goes wrong, we get a technician to fix it up. Now, the regulation is a technical regulation. We have our technicians to write them and to fix them up in case something goes wrong. Now, in attempting to achieve a fair and equitable type of regulation, the margin of control regulations for non-food retailers, we had to get an accurate picture of what we were attempting to control. A good many items just leave the market from day to day. And so, in an attempt to fix a fair margin regulation, we couldn't go back to the period prior to Korea because we couldn't get an accurate picture of what the retailer had on his shelves at that time. And so, the only way you can take a photo-in support of H. R. 2955. Over the week end I tried to arrange to have at least one representative of California here before Wednesday. The Governor was anxious to cooperate by sending a representative who could discuss the farm-labor problem in California in a manner that I feel would be most helpful to the committee, but the Governor could not arrange to have his representative here before Monday of next week.

Although the Governor may not agree with all of the provisions of H. R. 2955, I believe he is in agreement with the need for interstate control of farm labor migration, and I think his representative would, in a general way, support the basic plan of H. R. 2955. At any rate, I am sure the committee would benefit from the testimony of the Governor's representative.

Pursuant to Public Law 601, rule XI (1) (g), 3, 5, 6, 8, and 13, it appears that H. R. 2955 should have been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and I shall appreciate the courtesy if you will ask that the bill be rereferred to said committee. If, however, you feel that you wish me to present evidence before your committee, I shall do the best I can to obtain statements for filing with the committee, although I cannot on such short notice arrange for the presence of the witnesses I had hoped to make available. The importance of the subject would seem to merit full hearings and more sufficient notice to those interested.

I fully realize the heavy amount of work your committee is called upon to do, and shall try to reciprocate your kindness in scheduling the Wednesday hearing by making the statements as brief as possible.

The President's Commission is due to report soon, and it seems quite likely that the Commission may make some suggestions that will help all of us who are concerned with the farm labor problem. I had hoped that your committee would not take final action before reviewing the recommendation of the President's Commission.

With kindest regards.

Sincerely,

SAM YORTY,
Member of Congress.

Results of McGregor Poll on National Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I would like to place in the RECORD the results of a questionnaire I sent to several thousand citizens in the Seventeenth Ohio District. I am proud to represent this district in the Congress of the United States. The questions were concerned with major national and international problems facing Congress today. I wanted to find out how a cross section of my constituents felt on these issues.

I regret I could not send a questionnaire to every citizen in the district, but I believe the replies I have received are the opinions of the majority of those I represent.

Question sheets were sent to almost every occupational group: Republican and Democratic committeemen and women, laborers, attorneys, barbers, housewives, public office holders and Government employees, salesmen, retired men and women, ministers, college and high school students and their instructors. Also included were those working in business and industry, newspaper, radio, and professional positions.

Approximately 3,000 blanks were mailed to individuals and reproductions of the questionnaire were published in nearly all of the 20 daily and weekly newspapers in my district.

Returns of over 3,000 completed forms, with over a third of these containing comments on the question, proves to me that the average citizen is interested in the vital issues now before this legislative body and is anxious to express his views on them. I am very pleased so many took the time to write and attach letters and notes to the questionnaire enlarging upon their answers.

The population in my district is composed of about half rural and half urban residents. Nearly all of the labor and farm organizations are represented as well as large and small business. There are also two colleges and two universities.

It is not often that a Congressman can obtain a true picture of such an evenly divided district, but through the questionnaire method, I feel I have gained the majority opinions of those I represent.

The questionnaire and the results are as follows:

QUESTIONNAIRE

1. Do you think Communist China should be given a seat in the United Nations? Yes ☐ No ☐
2. Do you favor the drafting of 18-year-olds into the armed services? Yes ☐ No ☐
3. Do you favor the drafting of veterans? Yes ☐ No ☐
4. Do you think the United States should put into effect a system of universal military service training for all men reaching the age of 18? Yes ☐ No ☐
5. Do you favor drafting of civilian men and women for jobs in war production in the event of an all-out war? Yes ☐ No ☐
6. Do you advocate immediate "across the board" Government regulation of prices, wages and rents? Yes ☐ No ☐

The report of our own Joint Committee on the Economic Report filed last month contains the following significant statement on page 19:

"Farm people who go into the migratory labor force do so from lack of better opportunity and then merely change to another and less secure type of underemployment. According to the survey previously mentioned, the average number of days of employment for migratory workers over the country in 1949 was 101, 70 days in farm work, 31 more in nonfarm employment.

"Three factors enter into this underemployment. First, a period of several slack months when there is little seasonal employment to be found. Second, irregular and intermittent employment during the harvest season. Some harvests are oversupplied with workers, others last for such a brief period that the amount of work obtained by a worker is small. The third factor is too large a supply of workers for the amount of work available. Migratory workers compete with local seasonal and year-round workers for employment. The latter, too, then suffer from underemployment; during 1949 they had a total of 120 days employment of which 91 days were in farm work and 29 days in nonfarm jobs.[1]

"The earnings from the 101 days of farm work which the migratory workers obtained in 1949 amounted to an average of $514.[1] The value of housing, transportation, and other perquisites amounts to $36 more.[2] At an average of two workers per family, total family incomes averaged $1,028 cash or $1,000 with perquisites. This amount had to feed, clothe, shelter, and educate a family of four.

"Underemployment and low earnings are not the only problems among migratory farm workers. Poor housing, lack of sanitation and medical care, child labor, and educational retardation of the children, all tend to make them a disadvantaged group. They have little voice either in community, State, or national affairs and are unable to make effective demands to relieve their situation.

"Although they are most essential to meet peak-season demands for gathering in the national food supply, they are explicitly excluded from national legislation which protects and advances the rights of workers. Their position is the most precarious of any in our economy. They have no definable job rights and are so far removed from the employer group that they are unable to obtain redress for grievances.

"Rather than hire seasonal and migratory workers directly and individually, it is a widespread practice among farm employers to hire in crews through labor contractors, crew chiefs, or labor recruiters. In many areas it is virtually impossible for a worker to obtain a job directly from the farm employer. As a consequence of these practices, a farm worker has to pay heavily from his already-too-low earnings for the privilege of getting work to do.

"Under Executive Order No. 10129 of June 3, 1950, the President's Commission on Migratory Labor was created and directed to inquire into problems of migratory labor and to make recommendations for action, both legislative and administrative. The report of this Commission is scheduled to appear at an early date."

The report of the President's Commission referred to above has not yet been made public. I myself was a witness before this committee at its hearing in Los Angeles. The committee showed great patience and diligence in striving to understand the migratory farm-labor problem. I am sure the Congress would be well advised to withhold final action on any migratory farm-labor bills until the Members have had the opportunity to study the findings and recommendations of the President's Commission.

It is the contention of those interested in an efficient, sound national farm-labor program that we have the available means and manpower to produce the food and fabric necessary to our defense effort. It is maintained that if there is a need for foreign farm workers, then this need should be fairly determined at public hearings.

None of the most significant differences between the present situation and that at the beginning of World War II is found in the greater inventory of farm equipment and machinery at present, and the greater potentialities that exist for substitution of machinery for labor. The prospective increase between now and this time next year in the number of the mechanical cotton harvesters may reduce the number of cotton harvesters needed during the season by about 50,000. It is during the harvesting of the greatly expanded cotton acreage that the pinch in available manpower is likely to be felt more sharply in 1951. The increase in mechanization will not be confined to cotton harvests or areas. It will be a most important factor in the farm manpower situation next year.

The Sparkman committee report, referred to above, is an important document. In the words of Senator SPARKMAN, this report "points the way toward increasing our national labor force by 2,500,000 man-years. It concretely shows how a practical application can be made of point 4 know-how and show-how right here at home in many rural areas where output, productivity, and living standards are now distressingly low. In view of the critical manpower shortages likely to limit our output for defense in this emergency, I feel that practical suggestions for increasing the productivity of our rural underemployed ought to be given immediate consideration."

I should like to direct the attention of the committee to the following additional paragraphs from the said report: "There are approximately 1,200,000 male hired wage workers whose main activity is farm work. These hired wage workers were employed an average of 218 days at farm work and 14 days at nonfarm work in 1949 and earned an average of $980. Approximately half are married. (These families are in part included in the nonfarm families and are not included as a separate group in the statistical summary.)

"Underemployment among farm wage workers is a special problem. Partly because of days not worked and partly because of inefficient employment, these workers appear to be only about half as productive as workers on medium-sized commercial family farms."

I should also like to call the committee's attention to the fact that Puerto Rico has established a territorial employment service affiliated with the United States Employment Service. This move is intended to make available seventy-five to one hundred thousand surplus workers. I feel that if it is at all possible these American citizens should be utilized before noncitizens are brought into the country for farm work. The Puerto Ricans are loyal Americans, good workers, and because of the seasonal nature of the economy of their island, they are badly in need of additional employment opportunities.

The committee is no doubt familiar with the articles of Agnes Myers, of the Washington Post, printed October 6 to 12, 1947, which articles pointed out that the cost of the foreign farm-labor program to the taxpayers of the United States during the years 1943–47 was $84,000,000. According to the Farm Placement Service, foreign workers usually constitute less than 2 percent of each seasonal agricultural poll. One cannot help but feel that the same amount of money spent improving the conditions of American farm workers would constitute a better investment of taxpayers' money.

I hope the committee will see fit to act favorably on H. R. 2955, but I wish to repeat in closing that it appears from Public Law 601, Seventy-ninth Congress, that the bill should be considered by the Committee on Education and Labor.

UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., March 9, 1951.

Hon. SAMUEL W. YORTY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: While your name did not appear on the list of witnesses handed me by the committee staff, and apparently we have not received a request from you to be heard on your bill, H. R. 2955, which you introduced on February 27, the Committee on Agriculture has held hearings yesterday and all day today on proposed legislation dealing with that subject.

Assuming that you would want to appear in behalf of your bill, I announced at the beginning of the hearings that the committee would take up for consideration not only the bill introduced by Congressman POAGE, H. R. 3048, but would also take up and consider your bill and other proposals.

We had hoped to conclude the hearings on Monday, March 12, and that it might be possible for you to be heard on Monday. I understand, however, from Mrs. Clark that it will not be possible for you to appear at that time. Hearings will not be concluded, therefore, and I am scheduling a meeting on Wednesday, March 14, at 10 a. m., at which time the committee will be very glad to hear you and such witnesses as you may desire to present.

With best wishes, I am
Sincerely yours,

HAROLD D. COOLEY.

MARCH 12, 1951.

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Thank you very much for your letter of March 9 and your courtesy in scheduling a 1-day hearing on H. R. 2955 for Wednesday, March 14, at 10 a. m.

There evidently was some misunderstanding in connection with the hearings on this bill. It was my understanding that your committee had scheduled hearings only on the Poage bill, H. R. 3048, and my secretary was so informed by both Mr. POAGE and Mr. Parker when he appeared at your hearings on Thursday, March 8, having received a telephone call from your committee the previous day informing us that your committee would take up H. R. 2955 along with H. R. 3048.

I understand, however, that when you opened the hearing you did include H. R. 2955, although I was unable to be present due to the shortness of the notice and the necessity of my attendance at hearings by my own committee on a bill of vital concern to California.

The day following the opening of your hearings I asked my secretary to place a statement in the RECORD to clarify the situation and make it clear that we did not understand that we were expected to have people from California appear in Washington on only 1 day's notice. My secretary reported back that you informed him that we had notice from the RECORD. We have checked the RECORD and found the only reference to be to H. R. 3048.

I, of course, would need a more adequate notice in order to present effective testimony

New York is only one of 22 States in which stripper and secondary recovery wells would suffer from any reduction in the depletion rate. I am informed that 7,500,000,000 barrels, or nearly 25 percent of our total national petroleum reserves, are in the stripper well class. Stripper fields contain more than 313,000 wells which produced an average of 3.6 barrels a day in 1949. That production averages much less today.

Of primary importance in considering the need for the present depletion rate in operation of these marginal properties is this fact: More than four billion of the present stripper reserves can be recovered only by secondary methods. Secondary recovery actually is in its infancy. To date its results have come from the application of trial and error. It is a coming science to which many of our college engineering students will cast their lot in the future. Its importance cannot be overemphasized because of this point: all oil fields will ultimately be reduced to stripper production. Therefore, any tax legislation which would make secondary recovery an economic fool's play would discourage its application not only now, but in the future when we will be more than ever dependent upon ingenuity for recovery of a vast share of the oil with which our Nation has been so abundantly blessed.

Oil is basic to the economy of my district and throughout western New York. It employs thousands of engineers, researchers, laborers. Our stripper fields are a stimulus to the minds of those who are pioneering in new and improved methods of oil extraction. I do not need to describe to my colleagues on this committee the drastic results of any burdensome new tax legislation which would force these farsighted men to abandon the tasks which challenge their inventiveness. I emphasize again that we have barely scratched the surface in secondary recovery; we cannot afford by short-sighted taxation to dim the prospects of an activity which holds such great promise for full utilization of our great petroluem resources.

I have described to the best of my ability a great activity within the petroleum industry which would be eliminated, or drastically curtailed, by any reduction in the depletion rate. The 27½-percent rate of depletion has become as much a part of petroleum industry operations as the lease form, the drilling rig, the flow pipe. Congress has long since established it and reaffirmed it as such. It can be recognized as nothing short of the backbone of the financial structure of the industry.

Although the small stripper producers, and indeed the entire communities of my district, are vitally concerned with the Treasury's proposal, my concern goes far beyond that. In the last analysis, as I have said, the stripper fields of western New York are of no great significance. It is the discovery and availability of new oil horizons with which our Nation must necessarily concern itself in this grave period. Oil is truly our first line of defense. I have no doubt that the Russian armies would be rolling westward if our advantage over the Kremlin, oilwise, were reversed.

So, I submit to this committee that if the present rate of depletion is the deciding factor in whether or not the oil industry will venture expenses for secondary recovery of known reserves, then certainly it is a dominant factor in persuading our oil men to go out and search for new reserves with one chance in nine of being successful.

Of all the vital industries which deserves more encouragement, not less, I truly believe petroleum should head the list. I do not say this selfishly, but realistically. One of the greatest concerns of this Congress should be the building of a petroleum supply from reliable sources. In the type of conflict in which we would engage in a third world war, certainly no supply outside the United States, and possibly Canada and Mexico, would be reliable.

We are importing and using roughly a million barrels of oil a day at present, largely from South America and the Middle East. What would happen to that supply in case of open warfare is a matter for conjecture, but I dare say it could not be classed reliable. The Secretary of Interior has expressed the need for the oil industry to up its productive capacity by at least 1,000,000 barrels a day. It will require the discovery of billions of barrels of new reserves to insure this additional million barrels. Undiscovered oil cannot fill the bill.

If the Nation is to have adequate oil supplies securely available from within our own borders the domestic industry must have adequate funds with which to finance expanding exploration and development activities. The oil industry is an expanding industry. Year after year our economy requires more oil. And war after war our military machine becomes more dependent on oil which is a unique munition in that it is the sole energy source that provides the mobility of our modern war machine.

In considering Secretary Snyder's proposal to reduce the oil-depletion allowance we must face the fact that we are tampering with an industry that is vital to our way of life and to our security. We must face the fact that if we reduce the depletion allowance we will be reducing the ability of the oil industry to expand so as to meet rising consumer requirements. We must face the fact that the result will be less oil unless the industry secures the necessary financing through increased prices to the consuming public. This would be unfortunate. It would be a forced contribution to the inflationary spiral that we are endeavoring to combat.

Since percentage depletion was initiated in 1926, the price index of crude petroleum has been consistently lower than that of all other commodities. According to the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, using 1926 as the base period, the price index for crude oil today is 136 whereas the price index for all commodities is 183.

Comparing crude prices today with those existing in 1948 the Bureau of Labor Statistics reports show that crude prices have actually decreased by 0.8 percent, whereas the average of all commodities has increased 8.2 percent. A comparison of today's prices with those existing at the beginning of the Korean war is even more emphatic. Since the Korean war crude prices have increased 0.8 percent whereas textile products have increased 34 percent, chemical products 30 percent, foods 16 percent, building materials 13 percent, and the average of all commodities 17 percent.

At the same time, the retail price of gasoline, excluding taxes, is actually less by about 20 percent than in 1918 and approximately the same as in 1926, the year that percentage depletion was adopted. In addition, although the price of gasoline has not increased, the gasoline of today is far superior to that of 1918 and 1926. It is estimated that 2 gallons of today's gasoline is equivalent to 3 gallons in these former years.

The announced purpose of the Treasury Department's proposal to reduce the depletion allowance for oil is to increase the Federal revenue. It is doubtful, however, that increased revenue would result if the Treasury's recommendations were adopted for the reason that losses of revenue from other sources would be directly caused thereby. There would be reduced activity on the part of many drilling contractors, geological and geophysical companies, and other services and operations necessary to the exploration and development of petroleum reserves. The income of thousands of lease brokers and tens of thousands of farmers and land owners in the form of reduced lease bonuses, royalties, and rentals would also result in reduced revenues from these sources, more than offsetting any probable gain that is estimated to be collected from reduced depletion allowance. The Treasury's proposal would thus be self-defeating.

There is no doubt that the Treasury has been forced to search every possible source for new revenue at this time. However, it is the responsibility of the Ways and Means Committee to examine each of these proposals in the light of their impact upon our national economy and our national security. I cannot believe that this committee, which beyond doubt has the most difficult task that ever faced a committee of the Congress, could give approval to the administration recommendations regarding depletion. To do so would be to follow a course of self-destruction in a time which requires an extremely opposite course.

Walter E. Cosgriff

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of a letter I sent today to the distinguished senior Senator from Utah [Mr. WATKINS]. It is a letter in praise of Walter E. Cosgriff, a member of the Board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The letter is self-explanatory, though I would like to reemphasize that Mr. Cosgriff is a man of high reputation, a banker known for his integrity throughout the Nation. I should also like to stress again that Mr. Cosgriff has in no way been connected with the RFC activities prior to last August, around which the current hearings revolve.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 15, 1951.

Senator ARTHUR V. WATKINS,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WATKINS: I congratulate you for your statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Monday, February 26, 1951, dealing with the career of Walter E. Cosgriff, a Republican member of the Board of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

It is a fine statement about a remarkable man from your own State of Utah.

Mr. Cosgriff accepted his appointment to the RFC Board in the belief that he could help do a job on reorganization by revamping and improving the RFC. I am persuaded that Mr. Cosgriff only accepted the appointment last August when he was assured that he could throw his energies into such constructive channels. It is a most unhappy fact that his real progress has been obscured by the publicity and hullaballoo surrounding the negative and extremely unfortunate aspects of the current RFC headlines, all of which deal with events which transpired prior to Mr. Cosgriff's appointment.

Oil Depletion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted, I am inserting as a part of my remarks a statement filed by me with the Ways and Means Committee relating to the proposal of the Secretary of the Treasury to reduce the 27½-percent rate on oil depletion to 15 percent. Such a reduction would be ruinous to 23,000 stripper oil wells in New York State. The statement filed with the Ways and Means Committee is as follows:

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN DANIEL A. REED, OF NEW YORK, BEFORE THE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Chairman and members of the Ways and Means Committee, due to the fact that I was necessarily absent on the occasion of the hearing on the oil and gas depletion question, I ask unanimous consent to file with the committee the following remarks on that very important subject:

As a Member of the Congress from New York I represent the Forty-fifth District, which is composed of Chautauqua, Cattaraugus, and Allegany Counties. These are among 21 counties of western and central New York in which the oil industry is a vital economic factor. Oil contributes greatly to the welfare of virtually all communities in my district.

I am vitally concerned with the Treasury's recommendation to reduce the oil and gas depletion allowance to 15 percent because the oil industry of New York is fighting great odds for survival even with the present 27½-percent rate. Consider the fact that New York State oil production is 100 percent in the "stripper well" class. New York has some 23,000 such wells which produce less than 12,000 barrels of oil daily. This is approximately one-half barrel per well a day.

It does not require involved mathematics to realize that such wells return a very narrow margin of profit. In our national petroleum supply picture they appear insignificant. But they produce high-grade Pennsylvania type crude from which our best lubricants are extracted. New York fields represent more than 77,000,000 barrels of reserves of this high-quality crude oil. I fear that most of this great oil reserve would never be produced if this committee followed the Treasury's proposal.

It is significant that the industry estimates only 13,000,000 barrels of oil will be recovered from New York fields by primary methods. This leaves more than 63,000,000 barrels of the total reserves to be recovered by expensive secondary recovery processes. These important secondary projects, many of them in the planning stage, would be destined for certain abandonment if producers were denied the historic incentives contained in the present depletion rate. This would not only be a death-dealing blow to hundreds whose livelihoods are dependent on the stripper production in my area but would be certain to deprive us of the use of that oil forever. I say that we are in no position to forfeit any portion of the fuel supply on which we are so vitally dependent for our very security.

Thus one can see how reactionary American policy had nothing to do with freeing the people from Hitlerism and had the sole object of destroying German and Japanese industry, which competed with the United States of America in world markets.

"A" IS FOR AIRPLANE

The Russian naval captain, A. F. Mosjaisky, was the first man in the world to fly a motor-driven airplane. He took out a patent in St. Petersburg in 1881 and flew his plane in the summer of 1882 near St. Petersburg.

This Is a Great Day for the Non-Irish

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL J. KIRWAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, with the approach of the day dedicated to that great patron of Ireland, St. Patrick, I am happy to extend in the RECORD the following article of interest by Hal Boyle, a staff writer for the Associated Press:

THIS IS A GREAT DAY FOR THE NON-IRISH—BUT, IF YOU'VE A SPARK OF DECENCY, FOR ST. PAT'S SAKE, TAKE A BIT OF ADVICE

(By Hal Boyle)

NEW YORK, March 17.—An open letter to all Americans whose mothers didn't come from Ireland:

"My friends, you are non-Irish—and this is a great day for the non-Irish.

"It is a great day for you to buy your groceries the previous night, lock your door, and stay in your homes. That way you won't have to deal with the problem of what to do if you meet an Irishman.

"And that is a good problem to avoid, because no Irishman today is an innocent bystander. Every Irishman is a moon-mad son of the kings of an old and wronged land. He is in no mood to be trifled with."

GREEN ELEPHANTS

"This is the day he honors St. Patrick, that great and learned man, and all America is just one big Irish stew. Yes, it's 'Erin go Bragh' everywhere—from the potato-logged coast of Maine to the colleen-covered shores of Hollywood, where 16 film studios have crowned 16 different unknown starlets as 'Miss Shamrock of 1950.'

"Long ago, my friends, most of the Nation decided it was simpler, on this day, to say they were Irish even if they weren't. It saved long-winded explanations. And arguments that started out, 'Well, why aren't you an Irishman? I am.'

"A survey made this year indicates that today, out of our population of 150,000,000, some 145,000,000 will claim to be Irish—by birth, by ancestry, by perjury, or by default.

"This leaves only 5,000,000 of you non-Irish. And that's why it's a good idea to stay indoors—the odds are 29 to 1 against you.

"But if you must go outside, friends, here are a few simple rules on how to treat any Irishman you encounter:

"1. Remember, he is moved in this hour of glory by a sense of ancient oppression, a pride in his clan too big for his heart to hold, and an old wrath. Therefore he is touchy and quick to anger. Also, he is ridden by leprechauns. Therefore he may do things poetical or foolish.

"For St. Patrick's Day isn't just a holiday to an Irishman. It is Armistice Day, pay day, Fourth of July, a bit of Easter, maybe a touch of April Fool's Day—these and something more. In one day he must himself love anew the mystic, troubled story of the Emerald Isle. He must go from an elf-haunted forest through a peat bog to a small stony farm, suffer long poverty, and cross many lost battlefields to victory, a cathedral—and peace. It is a time when he rededicates himself, worships, rejoices, sorrows over his distant dead, feasts, and asks, 'What next?' In short, it is a time to be an Irishman.

"2. The password, if you meet this Irishman, is a smiling 'begorra.' Say it and go on. But don't make a mistake and say 'Gomorrah.' You won't be able to go on.

"3. Don't greet him with a 'top o' the morning.' That's what he is determined to say to you, and if you say it first all he can say is 'howdy.' Irishmen don't like to say 'howdy' on St. Pat's Day.

"4. If you want to give him a good wish straight from the Ould Sod, say—'May the road rise with you and the wind be always behind you.' Or, 'May the devil fly off with your worries, and forever and ever God bless you.'"

BUY BOTTLE—GO HOME

"5. Should you chance to drop into a bar to purchase your mother-in-law a basin of beer, don't offer to buy an Irishman a drink. Buy him a bottle—and you go home.

"6. If you see two Irishmen discussing a subject with four flying fists, don't stop. They are probably mulling over why the six northern Irish counties stay with the British instead of joining up with Free Ireland? And it's a good quarrel to stay out of if you aren't in the family.

"7. If you see a weeping Irishman, don't pause to find the reason for his tears. It may be because St. Patrick is buried at Downpatrick and Downpatrick is in the northern area of Ireland still garrisoned by British troops. On the other hand, he may not know at all why he is crying, so why make him more miserable trying to think up a reason?

"8. Don't—even as a joke—call an Irishman a Mick. Not unless you've already slipped him three Mickey Finns."

LEAVE OUT THE PRANKS

"9. And above all don't play any pranks on him. There is a legend here that a wise-acre once tried to sell British souvenir flags to St. Patrick's Day parade crowds. Twelve mighty men from Mayo dropped out of the parade, quietly picked up the prankster and took him to the Bowery. There his head was shaved and he was tattooed with Britain's Unionjack from the soles of his feet to his skull. When the tatto artist's arm gave out, is is chronicled, the police commissioner arrived, rolled up his sleeves, took the needle, and put on the last four flags himself—then wrote "Up, Ireland" on the scoundrel's forehead, and let him go.

"10. Just remember that tomorrow the Irishman will be a normal man again. If you bump into him then, give him an aspirin and a kind word, and you'll have a friend. If you meet me, skip the kind word—just give me the aspirin.

"Thanking you in advance for your understanding, dear non-Irish friends, we wish you an Irish toast older than the nine lives of your great grandfather's grandmother's cat:

" 'Health and long life to you;
The choice of a wife to you;
A child every year to you;
Land without rent to you,
And may death come in Ireland.'

"Sincerely yours,

"HAL BOYLE.

"P. S.—In Ireland itself the doors of all saloons are closed by law on St. Patrick's Day. The front doors, that is."

Chinese Students in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Chinese Students in Country Stir Fight of United States Agencies," which appeared in the New York Times on March 9. It was written by the distinguished Washington correspondent for that paper, Mr. James Reston.

Mr. Reston points up the difficulties and hardships currently being experienced by Chinese students in this country, and also underscores the complicated legal problems involved in allowing them to remain here.

I feel we should do everything we can to make the lot of these Chinese students easier while they are with us. These estimated 3,600 Chinese students reflect a large credit of good will for our way of life which we may chalk up in our future relations with a friendlier China. I commend this article to the attention of the Congress and to the executive agencies for study and action.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHINESE STUDENTS IN COUNTRY STIR FIGHT OF UNITED STATES AGENCIES—STATE DEPARTMENT WANTS LAW USED ALLOWING FULL-TIME JOBS—DEPORTATION IS OPPOSED

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON, March 8.—The Chinese Communist war in Korea has produced a whole series of small interdepartmental wars in Washington, the latest between the State and Justice Departments over the future of Chinese university students in this country.

There are about 3,600 of these students here now, most of them doing graduate work at their own expense in the large State universities. They received temporary permits to remain in the United States, but to do so they had to stay in school, keep their academic work in good order, pay their bills, and go home when their courses ended.

The Chinese civil war and the Chinese Communist aggression in Korea, however, have created a number of problems.

First, most of the students were cut off from papa's monthly remittance, a slight embarrassment, as any freshman knows.

Second, the Communist conquest of the Chinese mainland changed most of the students' plans about returning home.

And now many of them are reaching the end of their student courses—more than 300 last month and about 500 more scheduled to be graduated in June.

RUN INTO DIFFICULTIES

The universities and other private and public organizations bailed a lot of them out of their financial troubles for a while, but some left their studies, or came to the end of their academic courses, and in due course ran into trouble with the Justice Department.

Public Law 535, passed last June, made provision for this situation, but it has never been put into effect by the Justice Department. That law states, among other things,

I agree that a statement such as yours in the RECORD should be made to the Senate and to the people of the United States in order to clear up any possible misunderstanding about the role Mr. Cosgriff has played in this work as a member of the RFC Board. I regret that I was not on the floor when you made the statement so that I could have, right then and there, wholeheartedly lent my support to your tribute to a man for whom I have high regard—not only a distinguished banker of Utah but of the Nation.

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM BENTON,
United States Senate.

The Great Soviet Encyclopedia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM BENTON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of an article about the Great Soviet Encyclopedia, which appears in the March 1 issue of the Daily Express of London.

The Soviet regime undertook early in the twenties to bring out a Soviet encyclopedia. Before the work was finished the Soviet version of political, historical, and scientific truth had undergone so many changes that they decided to start all over again. This new effort, which the Daily Express calls "Stalin's last word on everything" is to be in 50 volumes.

It takes its place in Russian life as the major work of reference, an instrument of education soon to be available in the libraries to hundreds of millions—

Says the Daily Express.

These extracts printed below tell their own story of what can happen when the mind of one great area of the world cuts itself off from the rest of civilization.

The extracts are entirely from the letter "A." The violent anti-Americanism found reflected in these quotations is not, we may be sure, an alphabetical accident; from all that we have seen of Soviet propaganda the chorus of hate will be equally evident in the remaining volumes as they come out.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EXPRESS EXAMINES FIRST TWO VOLUMES OF THE GREAT SOVIET ENCYCLOPEDIA

Before you read below the Daily Express presents today a glimpse of Russia which tells a terrifying story, but one which is less surprising perhaps to those who have read George Orwell's famous novel of the future called 1984. In the totalitarian state Orwell describes, even history is rewritten so that all evidence of a world in any way at variance with the "party line" is completely removed. Now, in Russia, the first two volumes have been published of what is to be a vast 50-volume undertaking—the Russian parallel to the encyclopedias of the west. In a sense this publishing enterprise is Stalin's Last Word on Everything. It takes its place in Russian life as the major work of reference, an instrument of education soon to be available in the libraries to hundreds of millions. These extracts printed below tell their own story of what can happen when the "mind" of one great area of the world cuts itself off from the rest of civilization.

"A" IS FOR AGITATION

Quote No. 1 is headed Aghitazya:

The Russian Communist Party's Aghitazya (political agitation) is one of the most powerful means of educating the workers as Communists, and of heightening social consciousness.

Bolshevist propaganda is always just. Only the Communist Party has always openly spoken the truth, and the whole truth, to the people.

Every free hour and day every conscientious working man and woman must engage in political agitation. Speeches must be made at meetings, and with private individuals.

Utilizing the Russian Communist Party's experience, the People's Democracies are now agitating energetically and thus countering the dirty work of foreign agents and warmongers.

Anglo-American imperialism has worked out the ideological preparations for another aggressive world war. With the help of lies and hate of humanity, imperialist propaganda attempts to undermine the people's free will.

Communist agitation in capitalist lands plays a big part in mobilizing, organizing, and educating the international movement for the unification of the working classes.

Posters, pamphlets, and "honor cards," which help to popularize efficient workers when posted on factory walls, are also used.

"A" IS FOR ANGLISKY (ENGLISH)

Since 1750 the English have done nothing to modernize their language. Earlier the language was enriched when the English occupied Ireland and borrowed from fine old Celtic. The English also borrowed "Cayman" from America and "Kangaroo" from Australia.

But since the October revolution some Russian words have been adopted. All English Socialist words are derived from Russian.

For example: Soviet, Bolshevik, Udarnik (the earliest category of shock worker), Stakhanovist, Kolkhoz (collective farm), and abbreviations such as NKVD (secret police), and Narkom (people's commissar).

"A" IS FOR ANTIMILITARISM

The struggle for peace is directly linked with Soviet foreign policy, which has submitted concrete proposals to UNO for disarmament and an atomic ban.

During 1949–50 the Cominform gave explicit instructions to all friends of peace to be more watchful and untrusting than ever, since the final battle for peace is now staged and must continue until socialism is spread all over the world.

The battle for peace is directly connected with the world-wide victory of the proletarian revolution. As Stalin has written, "To abolish war and its causes and to establish a just peace, power must be seized from the imperialistic bourgeoisie."

Since the Soviet Union's historic victory over Hitlerism and salvation of civilization, the American imperialists have started fresh war preparations.

This peace front depends on the Soviet's unconquerable power and on freedom movements in underdeveloped colonies.

The Bolsheviks were never actually pacifists who want peace for the sake of peace.

Bolsheviks favor a decisive battle for peace, which must be waged until power has been taken from the warmongering and belligerent bourgeois class.

"A" IS FOR AMERICA

North American people speak one language but they are not one nation, as Stalin has said. Attempts by bougeois linguistic experts in the United States of America to prove that American is independent of English are just as reactionary as the modern cosmopolitan theory that there is an American language.

Any idea that American has a special quality and is more modern and lively than English is as reactionary as propaganda maintaining that English would be the best world language.

Yet, American and British experts try to prove that the construction of English entitles it to be the universal tongue.

Such reactionary and unscientific theses are symptomatic of the course of Anglo-American imperialism in raping the free peoples of Europe and elsewhere.

Bourgeois experts now hold that American will soon absorb English and that the language spoken in England will become of real American type.

NOTE.—Shakespeare's autograph is included in the encyclopedia as the sole British specimen in the Soviet collection of famous signatures.

The 50 pages devoted to North America give the final Soviet view of the United States of America and Canada pictorially. There are 19 pictures of Indians and Eskimos. The solitary photograph of white Americans depicts them pouring superfluous milk into the street.

"A" IS FOR AMERICAN LABOR

American Federation of Labor is an organization for the benefit of the high labor aristocracy. It is led by a clique of reactionaries who are agents of Wall Street commercialism. Its object is to prevent the unity of the working classes.

The AFL directly opposes strike campaigns and strike solidarity. It also assists the bourgeoisie to smash strikes and harbors many blacklegs.

Its leaders actively support the most reactionary bourgeois ideology such as American racial theory.

"A" IS FOR AMERICAN LEGION

The American Legion is one of the greatest militarized Fascist organizations in the United States of America.

The whole country is covered by a network of local Legion posts, which function as secret police and strikebreakers. No trade-unionist can become a member of the Legion unless he is a strikebreaker or a blackleg.

Among the Legion's duties are smashing Communist newspaper offices, lynching Negroes, and agitating for war against the U. S. S. R. President Truman is a member.

"A" IS FOR AVIATION

Red air force men won the war. In 1943 the RAF made limited night raids against German military bases and supply dumps.

In 1941 and 1942 the British had attempted to conduct daylight bombing, but their machines suffered too heavy losses, although the Luftwaffe had most of its planes on the eastern front.

By 1943 the Germans were in no shape to offer any serious resistance to the Anglo-American Air Force, thanks to the German losses on the eastern front. By 1944 the Luftwaffe was no danger at all to Great Britain and much less to the United States.

Only at the end of the war was the creation of complete Anglo-American air superiority in the west established. Not until then did the British resume day bombing regularly.

A huge 180-ton, 4,000-horsepower motor on a stand in the center of the cylindrical steel and concrete building swings this arm at astonishing speeds. It can be accelerated from a dead stop to 174 miles per hour in a little under 7 seconds.

The Navy laboratory will use television and movie cameras and high-speed X-ray equipment in recording the effects on the human passenger as he is whirled around. He will be seated inside an aluminum gondola mounted at the end of a 50-foot tubular steel arm.

Not only will the centrifuge permit the study of the effects of gravity but also of altitude. The gondola, which can carry 600 pounds and can be used for testing effects on men and also equipment, is capable of simulating altitudes up to 60,000 feet and temperatures with a range from 44 to 110 degrees Fahrenheit.

The centrifuge was designed by the special devices center of the office of naval research and the McKiernan-Terry Co. of New Jersey. It is surrounded by subsidiary laboratories for physiological, biophysical, psycho-physiological and biochemical research.

As he is swirled around the edge of this circular room with solid walls, the passenger will be seated in what the Navy engineers call an oblate spheroidal gondola, mounted in a two-gimbal support. To a layman it looks like a huge bomber tire with solid sides, except for a door to permit entry and exit. The gondola is of sandwich construction with spun aluminum inner and outer layers.

Mounted in the counterweight at the center the gimbal control motors drive the gimbal rings through shafts running the length of the arm. In a turret suspended from the ceiling is the control station for the centrifuge. The operator can look out through windows in the side of this control blister and watch the arm as it picks up speed.

Inside the control room are a number of devices to record the effects of the pulls and stresses of the speed and the turns the centrifuge creates. The room has been carefully shielded to protect the delicate physiological instrumentation circuits from magnetic and electrical interference. One-sixteenth inch copper has been used in sheathing the floor, walls, and ceiling.

As head of the laboratory, the Navy has an unusually well qualified team composed of Capt. John R. Poppen, who has been in the service for 33 years, ever since his graduation from the University of Michigan in 1917; and Commander Charles F. Gell, who combines in one man the knowledge and skill of an aviator, a doctor of medicine, and an engineer.

Poppen pioneered some of the earliest research on gravity effects in aviation. In fact, during experiments 15 years ago, he hit on something so revolutionary he didn't even mention it to his colleagues. It was the fact that dogs could withstand far more gravity pull when lying down than they could in standing. Currently the services are deep in experiments on this subject, planning the day when a pilot will fly prone or supine to permit faster pull-outs and sharper turns.

One of the reasons the Navy wants to develop more information about effects of speed on equipment and materials is that at 650 miles per hour a plane can reach 70 degrees above outside temperatures due to frictional heating alone, which can be beyond the melting point of plastics used in aircraft.

It is particularly fitting that Captain Poppen should be the director of the laboratory, since he pioneered the first research in G's and developed the first anti-G blackout device for pilots.

Congress Has No Real Independence, But Is Puppet for the Military — Is This True?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HOWARD H. BUFFETT

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an editorial from the March 7, 1951, issue of the Christian Century, the leading Protestant religious weekly in America.

The facts and logic in this discussion of the American political scene, and Congress in particular, seem very convincing.

Yet, as a Member of Congress, I still cherish the hope that Congress will establish its independence and constitutional power.

However, it is hard to conceive how Congress can recover its rightful power once it passes General Marshall's demand for universal military service.

Once that instrument of power is in the hands of the military, they will almost certainly be tempted to elect or defeat Congressmen at will—because military spending programs, plus arbitrary power to grab the youth of every home in America, will give them a political weapon that cannot be effectively resisted.

The military will then have a political machine so powerful that those who seek public office will dare not seriously oppose them.

If this analysis is not correct, I challenge the advocates of UMTS to discuss this issue fairly and frankly—and to offer some creditable evidence that it is not correct.

The editorial follows:

FRUSTRATION ON THE POTOMAC

More than ever Congress in these tense days is living up to its reputation as the Nation's "cave of the winds." On and off the floors of the two Houses, Members indulge in wild words on all sorts of matters of Government policy. Little legislation has so far been enacted. An observer unfamiliar with the ways of Washington might, at this stage in the current session, conclude that with partisan passion running verbal riot as it now is doing, not much legislation ever will grind through the congressional mill. But all this violence of debate, formal and informal, really means little. It is, in fact, the way by which Members of the legislative branch of the Government seek to compensate for their sense of frustration. And the noisy proceedings on Capitol Hill will not be understood unless this frustration is taken into account.

Under the Constitution of the United States, ours is supposed to be a government of clearly divided powers, with three coordinated branches providing checks and balances for each other. The founding fathers, steeped in Aristotle, Locke, and Montesquieu, believed that they were thus providing against too great a concentration of powers in the Executive and for the subordination of the military to the civil authority. Congress was granted constitutional duties and powers which it was thought would make it forever the source of all laws and the ultimate arbiter of national policy. Senators and Representatives, important figures in their local communities, go to Washington expecting to fulfill these constitutional functions. But they soon find, after they get there, that their control over the most important measures of state is more theoretical than real. They resent being cast in a rubber-stamp role, but they quickly discover that there is not much they can do to escape it. Hence their sense of frustration, which they try to appease by noisy, though largely empty, threats of a legislative revolt.

The current hullabaloo over sending American troops to Europe is simply one more example. The Senate—and possibly to a lesser degree the House—will rant and rave over the President's assumption of authority in this vital matter. Before the session ends, however, Congress will approve whatever President Truman, Secretary Marshall, and General Eisenhower demand. It will do so because it cannot do anything else. The Senators who are now holding forth on executive invasions of the war-making powers of Congress know this. They know that when the decisive vote comes they will have to go along with the decisions which the Executive, acting on the advice of the military, has already made. In an issue of this sort Congress has no genuine independence. It takes out its sense of helplessness, therefore, in tall talk.

Equally unreal is the debate over the drafting of 18-year-olds. Congress knows the proposal is not popular. Its instinct warns that there must be something wrong about a system of selective service which cannot raise the 700,000 to 1,000,000 men required for the contemplated increase in the Army from the more than 9,000,000 in the present 19–26 draft-age pool. Its suspicions have been aroused by the speed with which the Defense Department discovered, when congressional questioning brought out the adequacy of this pool to supply the Army of 3,200,000 which President Truman said was planned, that an army more than a quarter of a million larger would be needed. Nevertheless, if General Marshall continues to insist that he must have the 18-year-olds—as he will—Congress knows that he will get them. Loud talk for the benefit of the parents back home therefore becomes its only compensation for its puppet role. But the talk will not affect the outcome.

The perfervid wrangling over executive assumptions of the Senate's treaty-making powers is more of the same. Under the Constitution, the Executive negotiates treaties but the Senate must ratify them before they can go into effect. In actuality, however, the growing practice of making executive agreements with other governments has all but emptied of meaning the Senate's participation in foreign relations. President Roosevelt carried this development to previously undreamed-of lengths during the war. The precedents which he established then are being continued in this period of at least theoretical peace. Accordingly, strident demands arise from Congress for reassurance as to what promises the Executive may have made to our allies in the North Atlantic military alliance. Before long we expect to hear as loud demands for reassurance concerning the promises made to France regarding help in Indochina. These assurances are given, but so slippery is diplomatic language that, no matter what Secretary Acheson tells his congressional inquisitors, Congress is not reassured. Yet the Senate knows it can really do nothing. As a result, more loud talk which changes the realities of the situation not at all.

Even the excited exchange over the budget is of much the same nature. True, financial measures must still originate in the House and must pass Congress before any branch of the Government can legally spend that "the Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to promulgate regulations providing that such selected citizens of China who have been admitted for the purpose of study in the United States shall be granted permission to accept employment upon application filed with the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization."

The State Department repeatedly has urged that this section of the law be put into force, but while the Justice Department has been reasonable about allowing the Chinese students to work after school hours and during summer vacations, it has not promulgated this section, which would enable the Chinese students to leave school and earn a living, or to take full-time jobs after graduation.

Instead, particularly since the Government was charged with being soft on Communists last year, the regional offices of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, particularly in Chicago, have been adopting what many university officials regard as an obsolete and harsh policy toward many of the Chinese students.

Now a Chinese student who has left school for lack of funds, or taken a job after graduation, is very likely to be served with a warrant of arrest, forced to return to his campus under the custody of some official there, and even served with a warrant of deportation.

MANY JOIN ORGANIZATIONS

This situation is greatly complicated by the fact that a great many of the Chinese students—at many universities the majority of them—have joined one or two organizations whose national leadership has been branded subversive by the Attorney General's office.

These organizations are the Chinese Students Christian Organization and the Scientific Workers Association of Engineering and Chemistry. Even those educators who criticize the Justice Department's handling of this problem agree that there has been some infiltration of these two organizations by Communists. Their complaints, however, are—

1. That the State and Justice Departments have different approaches to the problem, and

2. That all the Chinese students are being indicted as a result of the Communist sympathies of a few, and that the executive branch of the Government has let 9 months go by without putting into force a law that would enable the Chinese students to work here and avoid the consequences of returning to a Communist-controlled country.

PROFESSOR'S CONCLUSIONS

One professor who has watched the two Government departments trying to deal with these problems of employment and subversion summarizes his conclusions as follows:

1. One department tells us that so far as it is concerned no Chinese student who wishes to remain here will be forced to go back to Communist China. But the other Government department has given us the impression that all the Chinese students must prepare to return, even if they do not want to.

2. The simple theory of some of the Government officials in these parts is that since some of the Chinese students may be subversive, it would be better in the present atmosphere of suspicion and investigation to get rid of all of them.

"The answer to that, of course," he adds, "is that it is criminal to send back our friends and idiotic to send back our enemies, since all of them are highly trained. No sensible government would let any of them go near Peiping, whether they wished to go or not—and 90 percent of them definitely wish not to go."

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include editorial comment from the Olean (N. Y.) Times-Herald.

The editorial follows:

QUERY

Is President Truman's proposed budget as closely trimmed as it might be?

The President thinks it is. He has said so emphatically and caustically; and he has "dared" Congress to try to reduce it further.

It is always risky for a President to "dare" Congress to do anything; for Congress is quite apt to take up the challenge, not only for the merit of the action itself, but also to demonstrate to the Chief Executive that the Congress is the legislative body, and the direct representative of the American pepole.

As to what Congress will do in this particular instance must remain to be seen.

But there is no doubt as to the attitude of the congressional representation from western New York.

The views of Representative DANIEL A. REED of this forty-fifth district already have been quoted by this newspaper.

Mr. REED is convinced that billions of dollars could be lopped from the proposed budget. He has pointed out that all told the President wants $16,000,000,000 of additional revenue for the next fiscal year; and that he, Mr. REED, has not satisfied himself that, if the proper pruning is done, there will be any need to provide more than half of that colossal sum.

The views of other western New York solons may not be so well known to the people of Olean and vicinity; but here, in brief, are some of them:

Representative KENNETH B. KEATING, of Rochester, declares that Mr. Truman again has demonstrated his habit of putting his personal feelings ahead of reason.

"The President," he says, "should welcome rather than spurn the efforts of Congress to find ways to reduce nonessential, nondefense spending. In issuing a dare to Congress to cut his budget in any respect, the President demonstrates his impetuous tendency, tragic for the country, to put personal pique ahead of reason."

On its part, added Mr. KEATING, Congress should dare the President "to put to the American people the issue of whether or not they want him to be the absolute dictator of how much shall be deducted from the pay envelopes for taxes without any participation by Congress in that decision."

Here is Representative W. STERLING COLE, of Bath:

"I can think of no dare in all my lifetime that I have accepted with more enthusiasm than this one. There are some parts of the President's budget I shall be especially happy to vote against. The Brannan farm plan, Federal aid to education, and socialized medicine are some of them."

Representative JOHN TABER, of Auburn—the ranking Republican member of the House Appropriations Committee—has this to say:

"We accept his challenge. The administration's every effort has been made to get every last possible dollar out of the Treasury, and to delude the Congress that it was needed.

"We do not intend to be sidetracked by threats from doing our duty, which is to protect the American people against the ridiculous and exorbitant demands of the bureaucrats."

There is every indication, it is gratifying to note, that Congress will trim the Presidential tax proposals to a considerable degree by the relatively simple expedient of cutting down or lopping off altogether appropriations for completely nonessential activities.

And there are many.

Besides the Brannan farm plan, socialized medicine and other schemes whose cost would run into the billions annually, there are requests in the President's budget for an increase in the amount of money devoted to "earthquake investigation," for the construction of a glove factory at Alcatraz Federal Penitentiary "to offset a reduction in convict employment at the laundry," money for five new facilities for sightseers at various national parks, funds to carry on "studies designed to increase production of potatoes in Alaska."

There are many other such requests. Congressional pruners should have quite an interesting time.

New Tool Probes Gravity's Effects for Navy's Fliers—Pilots of Tomorrow May Work Lying Down—Lessens Blackout

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article written by Lt. Comdr. Robert J. Boylan and published by the North American Newspaper Alliance on the new Aviation Medical Acceleration Laboratory at Johnsville, Pa. The article follows:

NEW TOOL PROBES GRAVITY'S EFFECTS FOR NAVY'S FLYERS—PILOTS OF TOMORROW MAY WORK LYING DOWN—LESSENS BLACKOUT

(By Lt. Comdr. Robert J. Boylan, USNR)

WASHINGTON, February 12.—Sir Isaac Newton found out what he wanted to know about gravity using only an apple and a tree. But he couldn't possibly have conceived the present and increasing need to know more and more about gravity's effect on the human body as it rockets through the air at speeds approaching that of sound.

To try to come up with some of the answers the Navy is spending more than $4,000,000 on a new aviation medical acceleration laboratory at Johnsville, Pa., which will devote a lot of its time to measuring the effects of gravity at high speeds and sharp turns under a wide variety of altitudes and temperatures, artificially produced. Knowledge acquired can be used in planning military and civilian aircraft of the future.

Centerpiece of this new laboratory is the largest and newest centrifuge in the world, which has taken several years to plan, construct, and install in the laboratory. Part of the centrifuge is a long steel horizontal arm with a small enclosed passenger compartment mounted on the end of it.

analysis of Secretary Acheson's character and capacity, but primarily because I feel it is imperative that the Congress and the American people be again alerted—and again and again—to the current attacks upon our character and institutions of which Secretary Acheson has unwittingly become the supreme symbol.

I am informed by the Public Printer that the manuscript is estimated to make two and a half pages in the RECORD, at a cost of $205.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE CRUSADE AGAINST ACHESON

(By Elmer Davis)

I

Whatever else Mr. Herbert Hoover may or may not have accomplished by his foreign-policy speech last December, he at least changed the topic of conversation and thereby got the Republicans in Congress off of what was becoming a somewhat uncomfortable hook. Ever since the election they had been talking about nothing but the Secretary of State; and finally their party caucuses in both Houses had formally demanded that Acheson must go. Why must he go? Because, they said, he had lost the confidence of the country. Why had he lost it—if or insofar as he had? Because for months past Republican orators had been denouncing him with a virulence seldom equaled, and a shameless mendacity quite unequaled in my recollection. After the election there was little pretense that there had been any truth in these attacks. Said Senator IVES, in presenting the demand for Acheson's dismissal, "Whether or not he is responsible for the dilemma we are in has nothing to do with it." (All through the campaign the Republicans had been insisting that he was responsible; they disagreed only as to whether he was a traitor or a mere incompetent.) * * *

But Acheson did not go. The resignation he had never written was accepted by several volunteer presidents in their newspaper columns; but the elected President in the White House said that Acheson was going to stay, and the Republicans in Congress were beginning to look rather foolish till Mr. Hoover gave them a chance to talk about something else. By the time you read this the attack on Acheson may have been renewed; but if so, it may be a little less illogical than it was in December; there has been nothing quite like that in American history. Not merely because they were denouncing as a Communist (or a protector of Communists—they could never quite agree on their story) the man who had done more to check the advance of Russian aggression than any other public official we have ever had; not merely because they were demanding the dismissal of the man who, at that time, was clearly the most successful Secretary of State since Seward. (Subsequent events have somewhat tarnished the luster of his greatest achievement, the change in the constitution of the United Nations; but Acheson is not to blame for that, nor could the Republicans then have foreseen it.) But for pure irresponsibility their performance has no equal.

The parallel cited by the President—the demand of the Republican Senators, in December 1862, for the dismissal of Secretary of State Seward—fits only loosely. Those were Senators of the President's own party and they were a majority of the total membership of the Senate. What they proposed was, as the most candid of them admitted, unconstitutional—an attempt to establish something like the parliamentary form of government; with the considerable difference that the President's powers would have been transferred, not to Congress as a whole, but to the Senate. But at least they did propose to transfer the executive authority, not to nullify it; and to transfer it to a group that had a policy, an alternative to the policy of President Lincoln. Their policy would almost certainly have lost the Civil War and disrupted the Republic; still it was a policy, the majority of the Senate was behind it; granted their premises, their behavior made some sense.

No such logic informed the action of the Republicans last December. They were a minority, and would still be a minority when the new Congress came in. The demand for Acheson's removal was overwhelmingly supported in the House caucus; but only 23 of the 42 Republican Senators voted for it. Five voted against it—AIKEN, LANGER, MORSE, and the two SMITHS; 14 others had at least the courage not to vote at all. The President was called on to remove the Secretary of State to satisfy a minority of the House of Representatives and less than a fourth of the Senators, who had no alternative to offer, either of personality or of policy. It was not their business, they insisted, to say who should replace Acheson; and there were almost as many Republican foreign policies as there were Republican Senators. This was not a proposal—not even a revolutionary proposal—for a different kind of action; it was a program for organizing and institutionalizing impotence.

But at this writing (mid-January) Republican policies seem to be beginning to jell. It is not yet clear whether the party will follow Mr. Hoover in his proposal to retreat under the bed and there erect a Gibraltar of Western civilization; or Senator TAFT in any of the various ideas he offers, fresh every morning; or whether—as seems not yet beyond hope—the Dewey-Dulles Republicans may persuade their colleagues to recognize the facts of life. At any rate, if the attack on Acheson should be resumed, his enemies will probably have some alternative to offer, whatever it may be worth.

But why pick on Acheson? Well, last spring, before McCarthyism had conquered a party (or much of a party, for there were honorable holdouts to the last), John Duncan Miller of the London Times had interpreted it as essentially "a revolt of the primitives against intelligence." Acheson is intelligent; he also has the misfortune of being a gentleman, and what in his case proved to be the greater misfortune of being a Christian.

His origins are appallingly respectable—the son of a bishop, educated at Groton, Yale, and the Harvard Law School; an editor of the Harvard Law Review, followed by a term as secretary to Justice Brandeis before he went into the practice of law in Washington. He has, as one of his old friends remarked to me, "all the virtues that were considered estimable when you and I were boys." Also, he dresses well and speaks correct English; for which he has been sneered at by Mr. Fulton Lewis, who also can speak correct English and dresses well enough to impersonate a man of distinction in whisky advertisements. All this makes Acheson an easy target for the fascistoid elements in American society—the people from whom the Ku Klux Klan and the Christian Front were recruited, the kind of people who gave Hitler his first mass support. But for all that, you would suppose there must be something in his official record to justify the holy crusade that was waged against him.

There is not.

II

Acheson has been damned as a New Dealer by those who believe, or profess to believe, that New Dealers are Communists; yet he first became conspicuous in the news as a man who would not go along with the New Deal. A brilliant and highly successful lawyer, he gave up his practice in the spring of 1933 to become Under Secretary of the Treasury. Since Secretary Woodin was often ill, Acheson ran the department during a good part of that tumultuous year; but in November he resigned by request, because he opposed the devaluation of the dollar. Thereafter he returned to his law office, and would probably have stayed there but for Hitler's successes in 1940. Acheson then became active in the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, and early in 1941 left his practice again to become Assistant Secretary of State.

During his 4½ years in that office his duties consisted largely of liaison with Congress, and in view of his recent troubles it is worth noting that he got along with Congress remarkably well. Aside from that he dealt chiefly with economic problems; he had little to do with political policy until August 1945, when he was promoted to Under Secretary. And here appears the first muted announcement of a theme that has lately been blared on numerous Republican trumpets. He was confirmed with only one dissenting vote—that of Senator WHERRY, who accused him of insulting MacArthur. Acheson had said that MacArthur's occupation command was the instrument, not the determinant, of United States Government policy, and this statement of constitutional fact was evidently news to KENNETH WHERRY.

Acheson remained as Under Secretary till July 1947, often running the Department as Acting Secretary while his chief—first Byrnes and later Marshall—was absent at international conferences. State Department policies are usually the product of many minds, and it is hard to say just who deserves the credit. But Acheson had, as the President has noted, a great deal to do with the Greek-Turkish policy and the Truman doctrine early in 1947; still more to do with the transformation of the Truman doctrine into the Marshall plan, which became the most successful of all our postwar policies. And incidentally he was the first high American official who publicly declared that Russian policy is aggressive—a statement which, made to a Senate committee early in 1947, brought a formal and irate protest from Molotov which General Marshall brushed aside. All in all, Acheson's record as Under Secretary thoroughly justifies his later remark that not even "disinterested malevolence" could call him an appeaser. (But he had underestimated the capabilities of interested malevolence.)

His retirement to private life left him little time for his law practice, for presently he was named vice chairman of the Hoover Commission on Governmental Reorganization. And about the time that group finished its arduous and fruitful labors, General Marshall's health compelled his retirement, and Acheson was called back into the service as Secretary of State. Whether history will ultimately rank him right up at the top, along with John Quincy Adams and William H. Seward, cannot yet be predicted; but neither of those men, in his first 2 years in office, accomplished as much as Acheson has done. More than any other man he has created the organization by which the free nations can make most effective use of their united powers to beat back Communist imperialism.

The first of his great achievements, the North Atlantic Treaty, had been largely prepared by Marshall and Lovett; but Acheson finished the work of concluding it, and led the way in the more difficult task of persuading the Senate to approve it. He was working on long-term policies too—the policy of building up situations of strength from which we could afford to negotiate with the Kremlin with some hope of getting somewhere. And his speech at the University of California last March set forth the conditions on which other nations can safely live in the same world with Russia. They are conditions to which the Russians will a nickel. But the budget has become a Presidential production, and Congress retains little actual control over it. Mr. Truman almost laughed in the face of Congress the other day when, in defying its Members to cut his current $72,000,000,000 figures, he reminded the Nation that we went through the same performance of an initial outcry and demands for cuts during the previous session and ended by actual additions of a billion to what the Executive had proposed. Now Congress is trying to delay its inevitable accession to the demands of the White House by dragging out action on taxes. But with the sacrosanct military and veterans' items, with the fixed charges on debt and the virtual promises already made to our allies, Congress knows that there is very little it can do. So there is nothing left for it but to get what satisfaction it can from preliminary howling, with Senators and Representatives hoping that at tax-paying and voting times the electorate will remember the howls and forget the actual outcome.

So it goes in all fields of government action. Under the Constitution, Congress remains the lawmaking branch, and therefore might be thought to be the actual governing body in Washington. Thousands of classes in the Nation's schools are still being taught that this is so. Yet in reality it is not so. The real centers of authority in Washington are three—the White House, the Pentagon and the administrative agencies. Not one of the three is to be found in the Capitol.

Aside from the check which remains in the provision that Congress must enact appropriation bills—a check which, as has been said, constantly diminishes in actuality—the White House has almost no limitations left on its exercise of power. The President, appealing to his authority as commander in chief, now claims almost unlimited warmaking powers. By executive agreements with foreign governments he continually bypasses limitations over his control of foreign policy. The Vatican embassy has given public demonstration of the way in which he can, and frequently does, ignore the constitutional provisions for Senate participation in the appointment of ambassadors. Two years ago he claimed implied powers to intervene in labor disputes by drafting striking railway workers. Even in financial matters, he now demands and receives secret funds which he disburses without congressional check. The President of the United States thus has accumulated far more power than any other head of a supposedly democratic government on earth. Once in a long while Congress tries to stand up against this current of growing executive power. The last instance came in the revolt against President Roosevelt's Supreme Court-packing plan. But such occasional revolts do not alter the general trend. That is toward investing the President with ever accumulating powers.

The Pentagon has become almost a law unto itself. Each new crisis in our international relations adds to its freedom from civilian control. In this session it is demanding astronomical sums of Congress without giving more than the haziest suggestions as to how it intends to use the money. Every Member of Congress knows, moreover, that after these enormous appropriations have been voted the Pentagon will be back, before the session ends, with demands for many more billions in supplemental appropriations. If any significant body of Congressmen dare to question the Pentagon's demands, it has only to fling out the magic word "security" and the opposition collapses. The prospect of a permanent military establishment of great size at last confronts the Republic with a permanent military caste—the very thing which the founding fathers were most determined to prevent. Not only is the defense department for the first time in our history headed by a professional military man, but the fate of Louis Johnson is a reminder of what will now happen to a civilian who tries to impose his authority on the Pentagon. From now on, civilians in the Pentagon will be tolerated only if they understand that they are there to do as the generals and admirals tell them.

As for the administrative agencies—Washington's "alphabet soup"—they proliferate endlessly and accumulate authority all the time. Whence come the laws which actually rule American life today? Businessmen have long known that they come from the tens of thousands of executive regulations which pour out of the administrative agencies. Now the rank-and-file of our citizens will be taught the same lesson. Wage and price controls will not let them forget this, and these are only a start in the flood of administrative regulations which are to be expected now that we are heading into another war crisis. Does Congress have no control over these agencies? Well, it must appropriate their running expenses, to be sure. But ask any candid Congressman how much control this is in actual practice. Ultimate power, of course, inheres in the President who sets up these agencies. To that extent, the growth of the authority of the regulatory agencies is a growth of White House authority. Working together, White House and alphabetical bodies constitute a government which is virtually independent of Congress.

What all this means is that the theory of the United States Government, as embedded in the Federal Constitution, is one thing; its actual working is something far different. As our drift into the conditions of a militarized state continues, this divergence will become ever more marked. Congress is headed toward becoming as vestigial as was the Roman Senate under the Caesars. Is there anything that can be done about it? Should the Constitution be rewritten to bring it into accord with the facts? Or should the two Houses of Congress be encouraged to stage more frequent uprisings against a White House and Pentagon grasping for power?

The first suggestion is academic; such a general rewriting of the Constitution is not politically possible. Besides, the Constitution as it stands, with its provisions for amendment, is a good constitution—as good as the Republic envisaged by the founding fathers requires. Congressional revolts can yield only sporadic and limited results; the general trend toward concentration of power in the Executive will go right on. It will go right on, we believe, because no genuine democratic control can be established over a militarized state, and that is what this Nation—driven by what we are told are ineluctable historic forces—is becoming. It is this progress toward militarization that the frustrated men on the Potomac are declaiming against on the floors of Congress, even though most of them do not realize it. Until this trend is reversed, Congress will continue to lose power, the White House and the Pentagon to gain it. And power once lost will never be regained without a terrific struggle, even should the tensions which are hastening our militarization be eased or pass away.

Wire Tap Bill Should Be Passed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Albany (N. Y.) Knickerbocker News.

The editorial follows:

KEATING BILL SHOULD PASS

A teapot tempest is still raging on the question of allowing the FBI to tap telephone conversations of suspected foreign agents.

With thousands of American boys already lying in Korean graves, we think it's high time to start helping instead of hindering the FBI. But many well-meaning persons still raise the bloody shirt of martyred civil liberties at such a suggestion.

Obviously, no sane person wants to start scrapping civil liberties wholesale. From Bunker Hill to Wonju our soldiers have fought to preserve a system of government whose core is the protection of the rights of the individual.

There are inconsistencies in the objections raised to FBI wire-tapping. For example, it's permissible for a FBI man to eavesdrop on a conversation in a restaurant, but he can't eavesdrop on a telephone conversation.

Police of many States can use wiretap evidence on minor crimes, but the FBI can't use it in efforts to guard our Government against enemy espionage.

Representative KEATING has introduced a bill to remedy the situation. By making permission of a Federal judge necessary for such wire-tapping, the bill attempts to protect the public against unwarranted invasion of its rights.

This long-overdue measure should be passed quickly.

The Crusade Against Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM BENTON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD the article by Mr. Elmer Davis in the current Harper's entitled "The Crusade Against Acheson."

In line with the customs of the Senate, and the senatorial courtesies around which these customs revolve, I have asked permission of Mr. Davis to make three deletions, a total of perhaps a hundred and fifty words, and these are indicated by asterisks.

Mr. President, America has no more distinguished journalist than Elmer Davis and few in Congress can know his handiwork, particularly his wartime handiwork with the OWI, as well as I. I congratulate him for the penetrating insight of this piece about our Secretary of State, Dean Acheson. I congratulate him for taking time from his tense and busy life to do such a piece—involving much travail and little pay—because his conscience drove him to it. Mr. Davis wrote it, I am sure, to help all of us to understand the great domestic fact of the present day, that we Americans are engaged in a cold civil war testing whether our nation, "so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure."

I submit this article for the RECORD not merely as tribute to Mr. Davis, and not merely because I am proud to take the floor of the Senate to endorse his happen to look it at a member of a congressional committee. It is not his fault that he looks like, and indeed is, a superior person; but that can be very annoying to Members of Congress.

Nevertheless, in his news conferences he displays more candor, and far more sense of humor, than any other Secretary of State within my recollection (which goes back 30-odd years). Once, I remember, when somebody asked him an embarrassing question, he remarked with a grin, "You wouldn't have known anything about that if I hadn't been silly enough to mention it last week." He seldom if ever takes the advice so lavishly given him by the pundits of the press, which may account for the crocodile tears which not long ago bedewed certain newspaper columns, whose writers sobbed that it was too bad—Acheson was a great statesman and a fine fellow, but he had lost the confidence of the country, so he would have to go.

Well, if you believe Dr. Gallup's not wholly infallible poll, he had lost the confidence of a majority of such citizens as had heard of him (about a third of them, in spite of all the uproar, had not); the big lie, repeated over and over, had done its work. The attack on Acheson was indeed only the major aspect of a campaign which included demands for either the resignation or the impeachment of the President; which included also the attack on General Marshall, disguised as an attack on Assistant Secretary Anna Rosenberg, who being a woman and a Jew looked like a safe preliminary target. Just possibly, this case marked the turn of the tide. The Senate committee which heard the charges against Mrs. Rosenberg not only unanimously cleared her, but sent the evidence it had heard to the Department of Justice for investigation of the perjury which somebody had obviously committed. Moreover, the Senator who was most irate over this outrageous attack was a conservative Republican, HARRY CAIN, and Mrs. Rosenberg's most energetic and effective defender, during the investigation, was a conservative newspaperman, Frederick Woltman of the Scripps-Howard papers. So maybe the distinction between truth and falsehood is again beginning to mean something.

How much the public cares, however, is still uncertain. Last fall a man named FRANK BOW, operating through a Senator (libel-proof, in a speech on the floor), attacked both the integrity and the loyalty of the Secretary of the Interior. Bow's sworn testimony before a Senate committee was contradicted by the sworn testimony of several other people; somebody was lying, and lying on oath. Secretary Chapman was completely exonerated; Senator O'MAHONEY said that Bow's charges were an infamous libel; Senator MURRAY said that a man like Bow should not be allowed to remain at large. So what happened to FRANK BOW? He was elected to Congress from Ohio, beating a good man.

Tacitus wrote that the civil wars of A. D. 69 had "divulged the secret of the Empire, that an Emperor could be made elsewhere than at Rome." Sometimes it seems that some of the performances of this past year have divulged the secret of the Republic—that while you may not be able to fool all of the people all of the time, you can fool enough of them enough of the time to gain your end. The ethics of this sort of thing require no comment, but I should think that at least some of the men who joined in the crusade against Acheson would be concerned about its intellectual implications. They must at least be smart enough to realize that similar tactics might some day be used against them, even if they are undisturbed over what they have done to the basic principles of American public life.

They were operating on the principle that there can be no such thing as an honest difference of opinion, that whoever disagreed with them must be a traitor. In a time of great international tension they had demanded the dismissal of the Secretary of State, just as he was about to start off for an international conference where important and controversial issues were to be decided; they proposed no alternative to his policy, or to him; they had made allegations against him which were utterly, and often ludicrously false; and but for the firmness of the President they would have got away with it.

This Nation was conceived in liberty and dedicated to the principle (among others) that honest men may honestly disagree on public issues; that if they all say what they think, a majority of the people will be able to distinguish truth from error; that in the competition in the market place of ideas, the sounder ideas will in the long run win out. Lately we have been engaged in a cold civil war—it was nothing less, in the year 1950—testing whether any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure.

Time will tell.

Some Aspects of the Veterans' Administration Medical Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an informative and interesting article, Some Aspects of the Veterans' Administration Medical Program, appearing in the November 1950, issue of Harvard Public Health Alumni Bulletin, written by Dr. Francis Brian Carroll, M. D.; D. M. D., Tufts College; M. D., University of Rochester; M. P. H., Harvard University; and since his discharge after World War II, area medical director, New England States, and New York State, Veterans' Administration.

The article follows:

Since 1946 there has been marked improvement in quality of medical care in the hospital program of the Veterans' Administration.

Much has been accomplished by emulating those procedures which have proved successful in civilian medical practice in our large university hospitals.

Veterans' Administration hospitals have become affiliated with medical schools. Residency training programs have been instituted under the sponsorship of deans' committees. Leading physicians in all of the medical and surgical specialties are utilized on a part-time basis as consultants and attending physicians. There has been a resultant elevation of the professional standards in Veterans' Administration hospitals.

Prior to World War II, the Veterans' Administration had considerable difficulty recruiting physicians because of the great disparity between salaries established by the Civil Service and the earnings of private practitioners in civilian life. Congress passed Public Law 293, which permitted the Veterans' Administration to hire medical personnel without reference to civil service rules and regulations. This has proved another important factor in enabling the Veterans' Administration to recruit competent medical staffs.

There has been a great increase in the amount of money spent for professional and other services, particularly for the use of diagnostic procedures and techniques requiring a large number of ancillary personnel. This has not only improved the quality of care, but has improved the efficiency of the entire program.

Individuals frequently ask why the Veterans' Administration does not contract for patient care in civilian hospitals. Actually, many veterans with service-connected disabilities are receiving care in civilian hospitals. Such an arrangement is made in emergencies when, because of the distance involved, it might be detrimental to transport the patient to a veterans' hospital.

Veterans' Administration hospitals were originally authorized because a grateful Nation recognized the debt which it owed to those who suffered disabilities in the service of their country.

At the present time there are two additional reasons why we must have so many Veterans' Administration hospitals: (1) Civilian hospitals do not have sufficient beds to handle the patient load, and (2) a large proportion of service-connected cases have disabilities which are chronic in nature and require long-term hospitalization. Private hospitals do not want this type of case.

Many people wonder why it is necessary to continue to build additional Veterans' Administration hospitals. This is readily understandable when one considers the potential load of veterans eligible for hospital benefits within the next 25 years.

A statistical summary released by the Veterans' Administration on January 31, 1950, showed there were 19,035,000 living veterans, of whom 15,313,000 served in World War II, the remainder in World War I and other wars. From this, one can appreciate the great reservoir of eligible veterans who will seek hospitalization within the next 25 years. It must also be realized that as the average age of the veteran increases, his need for hospitalization increases. Therefore, it can be safely estimated that the peak load will not be reached until after 1970. At that time one can envisage a need of 250,000 beds, by considering the demand for increasing hospitalization over the past years. The Veterans' Administration has reported that in 1930, approximately 10 years following World War I, there were 30,311 veterans hospitalized. They report the load in July 1945, just prior to the flow resulting from World War II, as 71,713. As of January 31, 1950, there were 112,332 Veterans' Administration patients in hospitals.

This situation requires long-range planning and does not lend itself to a vacillating policy of adopting each temporary expedient suggested by those well-meaning groups who are not always conversant with the facts.

Taxpayers rightfully wonder why the Veterans' Administration does not utilize Army or Navy hospitals, since they are closed, instead of building new hospitals. In some instances the Veterans' Administration has taken over these hospitals. In most instances, however, it is not feasible to do so. Many armed services hospitals are located in isolated areas where it would be impossible to arrange for an affiliation with a medical school, and it would be difficult to assemble a competent full-time professional staff. Many of these hospitals are of temporary construction, or at best, of semipermanent construction, with a resultant excessive cost for upkeep. Most of these hospitals are of the cantonment type with a horizontal layout. This type of hospital requires much more personnel to operate and, therefore, greatly increases operating expense. Thus, one can appreciate why the Veterans' Administration should studiously avoid acquiring the average Army or Navy hospital built during World War II.

It is true that the average length of patient stay in a veterans' hospital is greater than in most civilian hospitals. It must be borne never assent except under great pressure, but unquestionably they are the only conditions that would make the world safe for anybody but Communists; they are the objectives at which American foreign policy must aim if it is to make sense.

He has been damned for omitting Korea from our defense perimeter, in a speech last spring (also Formosa, but more of that later). But the Korean Republic had then been set up by the United Nations; the consequent withdrawal of the occupation troops was approved by American military opinion, which was then thinking in terms of global war and held that Korea could not be defended against massive attack except by the commitment of more troops than Korea was worth, on a global scale. Recent events suggest that this judgment was correct. But a very different situation arose on June 25 last; here was a local aggression of the kind with which we had become familiar in the thirties, and the melancholy history of that decade had taught us that the time to stop it was the first time. Every member of the National Security Council advised the President that we must go to Korea's defense, but Acheson seems to have been the most vigorous of them all. Furthermore Acheson, working through Warren Austin at Lake Success, spurred the United Nations to back us up. Their military aid, though minor, has not been negligible; and in the situation of last June the political and moral effect of their support was immense.

But that support could be given only thanks to the accident that the Russians were then boycotting the Security Council. When they rejoined it, it was obvious that they could stop any similar action in future. The result was the greatest of Acheson's achievements—the persuading of the United Nations Assembly to declare its own competence to act when the Security Council is paralyzed by the veto. As Vishinsky correctly (and furiously) declared, this was a complete change in the character of the United Nations. For the first time it became an organization which could really do something, even if a great power wanted it to do nothing. This was the most brilliant American diplomatic victory of many decades—and the best kind of diplomatic victory, won not by pressure but by persuasion, by convincing other nations that their interest was identical with ours.

The immediate practical value of this is uncertain, at this writing. Acheson gave the Assembly machinery but he could not give it guts; when the small aggression of June was overlaid by the big aggression of November, many members of the United Nations seemed to have no further ambition except to escape notice.

Similarly the value of the Atlantic Treaty is being undermined, at this writing, by our own defeatists; Acheson could not give them guts either. But the machinery is there, if men have the spirit to use it.

III

So McCarthy calls him the Red Dean of Washington; Jenner accuses him of a pro-Communist betrayal of the American people; and * * * men, who have repeated their story so often that they have come to believe it themselves, demand his dismissal on the ground that they have persuaded the people to lose confidence in him. The attack on Acheson, said John Dewey after the election, was a victory for the Communist cause that the rulers of Russia could not have obtained by any activity of their own. Why should men who presumably want to stop the Russians have tried to destroy the man who has done more to stop the Russians than anybody else?

Not on account of what seems to me Acheson's one serious failure, the mishandling of German rearmament. Granted that he was under pressure from the military, it was his business to resist that pressure if it threatened to get us into a situation where the Germans could demand a price for defending themselves instead of clamoring for the privilege. But his enemies have not attacked him on that account; most of them are all out for German rearmament, whether or not either the French or the Germans want it.

China, however, is another matter: American policy, highly successful in Europe, failed to prevent the Communist conquest of China. Whether any American policy, after 1945, could have saved China is open to question; especially if it entailed saving Chiang Kai-shek and the men around him. But a noisy, unscrupulous, and well financed lobby insists not only that it could have been done, but that anybody who doubts that it could have been done their way is a Communist; these people ask, "Can Chiang trust the United States?" And aside from these gentlemen (whose activities deserve a more thorough investigation than they are likely to get, in the present political climate) there are others, more respectable, in Congress and elsewhere, who honestly believe that China is more important to American interest than Europe; that we can afford to let France go but we must save Formosa; that Chiang Kai-shek is more deserving of support than Clement Attlee, and that it is our fault, not his, if he was unable to beat the Communists. The Washington Post observes that Chiang seems to have lost the mandate of heaven which traditionally entitled a Chinese ruler to his people's loyalty, but that he still has his mandate from the Republicans.

To men who feel that way, failure in China naturally outweighs all our successes in Europe. But Acheson's part in making our China policy was very small indeed. The Communist victory was completed after he became Secretary of State but the policy that failed to prevent it was an inheritance from his predecessors. It had begun to take shape in the days of Stettinius; it was formulated, after Byrnes had taken over, by men in the Far Eastern Division of the State Department, who passed it on up to their superiors. Acheson as Under Secretary gave it approval which was not indeed perfunctory, but was no more than the judgment of a man who was not an expert on China that so far as he could see it looked all right. Secretary Byrnes did the same; but not till it had been gone over with General Marshall, who was something of an expert on China. They all approved it; but the official responsibility lay with Secretary Byrnes, and he has never tried to evade it.

Acheson, however, is now blamed for it, and for other things for which he was even less responsible. If he had been forced out of office last December it would have been, above all, because he had publicly endorsed the opinions of Jesus Christ, and because the military hero of the opposition party lost a battle. A party has often gained advantage because its favorite general won a battle; but it took political genius—or something—for the Republicans to derive as much profit from MacArthur's defeat on the Chongchon River as the Whigs derived from Zachary Taylor's victory at Buena Vista.

The crusade against Acheson had, of course, long been going on, but many people thought that the accusations of appeasement or communism were only what Thurlow Weed once called "a good enough Morgan till after election."

And they might have died down, despite the persistent proddings of the China lobby, if the situation had remained as it was on November 25, when the Nation was warm with the certainty of victory in Korea. In September MacArthur had turned disaster into triumph; when he started his end-the-war offensive everybody in Washington was still so dazzled by the brilliant success of his Inchon operation that they were sure that he could bring it off again. If he had, if the Army had pushed on to the Yalu, the United Nations would not have dogged it when it came to a Korean settlement; and the most ingenious political malevolence could hardly have longer obscured the facts.

But MacArthur's attempt to repeat the tactics of Chancellorsville, on a grander scale, unfortunately ran into a Chinese general more enterprising than Joe Hooker. Thanks to able leadership and hard fighting (by Turks, British, and Koreans, as well as Americans) the army was extricated without disaster; still we had lost a battle and perhaps a campaign, and there had to be a scapegoat for this incredible peripety. But it is a dogma of the Republican faith that MacArthur cannot lose a battle; since a battle had been lost, it must have been Acheson who lost it; it was his fault that the Chinese Communists were in Korea, or, indeed that they existed at all.

But, of course, the thing that more than anything else laid him open to attack was his famous refusal to turn his back on Alger Hiss. Let it be noted, by the way, that Hiss was never an important figure in the State Department. He was a rising young man, a useful technician; but that he ever made policy, at Yalta or anywhere else, is pure (or rather impure) myth. He was, however, a friend of Acheson, who has said that his friendship is not lightly given, and he had been convicted of a gross breach of public trust. What should a statesman say in such a case? Most men would have followed what Acheson later called "the counsels of discretion and cowardice," and taken the out of declining to comment on a case which had been appealed; but he chose not to have to remember, the rest of his life, that he had run away from "a disagreeable and dangerous decision."

What he did say meant simply that he didn't like to kick a man who was down; and if he had said just that he would have got into little trouble. Not that Acheson's enemies have any objection to kicking a man who is down; it is safer than kicking him when he is standing up; but phrased in those words, it could hardly be made popular. But Acheson made the mistake, natural perhaps to a bishop's son and a practicing Christian, of quoting some apposite but lengthy observations by the Saviour of mankind; and then they had him. He was a protector of Communists (though all the efforts of McCarthy and his gang have failed to prove that there is a single Communist in the State Department).

IV

The Hiss episode moved James Reston, of the New York Times to write that Acheson "seems to lack the gift, absolutely essential in a Secretary of State, of foreseeing how his remarks will look in tomorrow morning's newspapers." Yet they often look pretty good, if not tomorrow morning at least next week. He was denounced for insulting and misrepresenting Senator Taft in his comments on reexaminists; yet it presently turned out that what Taft meant was just about what Acheson thought he meant. (At least, what Taft means on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays; he seems to spend Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays reexamining and contradicting his own remarks of the day before.)

When Mr. Burt Shotton, who as manager of the Brooklyn Dodgers had won two pennants in 3 years and kept his team in the running till the last game in the third, was rewarded by being fired, Red Smith, of the New York Herald Tribune observed that he had made two major mistakes in public relations: he had neglected to acknowledge the superior wisdom of some inmates of the press box, and when he was asked a stupid question he yielded to the impulse to reply, "That is a stupid question." I have never heard Acheson say that, though he sometimes looks it; and to look it can be more withering—and more unfortunate, if you

Federal Social Security Act in such a manner that State legislative bodies desiring to do so would be permitted to remove restrictions in State laws concealing the identity of public assistance recipients and to provide that a list of the names of all recipients of assistance be available for public inspection in a proper public office; and be it further

India Can and Should Pay

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, in our natural and commendable impulse to help hungry people in India, we should not, I think, overlook the fact that India is rich in assets and has the ultimate capacity to pay us for the wheat we propose to send her either in money or commodities that we need. I am not concerned with the terms of such payment and would be content if they were most conveniently arranged; but pay they certainly can, and pay they certainly should.

There is grave question of our right as representatives of the people to give away their money. Our own individual and private charities are one thing, but to be charitable with the money of other people is something else.

I am including the following interesting editorial from the Bridgeton (N. J.) Evening News entitled "Let India Pay":

LET INDIA PAY

India wanted this country to give her 200,000,000 tons of wheat because she said she had a crop failure of wheat in that country last year, and there were a lot of people in this country, including Mr. Harry Truman and a lot of Government officials, who immediately jumped up and said, "Why certainly, give India the wheat she needs to keep her people from starving. We have never turned down a humanitarian call. Because India's representative in the United Nations took sides against us and spoke harshly about us is no reason for refusing aid to starving people."

That is all very true, but those people, including the President, himself, did not know all the facts in the case nor did they stop to find out before they raised the humanitarian cry.

Yes, India had a short wheat crop, not because of a wheat failure, but because India had shifted large areas of wheat land to jute and other crops that were more profitable and furnished labor to industrial workers. Neither was India unable to secure wheat because there was none near at hand. Her adjoining little republic has millions of bushels of wheat for sale, which would have filled a large part of India's needs, the transportation on which would be much cheaper than that on wheat shipped from this country. Nor was India unable to pay for at least a part of the wheat shipped from this country, for the Indian Government has money.

India has valuable deposits of minerals which we use in the manufacture of steel and the atomic bomb but of which we have none and must import, which could have been traded for wheat or at least for some of it, but no such offer was ever made, the Indian officials seeming to think that the United States was a sucker and a good subject to bleed for a good lot of wheat by the humanitarian route and perhaps they were unaware that Uncle Sam did not grow this wheat, but paid a big price for it and taxed the people's bread as well as their pocketbook to pay for it.

Be this picture as it may, the House of Representatives has taken a hard-hearted view of the application, opposing passage of the bill as at present constituted and the House Rules Committee has it bottled up refusing to permit it to reach the floor and, even though it was released, it would fall of passage by the House.

If the people of India are shown to be suffering from famine, Congress will aid them but their need must be presented in a different light from that now shown.

This country cannot carry the whole world on its shoulders even though a lot of Washington officials, including Mr. Truman, think it can.

Time to Ring Down Curtain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM K. VAN PELT
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. VAN PELT. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Fond du Lac Commonwealth Reporter. This editorial, entitled "Time To Ring Down Curtain," is indeed timely and expresses the views of the people in my district regarding the incompetence of many of the administration's appointments. They realize we cannot long survive under the bureaucratic form of Government and want the constitutional rights of Congress returned from the executive branch of the Government. They want their elected representatives to represent them at all times and not be governed by the mandates handed down by men and women appointed by the President.

TIME TO RING DOWN CURTAIN

It seemed fair to hold off conclusive judgment about the RFC until the Senate's inquiry was well advanced. That stage has now been reached. And the findings point to just one sensible course: The abolition of the RFC.

As everyone knows, Herbert Hoover created RFC as a depression emergency device to help keep tottering big business going in the dark days. It was never contemplated that the agency should go permanently into the banking business in competition with our private banking system.

But that is in fact exactly what happened. More than that, the RFC became a sort of court of last resort to which business firms appealed after all regular banks had turned a deaf ear. Many such concerns were granted loans, in defiance of what private bankers considered sound lending practice.

No doubt this greater liberality often had beneficial results, but that cannot be allowed to obscure the essential that the RFC was serving as a vast commercial bank. On several occasions, indeed, the RFC's well known liberality enabled private banks to transfer to that agency outstanding loans the banks rated as poor risks.

The private banking system is perfectly qualified, except perhaps in extreme emergencies, to meet all the credit needs of the expanding United States economy. There is no point in having the Government competing in this field.

But as it has developed in the capital, the issue goes well beyond the economic justifications for keeping or abolishing the RFC. Basically the problem has become a moral one.

What the investigation of Senator Fulbright's subcommittee has disclosed is a supreme example of the folly of government by crony—cronyism, as some have styled it.

Too often President Truman has placed in key Government office not the most fit men, nor even well-qualified men, but simply men he knew and liked. He frequently complains that he cannot attract competent men to many important posts, but the record indicates he at numerous times went out of his way to assure such jobs to his friends.

It is the thoughtful testimony of several seasoned Washington observers that Mr. Truman has thereby permitted a host of Federal commissions and bureaus to deteriorate dangerously. The Civil Aeronautics Board, the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, these are among them.

Worse than this, the President has maintained an almost fanatical loyalty to his cronies holding these jobs. Loyalty is a noble trait, and it isn't the only one the American people admire in Mr. Truman. But loyalty to incompetent men—friends or not—is misplaced. The President would do much better to be loyal to high standards of performance.

Moreover, this attitude has been aggravated by his insistence upon regarding every attack upon a subordinate as fundamentally an assault upon him as President. Thus he has tended to discount the criticisms as always political, never sincere.

Senator FULBRIGHT may not be without political motive, but the facts unearthed by his committee cannot be brushed off as campaign fantasies. The expensive mink coat given to a White House secretary, the free vacations for White House functionaries (and Senators, too, for that matter) at the expense of a Florida hotel manager who won an RFC loan, the innumerable payoffs through awards of high-salaried business jobs to former RFC men, these compound into a sordid, immoral story.

Apparently only the strongest men, administrators like Jesse Jones and Eugene Meyer, can keep a government lending agency from sinking into the morass of loans-by-political-favor. Establish an institution dealing in billions—passed out on fairly easy terms—and you have a set-up ideally suited to political machinations. Flies always collect around the honey pot.

The result is not only a weakening of the RFC itself, but a general lowering of moral behavior in many parts of the Administration, in Congress, and elsewhere.

Mr. Hoover, Jesse Jones, and others have called for RFC's demise. To abolish the agency would be to set an example, to start Government back up the road to sound moral performance.

in mind that veterans' hospitals have many more chronic patients which accounts for a greater average length of hospital stay. But the patient stay is also longer in Veterans' Administration hospitals than in civilian hospitals if one compares only the patients who remain less than 30 days. There is a simple explanation for this which is not generally appreciated by the public. In civilian practice a patient usually visits his physician's office where a careful history is taken and a physical examination made. In some instances special examinations such as chest X-rays are taken and gastrointestinal studies are performed on an outpatient basis. In many instances surgical patients have had all except the immediate preoperative studies completed prior to hospitalization for an operation. Also following an operation, the patient is discharged home at an early date for further follow-up at home by the family physician. This is not usually possible with veterans because only those with service-connected disabilities are eligible for outpatient care at Government expense.

Accordingly, when the average veteran enters the hospital, he receives a complete work-up preoperatively and remains at the hospital, in most instances, until he is fully recovered.

There is no denying the fact that a patient who is paying for his own hospitalization is anxious to be discharged as soon as possible. It is claimed that this incentive is not present in the case of the average veteran. This may be true in isolated instances but the Veterans' Administration does not concur in the belief that this is a factor of major importance. The cost of hospitalization is but one of the many factors which affect a patient while he is hospitalized. In many cases he is faced with loss of income, interruption of schooling, and separation from his family. Any one or a combination of these factors would offer an impelling reason why he would want to be discharged from the hospital at the earliest possible date.

Any assumption, based on the length of hospital stay, that it takes longer, for example, to complete a gastrointestinal series or to recover from a major operation in a Veterans' Administration hospital than in a civilian hospital is entirely erroneous.

It is well recognized that the type of medical care afforded in Veterans' Administration hospitals affiliated with medical schools is on a par with that provided in the best civilian hospitals. Veterans' Administration hospitals are not only staffed by eminent physicians, but also by experts in all the allied medical specialties. They are equipped with the finest equipment available to enable these highly specialized individuals to carry out their diversified and complicated techniques.

Once a patient has been admitted to a VA hospital, irrespective of whether the veteran has established service connection, there can be but one standard of medical care—the best possible.

Inasmuch as the greatest demand for beds is for neuropsychiatric patients, coupled with the fact that the VA has a limited number of neuropsychiatric beds available at the present time, it has been necessary to utilize these beds to the greatest advantage. To this end, mental hygiene clinics attempt to handle as many psychoneurotic and mild psychotic patients as possible, thus decreasing need for hospitalization. In VA neuropsychiatric hospitals, intensive therapy is utilized in an effort to treat effectively and discharge incumbents to make room for others needing treatment.

Applications for admission to tuberculosis hospitals operated by the Veterans' Administration are far in excess of the number of beds available for tuberculosis patients. To meet this situation, the Veterans' Administration has made arrangements for hospitalization of service-connected veterans at Government expense in practically every State, county, or municipal sanatorium in this country. Building plans call for the construction of more tuberculosis hospitals. In the meantime, the Veterans' Administration is converting some general medical and surgical hospitals to tuberculosis. They are also utilizing sections in their general hospitals for tuberculosis cases. For the past 2 years, in approximately 25 of the Veterans' Administration tuberculosis hospitals throughout the country, one of the largest and best controlled studies in the use of streptomycin in the treatment of tuberculosis cases has been carried out. All tuberculosis-psychotic patients in Veterans' Administration neuropsychiatric hospitals have been isolated and are cared for in separate buildings. Aseptic technique has been established in all of the tuberculosis hospitals. The Veterans' Administration has adopted the procedure of oiling blankets, bed linen, and floors in their tuberculosis hospitals, in order to prevent dust and hence tubercle bacilli, from circulating. The policy of giving B. C. G. vaccine to tuberculin negative doctors, nurses, and food attendants has been considered, but has not been adopted to date. Tuberculosis registers have been established and will be maintained locally in cooperation with State health departments.

Future planning calls for 1,000-bed construction projects predominantly for neuropsychiatric patients but to include separate 250-bed medical and surgical buildings. The general medical and surgical unit will take care of general medical and surgical admissions from the surrounding area, as well as the intercurrent illness of patients in the neuropsychiatric units.

Future 1,000-bed hospitals primarily for general medical and surgical patients will have neuropsychiatric units of approximately 250 beds.

Domiciliary homes are operated to care for those veterans who are able to work for a few hours a day, and who need a minimum amount of professional care. This enables the Veterans' Administration to utilize the limited number of hospital beds in their general hospitals to the greatest advantage.

Any widespread notion that the Veterans' Administration operates independently or arbitrarily without the advice and assistance of the medical profession, as a whole, is grossly erroneous.

A group of national consultants representing all of the medical and surgical specialties, meet approximately every 2 months at the Veterans' Administration central office, Washington, D. C., to review the program and recommend changes for its improvement to the Chief Medical Director and his staff. Dr. James Stevens Simmons, dean, Harvard School of Public Health, is one of the most active members of this group and has contributed a great deal toward its success.

There are six area offices located throughout the country, charged with the responsibility of supervising the operation of the medical program. In addition to a full-time staff, three area offices utilize the services of consultants in all of the medical specialties. The Boston area office has responsibility for supervision of all Veterans' Administration hospitals and out-patient medical clinics in the New England States and in New York State, where there is a total of 29 installations. There are 59 area medical consultants in the various specialties attached to the Boston area, who make periodic surveys of the activities in their respective specialties in the VA installations in this area, and make recommendations for improvement.

At VA hospitals, another group of consultant and attending physicians render direct service in the hospitals, making ward rounds, performing operations, and participating in the training of residents.

Our regional office medical clinics authorize treatment of service-connected cases by private practitioners of medicine on a fee basis. This enables the veteran to have free choice of a physician approved by the State medical society, either as a general practitioner or as a specialist.

It would be difficult to conceive of any medical program with more active participation of specialists and private practitioners in medicine, than that which now exists in the medical program of the Veterans' Administration.

Social Security Amendments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the following Senate resolution passed by the Sixty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Illinois recommending amendments to the Social Security Act:

Whereas the Congress of United States by amendment to the Federal Social Security Act has provided that information and records concerning applicants for and recipients of assistance under public-assistance programs operated by the various States in conjunction with the Federal Government under provisions of the Social Security Act shall be limited to purposes directly connected with the administration of these programs; and

Whereas this injunction of secrecy imposed on the States by said amendment to the Federal Social Security Act is a matter which causes great public concern, and is directly responsible for numerous injustices, abuses, and fraud by permitting many individuals not actually in need to receive assistance and to escape detection because of the stringent regulations guarding the names of recipients of public assistance, thus creating dissatisfaction with the public welfare program in many communities of the State; and

Whereas said secrecy provision violates the fundamental principle that any expenditure of public funds should be subject to public audit; and

Whereas members of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois repeatedly have expressed themselves as favoring an amendment to the "Public Assistance Code of Illinois" which would make available to public inspection and sound use a list of names of all recipients of public assistance in each county of the State, only to be advised that such an action would be in conflict with the Federal Social Security Act and would result in loss of Federal funds for public assistance purposes; and

Whereas the so-called Federal funds were collected from the taxpayers of Illinois to the extent of almost $3,340,000,000 during the last fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, while less than $3 out of every $100 collected from the people of Illinois was returned to the State of Illinois in so-called Federal aid for all purposes: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Sixty-seventh General Assembly of the State of Illinois, That we go on record as recommending to the Congress of the United States that legislation be enacted at the earliest possible date amending pertinent sections of the

In a free world one can make no sweeping promises because people can come and go, and see for themselves. One can never claim that everything is, or will be, perfect for everybody, everywhere, at exactly the same time. But one can see with his own eyes that in most areas where true political and economic democracy is practiced, things are getting better; the direction is up. And it is the direction which counts.

CONTINUOUS IMPROVEMENT

How shall we describe this system—imperfect, but always improving, and always capable of further improvement—where men move forward freely together, working together, building together, producing always more and more, and sharing together the rewards of their increased production? Capitalism is no longer the right word. In too many minds it stands for the primitive economic system of the nineteenth century when, all too often, employers were greedy and workers were oppressed. We need a new name to describe the new, expanding, and ever-self-renewing system. What shall it be? I have heard various suggestions. Here are a few of the best:

"The new capitalism; democratic capitalism; economic democracy; industrial democracy; distribution; mutualism; productivism."

All have their points. All help catch and express the idea, or parts of it. But might there be something better? Some word which will catch hold and slip automatically into the language, giving that sense of birth, hope, promise, and everlasting pushing forward which is the essence of every society of free men?

If we find the right word it will help things fall into perspective. Gradually, throughout the world, the word "communism" will sink and dwindle to its true level, standing not for progress but reaction, not freedom but slavery, not comfort but miserable and abject poverty and fear.

The fact that no new name has yet been found shows that the problem is not easy. Perhaps we must still go through more years of effort and growth before the right word emerges. But some of This Week's 10,000,000 reader-families may come up with suggestions to push us further along the road. If so, they will have played their part in the battle for the minds of men.

St. Patrick's Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, St. Patrick was a slave in his youth and a bishop when he died, March 17, many, many years ago. St. Patrick was born in Britain around the year 380. The stories of his life state that when St. Patrick was 16, he was taken captive by a band of Irish marauders. For 6 years he worked as a slave for an Irish chieftain. While in Ireland he learned a great deal about the people—their languages, their emotions, and their character. He managed to make his escape and returned to England.

It was there that he decided to enter the church. After 14 years of study and preparation, he was ordained a priest.

In 432, St. Patrick returned to Ireland as a missionary. During his work there he founded over 350 churches, ordained many priests and baptized thousands of people. The flame which he lighted on the Hill of Tara was spread until there is a flame burning in the heart of each Irishman all over the world. When he died, sometime around 460, it is said that there was no night for 12 days.

St. Patrick was a man of very strong will power and considerable executive ability. There is no doubt about his competence as an organizer; he was a man of tireless action and enthusiasm. St. Patrick had great influence on the Irish mind and Celtic imagination—striking examples of these are the picturesque legends about his miraculous deeds which have sprung up in each locality of Ireland. One such story concerns the shamrock; it is esteemed today because St. Patrick purportedly used its three leaves on one stem to illustrate the principle of the Holy Trinity.

St. Patrick taught the Irish that God created man free, that God bestowed on every man a free will and gave each man the responsibility for the proper exercise of this free will. From this teaching, the Irish have developed an emotional trait which makes them more than ready to defend the principles of freedom and tolerance.

In the third stanza of "The Wearing of the Green" there is the following passage:

I've heard a whisper of a country
That lies beyond the sea,
Where rich and poor stand equal
In the light of freedom's day.
O Erin, must we leave you,
Driven by a tyrant's hand?
Must we ask a mother's blessing
From a strange and distant land?

Could that country have been America? At any rate, the Irish came here bringing their crafts and skills; they led in the clamor for freedom of religion, speech, and assembly. America was pleased to welcome its Irish friends and it has profited from their arrival.

The "fighting Irish" fight because they love. And as Monsignor Sheen once stated, "since an Irishman loves more than anyone else, he fights more than anyone else." Many of the Revolutionary troops were Irish—they were determined to see the fight through to its glorious end. There was Gen. Henry Knox, from New Derry, who fought in every battle of the war. He became the Secretary of War in Washington's first cabinet. Then there were Gen. Andrew Lewis, born in Donegal; Gen. Dan Morgan; Gen. Walter Stewart, from Derry; Gen. Ephraim Blaine, Washington's quartermaster; Gen. Andrew Pickens; Gen. Joseph Reid; Gen. William Maxwell; Gen. Richard Montgomery, who captured Fort John, Fort Chambly, and stormed Montreal; and many other gallant Irish fighters. Also one must not forget the "Father of the American Navy," Capt. John Barry.

The Irish helped in peaceful battles also; among the Irish signing our great Declaration of Independence were Robert Paine, Thomas McKean, Matthew Thornton, George Taylor, and Edward Rutledge. Also important in that great signing was Charles Thompson, from Maghera, who was the perpetual secretary of the Continental Congress.

For a good many years, the wandering Irish schoolteachers had most of the responsibility for the education in America.

The War of 1812 brought forth Gen. George Croghan; a monument in his honor was built in Savannah, Ga. Also participating in that war was Gen. Andrew Jackson, who later became President of these United States.

During the late unpleasantness of the 1860's the Irish, too, were often divided in their allegiance. On the Confederate side, there were Postmaster General John H. Reagan, Gen. "Pat" Cleburne, and Gen. Joseph Finnegan. On the Union side were Generals Philip Sheridan, Patrick Francis Meagher, and Philip Kearney. Michael Corcoran also supported the "Blues."

World War II heroes of Irish descent are still familiar names to us all—Capt. Colin Kelly, the hero of Pearl Harbor; the five Sullivan brothers; and Father Duffy, the fighting chaplain. It is even said that among Britain's heroes of the Second World War are two Irishmen, Pat Finucane and Viscount Montgomery.

Many more Irish names can be added to our roll of "Americans of Irish descent who have made valuable contributions to our country," Horace Greeley, the founder of the New York Tribune; the Armours of Chicago; Robert Fulton, inventor of the steamboat; Cyrus Hall McCormick; the second Chief Justice, John Rutledge; John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, Secretary of State and Vice President in 1825; Alfred E. Smith, Governor of New York; Samuel Morse, the inventor of electric telegraphy; James F. Byrnes, now Governor of South Carolina; Supreme Court Justice Frank Murphy. From the artistic approach, there are Augustus St. Gaudens, the sculptor; William Corcoran, who supplied Washington's Corcoran Art Gallery; James McNeill Whistler, the artist; composers such as Edward McDowell, Victor Herbert, and Stephen Foster; and poets such as James Whitcomb Riley, Joyce Kilmer, Padraic Colum, and Edna St. Vincent Millay.

Is there any wonder why the Irish celebrate so on the 17th of March? They are proud, and rightfully so, of their heritage. And America is proud of their support and contributions. We salute the Irish, not only on this day, but every day of the year.

No Communist Can Halt My Efforts in the Interest of Home-Front Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, in their insane zeal to sabotage the efforts of your Congressman, some Communists often shoot beyond their first target and hit their ultimate bullseye, that of wrecking our civilian defense.

This fifth-column operation is best described by the recent action of a floater who went all out to smear a proposal because the man he hates most made it.

I refer to the Hall measure which extends the franking privilege to New York State civilian defense authorities and makes available the use of free mail in the organization of our local defense.

No Communist wants American homes or firesides to be safe. No left-winger wants anything but chaos on the home front.

So it is a clever, if not patriotic, excuse on the part of any punk who might be passing through, yet claiming to be a constituent and thereby seeming to make himself immune, to strike out at your Congressman when he proposes something in the interest of local civilian defense.

For such a troublemaker's information, I will say the proposal was not mine, but that it was made to me by the New York State Commission of Civilian Defense.

The appearance of my name as author of a bill invariably infuriates any Commie and throws him into a double lather when he learns such a bill is in the cause of defending our Nation.

That is why your Congressman has had to bear the most inhuman, unholy, and un-American attacks in his determination to fight for the welfare of the Americans of his district.

No; this was not my idea. But it is a good one and since it will stimulate, increase, and materially assist the work of Broome County's civilian defense, as well as the whole State's, I intend to press for its passage.

I will not be deterred by the smears of any Communist in pushing such a worthy cause.

Wanted: A New Name for Capitalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. C. GATHINGS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by William I. Nichols, from This Week magazine:

The redefinition of just one word could help change history.

Finding a new term to express a new idea could be a decisive factor in checking the world spread of communism.

This is the report that comes back again and again from men and women who are engaged in the struggle of ideas between the free world and the Soviets.

The word is "capitalism."

It is the term used over and over by the Soviets as a smear word to describe our side; and, so far as that goes, Americans generally use it themselves when they try to describe their economic system. But in fact, and on both sides of the iron curtain, it is a misleading word because, when applied to America, it no longer fits the system it pretends to describe.

What is worse, to many people it carries negative overtones of old errors and old abuses. In no way does it imply the positive, dynamic, expanding system of today, constantly changing, but always moving toward one goal—to create more goods and greater well-being for more people.

Recently, a top official in our overseas information program put it this way: "In all propaganda broadcasts now, the two words which appear most frequently are 'communism' and 'capitalism.' I don't think we have half as much trouble with the word 'communism' as we do with 'capitalism.' It's relatively easy to expose the bad side of communism and make it stick—so much so that when you say 'communism' and 'Red fascism' most people know you're talking about one and the same thing.

"But," he went on, "it's nowhere near as easy to make the good side of our society plain by using the word 'capitalism.' That's important. We need a word to make people realize that the real source of hope, progress, and prosperity rests with us."

The same thought has been expressed again and again by America's business leaders. "We only muddle our own thinking," they say, "when we use old words to describe new ideas."

To understand the problem, let's look back a bit. The word "capitalism" came into being well over 100 years ago in the early days of the industrial revolution. At that time the basis of wealth shifted from land to money (that is, capital) invested in industrial and commercial ventures. Admittedly, during those years there were many abuses, errors, and mistakes.

If you have read the novels of Charles Dickens—written 100 years ago—or the story of America's "Robber Barons" in the 1890's, you know what they were. There is no denying that capitalism's primitive period contains many dark chapters of worker exploitation at home, and colonial expansion abroad.

WE'VE CHANGED

All those memories are contained in the word "capitalism." The Communists are clever enough to seize upon that fact. Hence their use of the word "capitalist" as a dirty name, a smear word, for every aspect of our Western civilization.

But what about us? Are we so stupid as to let them get away with it? In the face of their repressive, regressive slave system, we stand for bold and imaginative society which has changed, developed, and improved with the years. Are we imaginative enough to find a word for it?

Anyone who has eyes and looks around him knows how conditions today differ from those of 50 or 100 years ago. Here, for example, are 10 points based in large part on a listing recently prepared by Edward J. Meeman, editor of the Memphis Press-Scimitar:

1. Slavery, which antedates capitalism, has been abolished in all capitalist countries. In fact, and ironically, it is now practiced primarily in Communist countries, and on a wider scale than ever before in history.

2. In its early days capitalism exploited the labor of women and children. This has nearly been abolished.

3. Capitalism once imposed overlong hours. These are now short, and growing shorter.

4. The standard of living under capitalism has steadily risen. This is exactly contrary to Marx's prediction—and to the record on Communist countries.

5. Unemployment has been reduced and controlled and is now a diminishing problem.

6. The adulteration and misbranding of products have almost been eliminated.

7. Early capitalist employers cared little about the health and safety of their workers. Today industrial safety has been carried to such a point that more accidents occur in our homes than in factories, offices, and stores.

8. The slogan of capitalism once was "The public be damned." Today all progressive companies know the importance of public opinion and public relations have become an essential part of management.

9. Capitalism formerly produced crowded, unsanitary slums. Now employers know the value of better living conditions, and work for them.

10. Imperialist wars were once waged by capitalists and colonial rule imposed on foreign peoples. Now country after country has given up its colonies.

That is a pretty impressive list of differences between "then" and "now." And the process is still going on. Up to the time of emergency controls (a result of Communist aggression, by the way) company after company was developing new plans for bonuses, pensions, incentive wages, cost-of-living wage raises, profit-sharing, and other procedures.

In one form or another all these methods are designed to give more and more people an increasing share of production, whether in the form of higher wages, shorter hours, lower prices, or better goods and services.

Most of us in America know all these facts. We know what our "new capitalism" is producing for us and what it can produce anywhere if given a fair chance. But hundreds of millions of people throughout the world don't know this. We must find some way to make clear in their minds the distinction between (1) our system and the capitalism of the past and, (2) between our system and capitalism as it is practiced in some other parts of the world. Unfortunately there are still areas where capitalism operates in the old, primitive way, and a capitalist is regarded as a member of a privileged upper group who dodges taxes, exploits his workers, and overcharges his customers.

EUROPE'S VIEW

As was pointed out recently by French-American writer, Lewis Galantière, the average European "judges our capitalism in the light of what he knows about his own, and we have allowed him to remain in profound ignorance of the differences between the two."

A new name for our system would help make the distinctions clear. It would revive hope among the underprivileged. And at the same time it would be a spur toward more enlightened action by old-fashioned capitalists wherever they may be.

Up to now communism has claimed that it held out the only promise for a better future. But as soon as communism takes over, the promises are forgotten. Then the iron curtain falls, the security police move in, the gates of the slave-labor camps swing open, and another helpless nation is trapped.

RFC: Relatives, Friends, and Contributors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, relatives, friends, contributors, we will lend up to our ears. This clumsy paraphrase of the classic Shakespearian quotation attributed to the Honorable Mark Antony, himself no mean politician of the first century B. C., must have been the motto of the RFC in its dealings on private loan applications. Whatever may be the validity of the RFC as a lending agency in connection with such projects as public utility operation by local governments, the fact is that in its operations as a lender to private corporations and individuals, the RFC has become a stench in the public nostrils.

Something more is required of a public agency than the "morals of the market place." To argue that a loan is "proper" because it violates no law, when the fact is that such a loan has been influenced by personal considerations, such as family relationships, free hotel accommodations, mink coats, and maybe other things as well, is to mock at the law and its spirit.

The private lending facilities of RFC ought to be closed down at once. Anyone who wants a loan today for private ventures can obtain a loan through banks or insurance companies, if the proposal is worth a bean. If it is not, he should not be getting it from Uncle Sam either.

Questions and Answers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 1, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, on top of the RFC business and the Mississippi job-buying charges directed against the Administration, comes another bit of shenanigans to look into.

Just how did it happen that a chap out in Salt Lake City named Walter V. Pace, a meat-market owner, manage to drop into South Carolina last November to pick up options on land which he shortly sold to our Government for hydrogen-bomb plant development at a near profit of $76,000? Mr. Pace says that it just "happened." The Governor of South Carolina says that he would regard it as somewhat "unusual" if a man in South Carolina got an option on some land in Utah the day before an announcement that an atomic-bomb plant would be built.

Big question is: Did anybody in Washington or anywhere else connected with the atomic-bomb project tip Mr. Pace or some associate off to the pending announcement, and if so, who did and who profited? So far, nobody has done much talking. But you cannot stop us from thinking.

Whose Government Is This?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 6, 1951

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the Government in Washington is supposed to be your Government. Is it doing what you want it to do?

Your Government, as Lincoln put it, is supposed to be "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Yet, without any action by you—the people—or by your Representatives in the Congress, your Government is at war in Korea. Your Government is making preparations for war in Europe and elsewhere.

You are told that the military campaign in Korea is a police action b, the United Nations. But you know it is war. You know that your sons, husbands, fathers—American boys—are fighting and dying in the frozen jungles of a foreign country halfway around the world. This is world war III. This world war may destroy your Government. It certainly will give you a dictatorship while it lasts and, when over, a depression the like of which this country has never experienced.

You are told that your Government's participation is necessary; that we must fight the world-wide menace of communism. But your Government is not fighting communism. The United Nations is not fighting communism.

General MacArthur, who is leading your sons in battle, is being prevented by the United Nations, and by your State Department, from fighting communism.

General MacArthur is not permitted to attack the Communist enemy wherever he may be. He may not employ intelligence or aerial reconnaissance to protect his soldiers unless the Communist enemy is actually upon him. He is forbidden to bomb Communist supply lines until it is too late. He may not employ an offensive against the Communist enemy on the enemy's territory. He is forbidden to organize for guerrilla warfare in the Communist enemy's rear.

Your Government is sending your boys to their fate blindfolded, and with one arm tied behind their backs. To all intents and purposes, in one way the United Nations is actually protecting the Communist enemy, and your State Department is backing the United Nations.

Your Seventh Fleet is protecting the Communists from attack by the Chinese anti-Communists, and it is keeping the ports of Red China open to receive matériel of war with which the Communists are killing your boys.

Your Government is spending your money to make war matériel available to its so-called friends and allies in the United Nations, who, in turn, are selling it to the Communists—in effect, trading with the enemy—your enemy. Trading with the enemy, under the laws and Constitution of the United States, is treason. We should not permit treason.

It is an outrage to pretend to fight communism in the Far East, or to prepare to fight communism in Europe, when our internal Communist problem is ignored. The place to start fighting communism is in Washington, where, during the past two administrations, Communists have been cultivated and coddled and where, even now, they are still being defended and protected. Actions speak louder than words.

The Government in Washington is supposed to be your Government. But, unless you assert yourself; unless you make your will known by writing the President, the Secretary of State, your Senators and Representatives in Congress who favor spending, sending troops to Europe, and unless you nominate and elect fearless, forthright men to run your Government, you will continue to be misrepresented; your Government may perish from the earth.

State-wide spring elections in Michigan are on Monday, April 2.

American Peace Poll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAMUEL W. YORTY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. YORTY. Mr. Speaker, on two occasions, February 12, 1951, and February 26, 1951, I called the attention of the House to the current Communist phony peace offensive, under the guise of which, Communist propaganda is being spread throughout the Nation. The American press, as usual, is doing a fine public service by publicizing the fact that these Communist groups are not really interested in peace, but are, rather, interested in seeing the United States weak and Russia strong. For the benefit of the Members, I am including in the RECORD at this point, an excellent article by Mr. Ernest Brashear. The article appeared in the Los Angeles Daily News on March 9, 1951. The article follows:

(By Ernest Brashear)

The comrades are at it again.

Last time it was the Stockholm peace petition that made a phony plea for peace in the same paragraph that said America would be a war criminal if it dropped an atom bomb on Russia, even if Russia was the aggressor.

Now it's America's Peace Poll, which follows the same line—the Moscow line.

We all want peace, and when somebody walks up to us with a slip of paper and says, "Do you want to sign for peace?" you'll probably say "yes," and put down your name.

Then you'll turn in the ballot and go about your business feeling you've done a pretty good deed.

honor St. Patrick. They give thanks to God for him, for St. Patrick who brought the faith to Erin.

The conversion of Ireland to the Christian religion was one of the most dramatic and miraculous events in the history of Europe. They have "kept the faith" in the face of diabolical persecution.

Today more than ever the world needs Ireland. As an American of Irish descent I ask the people of the United States and the world to take cognizance of Irish history in the face of world crisis.

As an American I am proud of my country and more devoted to her than to Ireland, but I love and cherish Ireland for her devotion to the truth and to the faith, for her sacrifices to save principle. We Americans all need faith, not only faith in God but faith in our fellowman. We must have hope—hope in the United States. We must be a land of religion, a land of racial harmony, a land of people devoted to family life if we are to survive the aggression of godless Russia.

The United States is the last bulwark of the free world. Her destiny is at stake. She, too, needs prayer—prayer for the will, the leadership, the faith, the hope to uphold the principles of the free world.

To speak of Ireland is to call to mind the kings of Tara's Hill, or Brian Boru and the Battle of Clontarf. Shall we talk of the Book of Kells, the Cells of the Monks, and the learning of the scholars of old? A prayerful tribute could be paid to the memory of Patrick, Bridget, Malachy, and many more. All this could we do. Or shall we dwell upon the sweetness of the land of Ireland, the brilliance of her emerald cloak, the stark beauty of the isles, the sad splendor of the gloaming upon her evening hills, the lilt of her gay little rivers and the peaceful stillness of her lakes, the rugged coasts, and the ever-sounding seas about her? Or listen to her poets, her philosophers, her scholars, her men and women of wit and charm, her bards and her minstrels? Or tell anew the myths and the fancies, the tales and the Come-All-Yes, the annals of olden times, and rhapsodies of the blind walkers of the roads? Or glory in the tenacity which preserved the faith of our fathers, the holiness of martyred priest and nun, or saint, and humble laborer? And might we not join in spirit with the pilgrims wending their way to Mellray and Knock and Croagh Patrick?

What peace of mind to dwell on these thoughts, and how compelling is the desire to ponder upon them. Would that I had the pen of the Irish writers to give them their true and worthiest expression. My safest course is to tell you that I possess these beloved thoughts. They are part of my being, as they are part of yours. How better our lives, how nobler our natures, for cherishing them. Thank God we have them.

Let us not think for a moment that our riches are those of memory only. The treasury of Ireland has been indeed heavily drawn upon for the endowment of western civilization. It will never be forgotten that when darkness engulfed the minds and hearts of men, and the lamps of learning were blown out by the fierce winds of barbarian invasion and shattered by ignorance, the only light, besides the beacon of the Holy Faith, that the eyes of man could see and finally take bearings by was the single, strong flame which was nourished and kept alive on that little green isle set in the vastness of the ocean waters. So powerful was this flame, and zealous its monastic guardians, that no assault could cause it to flicker or sink, and it burns today in every achievement of the western world that is good, and true, and beautiful, and it casts its challenging brilliance even upon the far-flung steppes and tundras of Russia. Its warmth is felt in a body politic shuddering in terror of the cold clammy rigor of spiritual death. And it will burn forever, because it was fed with the oil of truth and kindled with the breath of belief in God, His justice, His wisdom, His mercy, and His love.

We could dwell upon the priceless substantial contributions that the Irish have brought to these shores of our beloved America and the part they have played in every field of endeavor which has been for the development and permanence of this great Nation. Irish names come to mind from every decade of our history and from every quarter of the land—and from every bit of hallowed ground, far-flung throughout the world, wherein rest the bodies of our heroic American dead.

We are Americans—first, last, and always. This is our own, our native land. Our loyalty to it has never been questioned. The nation and the world know where we stand—and we stand here immovable.

As a Member of Congress, my first consideration and my desire is the good of my country, above all other things, having in mind the dictates of my conscience and the wishes of my constituents. As a human being, and preeminently as an American, it is also my desire that truth and justice shall prevail among all men everywhere, that their rights and dignity be respected as a divine imperative; that they have the greatest freedom possible to establish the seeds of good that are within them. These desires, I grant you, struggle for realization in a most complex and disordered world society. Morally and spiritually I will continue true to them to the best of my ability before God. Intellectually and practically I recognize my limitations in the face of the vast array of problems that are thrust before me and every other Member of Congress, problems complicated by the wishes of those who would have us decide in favor of this or that side of a question, often on the basis of an intense ex parte interest or partisan affinity. The internal affairs of the Commonwealth of Australia are not the proper subject of inquiry by our Government in the ordinary course of events. If the people of Portugal want, or will tolerate a corporative form of state, that is their concern. If England favors constitutional monarchy, that is the Englishman's free choice. It is no business of ours, in fact or theory, to foist our notions of self-rule upon any other nation. While we as Americans, Americans with a tradition of freedom fostered and magnified by our Irish ancestors, would like to see all the people of Ireland free and united in one nation indivisible, such as our own, we have no right to prescribe or direct that economy for them. Nor does international law warrant our intruding. But let no one attempt to persuade us not to work and pray for the unification of Ireland, for that is our individual right as free members of a free community. In keeping with my rights, and because of my personal view of the matter, I gave evidence of my stand on the Irish partition situation, by standing up in the House of Representatives on March 29, 1950, on a division vote, and casting my vote in favor of the Fogarty amendment, which was adopted with 99 for, and 66 against; then, on March 31, 1950, again on a division vote, I was one of the 60 for the same amendment—against 220—when it was defeated.

I would like to state that never in the history of the world have men and women of good will so earnestly and so pitifully sought for a sound basis of universal peace. It is a striking fact that in an era of awful physical violence and threats of worse violence to come, the hearts and minds of mankind have leaned with anxiety and hope toward solutions in the moral order, the order of thought and ideas, as opposed to the law of the jungle.

Certainly, there will be no peace of any universality until men advance beyond practical moral considerations into the spiritual order of adjustment. It is only in the spiritual ordering of their affairs and their lives that men can come to acknowledge, in humility and fraternity, the final sanction of their actions, namely, the will of God. With a widespread spiritual awakening, the terrors that beset us all now will perish. Then the whole world, made free to enter upon an era of peace and charity, will do that which will put to shame the glories of the Renaissance from the other great ages of history.

We know that for the accomplishment of His greatest works, God has chosen the weak things of the world. In the great census of humanity, the Irish have been but few; they have been and are numerically weak. But they have, in the historical sum, a moral and a spiritual grandeur and effectiveness that is far out of proportion to their mere numbers. The impression they have made upon western civilization is a major mark. Indeed, they have helped shape the very mold of that civilization. It is devoutly to be hoped and prayed that their moral and spiritual grandeur and effectiveness will continue to be felt in the shaping of the destiny of mankind. The Irish race are a mystical people, and a people of prayer; let us pray for a rule of holiness.

We are a people of action; let us act in the defense of our beliefs. We are a loyal people; let us never lessen our loyalty to the faith of our fathers and to this great country which we love so dearly as to die for it. Let us do all we can to hasten the day when peace once more walks the ways of this world and holds us all close in a bond of understanding and brotherly love.

Approach to veterans' groups: A letter with appropriate check sheet was sent to approximately 750 American Legion posts, copy of which is attached. The pamphlet containing the statements of Commander George Craig and the resolution passed by the American Legion in its convention in Los Angeles was, of course, of considerable interest to the veterans' groups.

Approach to election commissioners: Attached you will find copy of a letter gotten out to the 98 county election commissioners in the State of Illinois in which we advise them of the many letters and phone calls received from persons about the inadequacy of voting facilities in certain areas in previous elections, and urging their cooperation in providing adequate facilities in order that voters could exercise their franchise at the polling places without loss of time.

Approach to radio stations: We prepared and had transcribed 11 announcements ranging in time from 30 seconds to 2½ minutes, and distributed the transcriptions as well as copies of the written scripts to 80 radio stations in the State of Illinois. Copy of our original letter and check sheet for give-away material are attached.

Approach to news editors and commentators: A special plea was made to news editors and commentators in all Illinois radio stations, a total of 114 persons receiving copy of our letter of October 4, which is attached, reminding their listeners of being properly registered for the November 7 election, and urging them to make sure they go to the polls and vote.

Approach to stars of stage, screen, and radio: Attached you will find copy of a letter given out to a total of 265 stars of stage, screen, and radio, in which we outlined the purposes of Americans Will Vote and asked their cooperation in mentioning Americans Will Vote to their audiences prior to election day.

Approach to oil companies: We are enclosing copy of individually typed letter to executives of 15 oil companies in the United States, outlining the purposes of Americans Will Vote and asking their cooperation in the distribution of material designed to urge Americans to vote.

Approach to companies to use postage-meter slugs: A postage-meter slug was designed and furnished, without charge, to prominent business firms in the city to use on their mail prior to election day. A list of the firms using the 36 postage-meter slugs is given a little later in this report.

DEVELOPMENT OF MATERIAL

Publicity: Three picture stories were syndicated to 2,000 daily and weekly newspapers in the State of Illinois and cities in other adjoining States within a radius of 200 miles of Chicago. Copies of the syndications are attached, which cover: (1) Picture of Elmer Layden, pointing to emblem of Americans Will Vote and outlining the purposes and objectives of the organization; (2) National Commander George Craig, of American Legion, and Frank Moran, president of the Chicago Junior Chamber of Commerce pledge their support to Elmer Layden as president of Americans Will Vote; (3) at rally held in Springfield, Ill., Avinere Toigo, down-State executive director of Americans Will Vote joins hands with Peter F. Rossiter, Sangamon County's Democratic Chairman, and Conrad Noll, Jr., Sangamon County's Republican chairman.

Beginning with the announcement of the organization of Americans Will Vote on September 19, 13 major news releases have been developed and released to the press. The distribution of all of these releases with the exception of release of October 3 which carried an additional mailing to the city editors of all dailies and weeklies in the United States totaling 12,280, and the several releases concerning the rallies which were distributed limited to the local area involved, were distributed as follows:

City editors, Illinois daily newspapers	67
Illinois weeklies	585
Chicago suburban newspapers	95
Chicago neighborhood newspapers	92
News directors, Illinois radio stations	100
Chicago radio commentators	14
Chicago television stations	5
Wall Street Journal	1
Chicago Journal of Commerce	1
Americans Will Vote officers and directors	13
Total	993

Copies of these releases are attached, but briefly are as follows:

September 19: Announcement story of organization of Americans Will Vote.

October 3: Statement of George Craig, national commander of the American Legion, urging Americans to vote.

October 4: Elmer Layden urges election commissioners to provide adequate facilities at the polls.

October 12: Announcement of formation of down-State committee, and plans for down-State rally in Springfield.

October 12: Announcement of American Legion passing resolution of commendation. Text of the resolution was included in give-away pamphlet.

October 13: Details of down-State rally planned for Springfield on October 19.

October 19: Announcement of preelection rally in Chicago, October 31.

October 20: Report of success of down-State rally held at Springfield, Ill.

October 26: Announcement of Irv Kupcinet, well-known newspaper columnist and television star to act as emcee of rally held in Chicago.

October 26: Announcement of final plans for rally in Chicago, with speakers George Craig, past commander of the American Legion, and Frank Moran, president of Chicago Junior Chamber of Commerce, with Irv Kupcinet as master of ceremonies.

October 30: Special memo to the press, radio, and television: Announcement of the rally October 31.

October 31: Follow-up news release outlining outstanding comments in addresses made by George Craig and Frank Moran at the rally.

Description of material: Following is a listing of the various pieces of material developed, and the sources through which it was distributed prior to election day.

(a) Leaflet Election Day Is November 7: More than 4,000,000 of the 5,000,000 copies of this leaflet produced, were distributed by Curtiss Candy Co., through the inspiration of its president, Otto Schnering, by their candy salesmen as they made their calls throughout the United States.

Members of the clergy were responsible for the distribution of approximately 300,000 leaflets; American Legion posts approximately 100,000; civic clubs 52,000; Boy Scouts 36,500. Included in the miscellaneous distribution total of approximately 635,000 were such firms and individuals as 36,000 for Quaker Oats Co., 17,000 for the La Salle National Bank, 8,000 for the First National Bank of Harvey, 4,000 to Alden's Mail Order, 2,000 to National Confectioners' Association, 9,000 for First National Bank & Trust Co., Evanston, 9,000 for State Bank & Trust Co., Evanston, 8,000 for Steele-Wedeles Co., 4,500 for Elgin National Watch Co., 5,000 for International Harvester Co., etc.

In addition, cuts were supplied to Peoples Gas Light & Coke Co. who wished to pay for, themselves, and distribute 500,000 copies of the leaflet.

(b) Automobile and window sticker: Over 400,000 of these stickers were produced and distributed through orders received on the check-sheets from civic clubs, American Legion posts, clergy, radio stations, Boy Scouts, and various individuals and companies' telephone calls and letters. Here also the Curtiss Candy Co. salesmen distributed approximately 250,000.

(c) Correspondent sticker: 60,000 of these small stickers were distributed and used by various companies and individuals on correspondence and envelopes.

(d) Contribution cards: 11,000 of two types of cards, one for individuals and the other for corporations, were produced and distributed in the various channels solicited by our check-sheets and letters to the groups outlined in our program.

(e) Leaflet, You Can Get 111,111 to the Polls: Over 200,000 copies of this leaflet were produced and distributed. This particular leaflet proved very popular and more copies of it could have been used if time prior to election day would have permitted.

(f) Leaflet, George Craig, Legion Head, Lists Reasons: Close to 40,000 of these leaflets were produced and distributed.

(g) Leaflet, Endorsed by American Legion Resolution: About 150,000 copies of this leaflet were processed and distributed as quickly as we were advised the American Legion had passed the resolution at the Los Angeles convention. The leaflet gives the verbatim wording of the resolution.

(h) Lapel button: Of the 722,500 lapel buttons processed, close to 600,000 were distributed through the various channels represented by the check sheets and telephone calls.

(i) Postage meter slugs: As quickly as the postage meter slugs could be made up, they were put to use by the following firms, 20 firms in all, using a total of 38 postage meter slugs on their outgoing mail until election day: United Air Lines, the Borden Co., National Standard Parts Association, Auto Parts & Gear Co., Reed Candy Co., Quaker Oats Co., Rock Island Lines, M. B. Austin Co., Illinois Bell Telephone Co., International Harvester Co., La Salle National Bank, Uhlmann Grain Co., Stevens Candy Co., James E. Bennett Co., General American Transportation Co., Steven Candy Kitchens, Inc., Inland Steel Co., Alden's, Inc., the Quaker Oats Co., Capper & Capper, and the Jos. W. Hicks Organization.

We feel that the distribution of the material, together with the great number of imprints of the Liberty Bell symbol distributed through the use of the postage meter slugs, represents a circulation of approximately 25,000,000.

(j) Door-knob hanger: 250,000 door-knob hangers were processed and distributed prior to electiton day, a large percentage of this figure being accounted for in the door-to-door work done by the Boy Scout troops and the Sunday School children of the various churches responding to our letter.

SPECIAL ACTIVITIES

Three mass meetings or rallys were held prior to election day, one at Springfield, Ill., another at Bloomington, Ill., and the third one in Chicago at the La Salle Hotel. The meetings at Springfield and Bloomington both included remarks by the Democratic and Republican chairmen of the county, and representatives of various religious and civic local groups. In the case of the down-State rally at Springfield, the main address was given by the Honorable George D. Stoddard, president of the University of Illinois, his subject being To Vote or Not To Vote.

As previously mentioned, the Chicago meeting featured addresses by George Craig, past national commander of the American Legion, and Frank Moran, president of the Chicago Junior Chamber of Commerce, and Irv Kupcinet, well-known newspaper columnist and television star, was master of ceremonies.

Personal appearances: On October 9 Elmer Layden was interviewed on the Don McNeil

Don't feel too good brother. You will have just signed up in the big new phony peace drive sponsored by some of the Nation's top Communists and Commie-liners.

What's behind all this? Why do American Communists, agents in hiding of a hostile nation with the greatest army and air force in the world, circulate peace petitions?

The answer is easy.

They do it to gain time. They do it to slow our defense effort by representing Russia as a power that never, but never, would go to war unless attacked.

Only America, they lie, could be the aggressor, so Americans must sign peace petitions to show our Government that John Doe does not support the administration's war-mongering, imperialist designs on Russia.

If they can persuade enough people to believe this, our defense program will stall in its tracks.

But do you think for a minute the U. S. S. R. will stop building planes and submarines and tanks once we stop? Don't kid yourself.

It's all part of a carefully drawn national scheme known as the American Peace Crusade, with headquarters in New York.

The big idea is for 3,000 or so crusaders to descend on Washington next March 15, with thousands of votes for peace in the so-called peace poll.

Locally, the campaign kick-off comes tonight at a dinner meeting of the Labor Conference for Peace at the Park View Manor, 2200 West Seventh Street.

Principal speaker will be Judith Boudon, who will relate some of her experiences as a delegate to the Stalinist-controlled Warsaw peace congress.

Her report will be followed by entertainment and dancing.

The serious business will consist of handing out samples of the phony peace ballot and opening a drive for members at $1 a head.

Beginning tomorrow, the Commies and their supporters will get busy talking people into X-ing the ballots in a campaign blueprinted in the New York headquarters.

Here are some of the steps listed in the national memorandum of marching orders:

"As far as possible, see that all possible groupings are represented—women, labor, youth, Negro, clergy, academic circles, nationalities—officially or unofficially.

"Select the busiest corner in town—or the two or three busiest corners—for the public launching of the poll.

"Try to get a combination of World War II vets and mothers or sisters of boys now in the Armed Forces to man these posts.

"Approach the ministers and rabbis in your area.

"Get the people to write letters to the editor.

"Ask each group to consider immediately how the poll issue can be merged with the key concerns of the group—the 18-year-old draft and universal military training for youth groups; the wage freeze and rising prices for trade-unions; the Lieutenant Gilbert case, Army discrimination for anti-discrimination groups.

"Within a few days we hope to have available attractive leaflets which most certainly should be used with the distribution of the polling sheet.

"The leaflets will be designed for distribution to specialized groups, to begin with, labor, Negro, youth."

That blueprint, mailed from New York headquarters February 2, provides a neat lesson in Communist techniques for building up support of the Commie line by tying in with groups who have a legitimate objective.

The original plan called for the big crusade to take place March 1. Several developments, among them strong opposition to the move by AFL and CIO union leaders, caused deferment of the march on the Capitol until March 15.

Why Americans Don't Vote—Americans Will Vote, Inc.'s Successful Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I believe it will be useful for veterans' organizations, fraternal organizations, civic organizations, States and municipalities, and voluntary groups to study the activities of Americans Will Vote, a group of public-spirited Americans who got together for the purpose of getting out the vote and did a remarkable job in a comparatively short time. The November 1950 election brought out a million more voters in Illinois than in any one presidential year, and it is estimated that as much as 80 percent of the responsibility for this increase is attributable to the efforts of Americans Will Vote, Inc. This organization won a special award in the 1950 Nation-wide get-out-the-vote competition, sponsored by the American Heritage Foundation. Appended is their report of November 24, 1950, which detailed the activities which won for them this award:

THE JOS. W. HICKS ORGANIZATION,
Chicago, Ill., November 24, 1950.

VOTING AWARDS COMMITTEE,
AMERICAN HERITAGE FOUNDATION,
New York, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: On behalf of Americans Will Vote, Inc., a nonpartisan, nonprofit, and nonpolitical organization, I am submitting this report in my capacity as public-relations counsel to the organization, as an application for one of the awards to be made in 1950 by the American Heritage Foundation on the theme Voting Is Everybody's Job.

ORIGIN OF AMERICANS WILL VOTE

Early in September a group of Chicago businessmen at luncheon were discussing a national magazine article, in which it was pointed out that only about 51 percent of America's qualified voters took the trouble to go to the polls in 1948's national election. Unanimous in their opinion that such apathy was distressing, they decided to attempt corrective action by forming an organization incorporated under the name "Americans Will Vote." The name of the organization was suggested by Mr. Charles T. Scott, owner of the Scott Steel Co. and prominent Chicago businessman. The article of incorporation was signed by Mr. Scott; Henry F. Woulfe, vice president of a leading Chicago printing and engraving firm; and Col. Max D. Emmanuel, a retired Army officer.

At the first organization meeting Elmer F. Layden, former Notre Dame football player and coach and now associated with the General American Transportation Corp., was elected president. Henry F. Woulfe, former president of Pepsodent Corp. and now vice president of Manz Corp., was elected vice president. Frederick W. Turner, Jr., prominent Chicago lawyer, was elected secretary, and John C. Wright, president of the La Salle National Bank, was elected treasurer.

Members of the board of directors are: John C. Bowers, Chicago real-estate broker; Harold S. Russell, president of Railroad & Industrial Products Co.; Otto Schnering, president of Curtiss Candy Co.; Charles T. Scott, owner, Scott Steel Co.; and Henry F. Woulfe, vice president of Manz Corp.

Each of the foregoing officers and directors were chosen not only because of their prominence in civic life and their successful business careers, but with consideration of the fact that none of them had ever been prominently identified with any partisan political campaign.

The article of incorporation stated:

"The corporation is organized exclusively for educational purposes, particularly education of Americans to exercise their right and responsibility to vote in all elections and on all questions submitted to vote; no part of its income or property shall inure to the private benefit of its directors or officers or any individual or association of individuals or corporation; the corporation will not attempt in any manner to influence legislation through propaganda or any other effort, or take a partisan position on any issue, or assist any candidate for any office or provide aid to any political party.

"In carrying out its purpose, the corporation may use all means appropriate to the accomplishment of such purpose, including aiding such education activity by any other individual or organization in the United States, provided that such activity must conform to the purpose and limitations of the article of incorporation of this corporation."

It was agreed that the success or failure of the objectives of Americans Will Vote could be determined by any unguarded comment that any officer or director might make which could be construed by any person as being prejudiced toward the interest or promotion of any political candidate or any partisan issue. Each and every person associated with the project therefore dedicated himself to the complete objective of encouraging Americans to vote without any degree of partisanship reflected in any manner. At the outset, inasmuch as the organization was incorporated in the State of Illinois it was decided that its activities preliminary to the recent election campaign would be devoted to the confines of this State. However, the organization promotion became so widely known that cooperation was volunteered from many other States, and to that end, a substantial amount of the organization material was supplied and distributed in other States by members of the clergy, veterans' groups, Boy Scouts, and other organizations and individuals.

PLANNING THE PROGRAM

The services of the Jos. W. Hicks Organization, public relations consulting firm, were obtained to plan and direct the organization's program.

Approach to the clergy: Letters were written to all of the members of the clergy in the State of Illinois, asking them to ring their church bells or play their chimes on election day, offering them material for distribution to their congregations and seeking their cooperation in preaching Americanism and teaching Americans to vote, in their sermons. Attached is a copy of the letter sent to the clergy, together with copy of a check sheet supplied for their convenience in ordering material. The number of clergymen thus contacted totaled 2,840.

Approach to women's clubs: Letters with an appropriate check sheet enclosed for their convenience in ordering material for distribution were sent to some 400 women's clubs in the State.

Approach to civic clubs, chambers of commerce, etc.: Attached is a copy of a letter written to some 980 various civic clubs, chambers of commerce, and other community organizations, with an appropriate check sheet for ordering material for distribution, outlining the purposes of Americans Will Vote and seeking their cooperation on a State-wide basis.

Approach to Boy Scout troops: Copy of a letter written to approximately 500 Boy Scout troops in the State of Illinois is attached, together with check sheet.

Breakfast Club, well known radio program on a coast-to-coast network, at which time he outlined the purposes and objectives of Americans Will Vote.

On October 20 Mr. Layden assisted the Chicago Junior Chamber of Commerce in painting the first in a series of "get out the vote" signs on the sidewalk at the corner of State and Madison Streets. Representatives of all Chicago newspapers and WGN-TV news reel were present, the ceremonies being televised the next night by WGN.

On October 21 Mr. Layden was interviewed by Dennis James after the television broadcast of the Notre Dame-Michigan State football game, sponsored by Old Gold over the DuMont network. At this time also, Mr. Layden outlined the purposes and objectives of Americans Will Vote and urged all listeners to exercise their privilege at the polls on November 7.

On October 24 Mr. Layden was interviewed by Bill Evans over the latter's television show on WBKB, at which time approximately 12 minutes were devoted to the interview.

On October 24 Mr. Layden was interviewed by Austin Kiplinger during his newscast over WGN-TV at 6:15. Here again Mr. Layden emphasized to the listeners the distressing apathy that has existed by voters in the last previous national election and urged them not to repeat such a disgraceful performance.

Airplane trailer: As a way of adding emphasis to the message of Americans Will Vote to a great number of persons at one time, we arranged for an airplane to circle over Dyche Stadium in Evanston on the Saturday before election day during the time of the football game, and again on Sunday before election day over Comiskey Park during a professional football game, carrying a streamer with the wording "Americans will vote on November 7."

Special telegram: As an additional means of bringing the message of Americans Will Vote to as many persons as possible just prior to election day, a telegram was sent signed by Mr. Layden to 42 prominent newspaper columnists; press services; news editors of all radio networks in Chicago, New York, and Hollywood; the city editors of all newspapers in Los Angeles and San Francisco; and outstanding radio performers, such as Jack Benny, Edgar Bergen, Eddie Cantor, and including radio commentators Walter Winchell, Jim Hurlbut, Clifton Utley, etc. Copy of this telegram and list of recipients is attached.

COOPERATION WITH OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

Americans Will Vote cooperated with the junior chamber of commerce in supplying them with material and speakers for their programs. Americans Will Vote cooperated with the American Legion in distributing the resolution passed by the American Legion at their convention in Los Angeles. Americans Will Vote also cooperated with the Illinois Federation of Retail Associations' get-out-the-vote program, headed by Mr. J. T. Meek, by making known to members of the association the availability of Americans Will Vote material, and the fact that this campaign was being conducted on a publicity promotion level, whereas the other campaign was conducted on a paid-advertising-space level and the sale of promotional material. It was pointed out that in the case of our campaign nothing was to be sold, every piece of material was given away without any charge whatsoever.

METHOD OF FINANCING OF AMERICANS WILL VOTE CAMPAIGN

The entire financial proceeds for the Americans Will Vote campaign were obtained through individual and business firm subscriptions. Contributions ranged in size from $1 to $1,000.

There is attached, a clipping from the Chicago Tribune of November 9, indicating the election returns as they had been reported at that time. However, as of this date the official returns for the State of Illinois have not been recorded.

CONTINUING PROGRAM

The Americans Will Vote activity we describe in effect constituted about a 7-week campaign; in fact, the announcement and press conference concerning the organization was exactly 7 weeks prior to election day. All of the material described herein, of which copies are attached, was prepared, produced and released within that space of time.

Much credit has been given Americans Will Vote in news and editorial comment in the newspapers, and by commentators over radio and television, for the organization's part in helping to bring out the vote on election day. We do not believe that any single organization designed to help increase the vote can or should attempt specific credit for its efforts—however, we do believe that this organization, operating as it did and with the cooperation of all of the agencies involved, can rightly share with others the results that were so definitely indicated on election day.

The greatest evidence of the success of the campaign is that interest which has been generated wherein many persons and organizations which cooperated have indicated a desire that the activities be continued. For instance, we have letters from scout masters asking us to send them material now which they may plan to distribute and instruct their troops in distributing on the occasion of the spring elections. Practically all of the business organizations which used postage meter slugs have indicated that they will hold these slugs with the intention of using them in advance of future elections. An inventory of the material that is left over would indicate there is just about enough to use in promoting the future activities of the organization, and the requests for information and material from States across the country from Maine to Oregon will indicate that Americans Will Vote has outgrown its original state of incorporation and in its next step will be a Nation-wide undertaking.

Very sincerely yours,

———— ————,
President.

Where the Money Goes; Some of It

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 1, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, during the month of January, our draft quota was 80,000. During the same month, military agencies hired 58,388 civilians. For every four men inducted, three others were hired to do civilian jobs connected with military service. Our total civilian personnel working for the Federal Government reached 2,245,275 when January ended. Sixteen new agencies have been set up in the last 6 months to deal with the national emergency, with an increase in the number of men and women working for Uncle Sam amounting to 219,000 since July 1, 1950.

This record of mushrooming departments and new divisions within departments helps us to understand what goes on with the taxpayer's hard-earned dollar. In the House of Representatives it was declared that our military authorities are purchasing supplies sufficient to meet the needs of a 10,000,000-man army. Such spending as the buying of Navy desks for $198 each and wooden office chairs at $78 apiece are part of this fantastic orgy of public spending.

It will not end until this administration is removed from control in Congress and the White House. Bear that in mind every time you write a check to the collector of internal revenue.

Defense Against Communist Aggression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix to the RECORD, for the information of Senators, a brief resolution adopted at its founding conference by the Council Against Communist Aggression with offices at 1500 North Broad Street, Philadelphia 21, Pa., together with an article by Prof. Karl A. Wittfogel entitled "A New Policy for Asia," printed in the New Leader for February 19, 1951.

The council is a militant anti-Communist group, concentrating particularly on foreign policy in reference to the Far East. It is headed by a provisional executive group, including Marx Lewis, of the Hatters union; Bishop Welch, of the Methodist Church; Sal B. Hoffman, president of the Upholsterers union; Christopher Emmet, of Common Cause; and Arthur G. McDowell, as executive secretary.

While I am not necessarily in full agreement with all parts of the council's resolution, I am glad at its request to make the data available for the information of Members of Congress.

There being no objection, the resolution and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION

Our security depends on a global system of collective security and calls for defense against Communist aggression in both Europe and Asia.

Therefore, we urge—

1. That the United States sponsor a resolution in the United Nations condemning the government of the U. S. S. R. as the instigator of and accomplice in the aggressions against the Republic of Korea and the United Nations based on evidence presented to the United Nations by Ambassador Austin.

2. That the United States sponsor a resolution calling on the United Nations to impose sanctions, including a blockade, against Communist China so as to effectively prevent the direct or indirect shipment of strategic materials to the aggressors attacking the United Nations forces in Korea.

3. That the United States should offer the National Government of China for the revitalized army on Formosa adequate arms and equipment under the supervision of top military personnel of the United States as in Greece and Turkey so that it can help the people of China to free themselves from the Communist yoke and develop political and economic democracy.

4. That the United States sponsor a resolution in the United Nations serving notice upon the U. S. S. R. that if it directly or through its satellites commits aggression upon any state whether or not it is a member of the North Atlantic Pact that the full force of all the members of the United Nations will be directed against it.

A NEW POLICY FOR ASIA

(By Karl A. Wittfogel)

[From the New Leader of February 19, 1951]

Recent far-eastern developments have disappointed all those who expected the Chinese Communists to settle down peacefully after the full establishment of their regime and not get too deeply involved in Soviet world strategy. Today, it is clear to even the most well-disposed observer that the problem of the Chinese Communists is nothing but the problem of the Chinese sector of a huge Communist axis which stretches from Canton to the Elbe and which expands wherever opportunity permits. But many who accept this fact are reluctant to accept its consequences. Under new disguises, old illusions again rear their heads, obscuring once more the real issues in our China policy.

In the global array of Communist and non-Communist forces, the highly industrialized countries of Western Europe manifestly constitute the most precious stake. The present American efforts to prevent a Soviet victory in this zone are therefore eminently justified. But the Communist victory in China has heightened rather than lessened the importance of an active American policy in east Asia. The spread of Communist power to Formosa, Japan, and the Philippines would seriously imperil our Pacific defenses; and the fall of southeast and south Asia would catastrophically affect the situation in the Middle and Near East.

In view of this danger, which is bloodily underlined by the Korean war, it becomes difficult to plead for a gentle American policy toward Communist China on the ground of an expected Titoist development. Instead, we increasingly hear references to the intense nationalism of our potential friends, the Chinese intellectuals, whose favor we may gain by yielding Formosa and by recognizing the Peking regime. Besides being inconsistent, this argument completely misunderstands the character of a Communist state, in China or anywhere else. Where public opinion is dictatorially controlled, Nationalist sentiment can be so manipulated that the real issues may be reduced to insignificance (cf. the impact of the Soviet Union on Manchuria) and insignificant issues blown up fantastically (cf. the propaganda against American imperialism in China today).

There certainly are in China national as well as other undercurrents that defy Communist manipulation; but however important these undercurrents may become in an open crisis, at the moment they are woefully ineffective if compared with the strength of government-promoted ideas. Any American policy which disregards essential political (and strategic) considerations in order to appeal to the controlled nationalism of the Chinese intelligentsia will be the victim of an unrealistic concept of Communist power.

The only effective nationalism in Communist China today is the nationalism of its ruling party. No doubt, the Peking Politburo is fully aware that in Sinkiang, Inner Mongolia, Manchuria, and perhaps now also in Korea, Moscow's and Peking's aspirations clash. But some of these areas have already fallen under Soviet influence; and Manchuria is too close to Russian territory and military might to lead to open conflict.

NO TITOS IN CHINA

Such a conflict seems unlikely also for other and even more weighty reasons. The conference of the trade-unions of the countries of Asia and Australasia, held in 1949 in Peking with strong Soviet approval, placed the Chinese Communists in an outstanding position as the models and supporters of the many hoped-for Asian revolutions. The prospect that Mao and his lieutenants may rule as satraps over the majority of the agrarian countries of Asia opens up enormous vistas, not only for the Communist leaders themselves, but also for their subjects. This perspective which, with its imperialistic possibilities, surpasses all traditional Chinese Nationalist dreams, is entirely acceptable to the Moscow Politburo. The master strategists of the Kremlin are accustomed to think in geoeconomical categories. They see their hegemony for any foreseeable future guaranteed by their control over the great industrial centers of the Eurasian heartland, centers which they hope to supplement with the industries of Western Europe, while the remainder of agrarian Asia, under Chinese (and Russian) direction, is being liberated.

Thus the Chinese and Russian Communists are linked not only by similarities in their power structures, ideologies, and the corresponding vested interests of their ruling classes, but also by historical expectancies which logically emerge from their Leninist-Stalinist premises. Faced with enemies who think in global and long-range terms, we can hope to build an effective policy only if we too view the separate issues of the present far-eastern situation in a global and long-range context.

KEEP KOREA FREE

Korea: In line with previously stated intentions, we should try to establish an independent and democratic Korea within whatever limits military and political conditions permit. But neither attacks by ever-increasing masses of Chinese Communist troops, nor pseudo-conciliatory gestures should induce us to make permanent commitments in a strategically absurd position. It is obvious that the Communist Axis wants to tie down the UN forces in as many separate and disadvantageous places as possible. It is equally obvious that we must not become unwilling partners in this game.

Formosa: Our attitude toward Formosa involves military problems which the layman is not competent to solve. But if military judgment recommends the defense of the island—as it apparently does—then it would be foolish to abandon it, and this for political reasons as well. The "nationalism" argument has already been discussed in relation to the Chinese intellectuals. In its official Communist form it is an unpleasant reminder of Nazi arguments for occupying Austria.

Austria has been closely connected with Germany in a long political and cultural history; and the inhabitants of this rump area are practically all German. Nevertheless the consistent enemies of Nazi expansion were unmitigatedly opposed to having Austria added to the Reich when Germany was under the control of a blatantly totalitarian regime. Formosa is far less easily invaded and far more easily defended than Austria was in 1937—or Korea is today. In permitting the island to become the victim of a Communist "Anschluss," we would not only weaken ourselves militarily, but we would also strengthen the impression which Communist propaganda is particularly eager to give—that among other things we are abysmally stupid.

HELP AND REFORM CHIANG

And what of the Nationalist Government and army? Chiang Kai-shek's record as the leader of the defense of his country during the grim years of Japanese occupation is better than most of us today care to remember; the record of his internal policy is bad. Even so well-balanced a document as the Wedemeyer report stresses the many acts of oppression and corruption which helped to undermine Chiang's popular support. But during World War II we had a number of allies whose governments were none too savory and whose internal conditions we could not influence. If a general war breaks out shortly, we should have to accept the Nationalists, like all other allies, "as is," making the best of what we have to defend the east Asian fringe. But if the present uneasy world situation continues for some time then we shall be in a better position than ever to make the Nationalists underwrite certain basic economic and political reforms. Such reforms, if thorough and successful, will also provide new perspectives for a post-Communist China. Most probably they will raise the fighting potential of the Nationalist forces far beyond their present level.

Whatever we may do with regard to developing and equipping the Nationalist army, we should certainly not commit ourselves now to any major invasion of the mainland. Such a step would require comprehensive UN (or United States) support, and it would drag us into precisely that kind of an amorphous Asian land war which we have every reason to avoid. Of course, there are many small military operations that a strengthened Nationalist government or independent anti-Communist resistance centers might undertake. In this respect, the previous blockade of Shanghai and the present guerrilla activities on the Chinese mainland provide invaluable lessons as to what is technically advisable and what is not. But here, as in all other instances, momentary indignation must not make us lose sight of our long-range strategy. Proper balance between our European and Asian commitments remains the paramount test. And certain actions which, in a spreading military conflagration, would be extremely helpful may produce a wholly undesired effect when undertaken impulsively and without regard for the general Asian and global situation.

Diplomatic recognition of Communist China. As a matter of expediency, it seems desirable to recognize diplomatically all de facto governments that persist over time. But this rule, like others, has its exceptions. Communist China may be one of them.

The Peking invasion of Tibet was not officially branded for what it was except by the Lhasa government. The Chinese Communist aggression in Korea was eventually condemned by the UN. These two ventures are direct and, so to speak, neighboring actions. Others, less direct, have more ambitious aims. The top-ranking Peking dignitary, Liu Shao-chi, who promised his party's support for the Communist movements throughout Asia and Australasia, urged the necessity of setting up in these areas "wherever and whenever possible a national army which is led by the Communist Party."

If our Asian friends hope to tame the Chinese tiger by feeding it, we can do nothing to stop them. But we have no right to neglect the lessons gleaned from our own experiences. These lessons controvert many oft-repeated misconceptions. They show that, without recognition, a modest flow of diplomatic messages and proposals is entirely possible. They show that, without recognition, economic relations can be maintained with considerable success. (The bulk of American trade with the U. S. S. R. during certain years before recognition was greater than during any years from 1933 until the beginning of the war.) They also show that a free exchange of persons—students, journalists, businessmen—with a Communist state is a complete fiction. The apparatchik societies refuse to admit any member of the free world who is overtly critical of their way of life, while, under cover of "exchange," they send us hand-picked and thoroughly indoctrinated Communists.

But apart from the disadvantages involved in unequal diplomatic treaties with Communist countries to which we have agreed without realizing their pitfalls, there is no justification for our recognizing now or in any near future a regime that blackmails us with threats and that openly attacks the UN (and United States) forces. Recognition under these circumstances would indeed be a reward for aggression; and the Communist camp would certainly hail it as such.

VETO REDS IN UN

Admission to the UN: As in the case of recognition, we should maintain our freedom of decision. But also, as in that case, there is no excuse for putting a premium on aggression. On the contrary, conditions being what they are, we should use every means provided by the Charter, including the veto, to prevent the seating of a Chinese Communist delegation in the United Nations.

For the Chinese people—against their Communist dictators: We have never ceased to emphasize our friendliness for the Chinese people; and in view of the present Communist hate campaign it is particularly important to unmask the claim of American imperialism in China as a new version of the big lie. The United States voluntarily dropped all unequal treaties just when the U. S. S. R. was striving to reestablish tsarist prerogatives in Manchuria. We voluntarily withdrew our troops from Korea as well as from China; and our continued pressure for the liquidation of colonialism is well known. The partial success of Communist propaganda in such countries as India in depicting us as imperialist schemers therefore constitutes a particularly serious challenge. The incessant repetition of the big lie requires that we, with equal insistence, restate our friendship for the Chinese people (as juxtaposed to their Communist dictators) and our full acceptance of the country's national independence—which is threatened not by us, but by the new Soviet treaties and the Moscow teachers of the Peking regime. We should make it unmistakably clear that our refusal of recognition is directed, not against the Chinese people, but exclusively against their aggressive and dictatorial rulers. Of course, there is no reason for righteous self-adulation, and the American who fails to see the opportunistic inconsistencies in our proliberation policy oversimplifies a good record which needs no glamorizing. But the American who brazenly denies our basic proliberation policy gives comfort to our enemies by repeating one of their most dishonest slander themes.

WELFARE AND THE PEOPLE

Our attitude toward the non-Communist population of China and the adjacent countries of Asia: Another slogan, which is thoughtless rather than vicious, is the cry for contacts with the non-Communist people of China. We certainly should do everything in our power to reach the urban as well as the rural non-Communist population in China and in other parts of Communist Asia. But besides supporting the resistance movements and spreading whatever propaganda we can, we have only limited opportunities of approaching the subjects of the new apparatchik states. The real issue, thus, lies somewhere else.

In the great majority of all Asian countries, the discontent of large strata of the rural population enables the Communists to pursue their strategy of infiltration, organization, and attack. No military and political measures on our side will prove satisfactory unless they are bulwarked by a genuine concern for the welfare of the villagers. The excellent land reform which, under American direction, was carried out in Japan has resulted in a situation in which the Japanese Communists have lost most of the support which they previously derived from the poor peasants and tenants. The second part of a land reform which was initiated in Korea in 1949 under our pressure and by vote of an assembly that did not see eye to eye with Syngman Rhee might have achieved similar results, if the Korean Government had acted faster and if the North Koreans had not attacked in June 1950. The ECA is now trying to enforce in Korea the second (and more comprehensive) part of the reform.

History will show whether the harm done by the delay can be amended; but it is vital to learn from experience and to apply the principles, which proved so effective in Japan, to other areas of east and southeast Asia immediately threatened by Communist civil war and expansion. Formosa has already been mentioned. The Philippines and Indochina also have a high priority. Any American funds which will facilitate the transfer of the land to the peasants by partially underwriting a reasonable compensation may prove decisive in demonstrating the seriousness of our attempt to show that our democratic policy concerns itself not only with the form of government, but also with the vital needs of the large underprivileged strata of the agrarian population. The implications of such a bold and focused application of our point 4 program for other parts of non-Communist Asia, such as India, Pakistan, and even the Near East, are obvious.

REFORMS AGAINST RED REVOLUTION

Our economic and social policy in Asia should not be based on the principle of me-tooism, but on entirely different considerations and aims: American policy in all these fields defeats its purpose when it insists that we are aiming at measures similar to those undertaken by the Communists, the difference being only that we proceed in a more civilized and gradual manner. Such an attitude of me-tooism is decidedly harmful. Today, no sincere political analyst has the right to speak of the Communist land distribution as a measure intended to provide the peasants with full, permanent and secure possession of the assigned land. This policy is nothing but a ruse for temporarily gaining peasant support for the seizure of political power which, once achieved, becomes the lever for destroying not only all large property, but eventually all small rural and urban property as well. Ambivalent statements spread by irresponsible authors and politicians about the first phase of the Communist land policy bulwark a propaganda myth which we have every reason to destroy. It is of the utmost importance for us to contrast the temporary and dishonest Communist revolution with the permanent and honest reforms which we promote. Together with its industrial supplement (the encouragement of a strong and independent trade-union movement) and a general policy of civil liberties and social security, these measures prepare the urban and rural population to participate democratically in the life of their commonwealth.

To be sure, our insistence on the superiority of our policy will be meaningful only to the extent to which it is accompanied by authentic acts. But these acts will become propagandistically effective only if we present them without apology, and not as if the Communists were actually, if pervertedly, doing the job better. It is high time to discard a me-tooist revolutionary phraseology which implicitly gives the Communists credit for something for which they deserve no credit whatsoever.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 16, 1951

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two more articles in the series entitled "Medicine in Crisis," by Mr. Selig Greenberg, writer for the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, published in the city of Providence, R. I.

These articles will be most interesting to the Members of the Senate in their consideration of S. 337, which is a bill to provide an emergency program of grants and scholarships for education in the medical fields.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEDICINE IN CRISIS—SURVEY SHOWS UNITED STATES FACES SERIOUS DOCTOR SHORTAGE—TOTAL OF PHYSICIANS NOT ENOUGH TO FILL CIVILIAN AND MILITARY NEEDS

(This is the eighth of a series of articles on the problems of medical education within the context of the broader issues of medical care and practice.)

(By Selig Greenberg)

The issue of monopoly in medicine has been brought into particularly sharp focus by the grave financial crisis facing the medical schools and the demand for more doctors growing out of the national emergency.

The ominous and undisputed facts in the financial crisis are:

The medical schools cannot enlarge or even maintain their present enrollment unless they get a lot more money.

The same thing holds true of the standards of teaching which will determine the quality of future medical practice. Without additional funds, the schools will not only be unable to improve and expand the scope of their teaching but will be forced to let standards deteriorate.

In other words, instead of getting more and better doctors we are in danger of getting fewer and poorer ones at a time when the need may be greater than ever.

STUDY REVEALS SHORTAGE

The extent to which the national emergency and the threat of war have aggravated the shortage of doctors was recently revealed by the health resources advisory committee of the National Security Resources Board.

The committee, made up of physicians, said flatly after a 6-month study that there were not enough doctors in the United States to meet mobilization needs and afford at the same time adequate protection for the civilian population. The Nation would need 22,000 physicians over and above those in sight for 1954, it reported, to maintain the present level of civilian medical services and meet expected requirements for the Armed Forces, civil defense, and public-health services.

The committee urged immediate expansion and acceleration of medical training facilities. It warned that the threatened deficit could be averted only if medical school enrollments were increased at once by 15 percent and the schools adopted again the speed-up program in effect during the last war. Under this program, the 4 years of medical training were squeezed into 3 years by giving up vacations.

All of which underscores the urgency of relieving the financial plight of the medical colleges.

MEDICAL ASSOCIATION ROLE

What has the American Medical Association done about it?

The preponderance of objective opinion is that the AMA has consistently pursued a policy of obstructionism.

The country's top medical educators and the presidents of some of our leading universities agree that the amount of money needed to assure the future of American medical education is so huge that it cannot be met through private philanthropy alone. They are convinced that the job can be done adequately only with Federal aid.

A bill providing for Federal subsidies was introduced in the United States Senate in 1949 under joint Democratic and Republican auspices, with Senator TAFT as one of its sponsors. The Senate passed it by unanimous vote.

The AMA then got busy and killed the measure. The bill was bottled up last year in a House committee by a single vote and never got to the floor. Qualified observers have held up this action as proof of the hollowness of the AMA's claim that it favors the training of more doctors.

THREE MAJOR ARGUMENTS

I will go into the merits of the subsidy controversy in a later article. Right now let's take a final look at the AMA line in the debate over the adequacy of our supply of physicians. The line has been based on these three major arguments:

1. We don't need any more doctors.

2. The medical schools already are expanding their enrollment to take care of additional needs.

3. Those who favor still further expansion want to lower the quality of medical training.

The first argument is no longer pressed with as much vigor as it once was. Aside from the factors cited in previous articles, the contrast with what has happened in other professions is too sharp.

GAIN IN DOCTORS LAGS

Between 1910 and 1940, when the country's population rose 43 percent, there was an increase of only 30 percent in the number of doctors as against a boost of 58 percent for lawyers, 76 percent for dentists, 85 percent for teachers and 212 percent for engineers. Last year the medical schools graduated 5,553 M. D.'s. This compared with 52,240 degrees awarded by engineering schools and 14,312 by law schools.

During the past 10 years the rise in the number of doctors—but not of private practitioners—has kept pace with the growth of population and medical school enrollment has substantially increased. Freshman admissions mounted 22 percent between 1940 and 1950 and the number of graduates rose 9 percent. But in 1940 the schools had barely begun recovering from the low point to which their enrollment had sunk during the depression.

A new medical school is being built in California and plans for new schools are under discussion in three other States. Experts maintain that this is not enough.

POOR TRAINING CHARGED

Much of the increase in the rate of production of doctors in the past decade has been the result of the opening of several new schools and of the wartime accelerated program. The AMA and the Medical School Association have expressed opposition to renewal of this program on the ground that it led to overcrowding, understaffing, and poor training.

Some of the schools affiliated with State universities expanded their intake in the postwar years under the pressure of veterans seeking to get a medical education through the GI bill of rights. But there has been little expansion in the private schools.

Those who maintain that we need more doctors deny emphatically that they are advocating lowering of standards. Dean Victor A. Rapport, of the College of Liberal Arts at Wayne University, chairman of a committee of American Conference of Academic Deans which has made a study of the subject, has described charges to that effect as "sheer twaddle designed solely to obfuscate basic issues."

Proponents of expansion realize that it will take years to turn out more doctors. They know that it will require not only many millions of dollars but careful planning to secure additional laboratory space and equipment, hospital facilities, and qualified teachers. They are, therefore, all the more concerned over the time lost because of AMA hindrance.

MEDICINE IN CRISIS—MEDICAL SCHOOLS IN RED, NEED $40,000,000 A YEAR—OTHER UNIVERSITY FUNDS HAVE TO COVER $10,000,000 ANNUAL DEFICIT

(This is the ninth of a series of articles on the problems of medical education within the context of the broader issues of medical care and practice.)

(By Selig Greenberg)

The Nation's medical schools need an additional $40,000,000 a year—a jump of about 75 percent—in operating funds to train adequately their present student body.

This was the recent conclusion of a committee of 12 doctors and medical educators after a 2-year study of medical-school finances undertaken for the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service. The committee was headed by Dr. Lowell J. Reed, vice president of Johns Hopkins University, and included Dr. Ernest E. Irons, former president of the American Medical Association.

BIG OPERATING DEFICITS

The 72 medical schools and 7 basic science schools in the United States now have an annual operating deficit of about $10,000,000, which is being met largely by dipping into other university funds. The $40,000,000 covers this deficit and the additional amount which the committee felt was needed to enable the schools to do a proper teaching job.

The proposed boost of 75 percent in operating expenses would take care only of the present enrollment. Enlargement of the student body, which has been urged by many authorities, would require a lot more money.

The magnitude of the financial emergency confronting medical education is indicated by these major findings of the committee:

IMPROVEMENT OF PLANTS

Aside from $40,000,000 a year in operating funds, the schools need about $330,000,000 to improve their physical plants to meet desired standards.

To increase enrollment by 22 percent, the schools would need an additional $18,000,000 a year in operating expenses and $244,000,000 more for construction purposes.

(The Health Resources Advisory Committee of the National Security Resources Board has warned that we will be short 22,000 doctors by 1954 unless enrollments are raised at once by 15 percent and the schools adopt again the speed-up program they ran during the last war. The combination of these two measures would mean an increased enrollment of considerably more than 22 percent.)

While medical school operating costs jumped 94 percent between 1941 and 1948, income from endowment and tuition failed to keep pace.

TUITION COSTS

Tuition now averages $550 a year and runs as high as $835. But income from tuition provides only 23 percent of operating expenses. (Brown University, where tuition is $600, gets 56 percent of its total budget from this source. The proportion of income from tuition is even higher in colleges which have no graduate schools.)

Medical school operating expenses average $2,285 a year per student. One school reported spending $8,257 per student. But these figures cover more than the cost of undergraduate training as they include expenditures for research and graduate instruction.

Lack of funds has forced 33 of the schools to limit their programs or defer important advances. Curtailments have been particularly heavy in teaching of public health and preventive medicine, two fields where there has long been a critical lag.

SUBSIDY BILL

The study committee made no direct comment on the revived medical education subsidy bill now pending in Congress. But its findings made it pretty clear that the medical schools could not hope to make up their deficits from increased revenue from private endowment or tuition or bigger grants from their parent universities which already are hard pressed for funds.

There is general agreement among educators that it would be dangerous to go on raising tuition charges and thereby limit still further the study of medicine.

A point stressed by the committee was that even if the required money were made available at once it would take years to improve and expand facilities and recruit faculty. There already is a shortage of teachers, mainly because salaries in many of the schools are too low to attract skilled men who can earn more in private practice.

Far more so than any other field the medical profession cannot be enlarged quickly.

LONG PREPARATION

To become a doctor, a student must have 3 or 4 years of college training, 4 years of medical schooling, 1 or 2 years of internship, and two or more years of hospital residency if he wants to become a specialist. It takes from 10 to 12 years from the time planning starts for a new medical school before its graduates are ready to hang out their shingles.

"Medicine," as one authority has put it, "does not lend itself to the type of expansion that can be accomplished by putting additional chairs in the back of the classroom and asking the instructor to speak a little louder." If they are to do the job properly, the schools must have more teachers and hospital and laboratory facilities before they can accept more students.

TRAINING EXPENSIVE

Medical training is the most expensive of all forms of education because it is an apprenticeship involving a continuous personal relationship between faculty, students, and patients in the teaching hospitals. It requires close personal supervision of students through an unusually high ratio of faculty. At Cornell University Medical College, for instance, there is a faculty of 658, including 123 full-time teachers, for a student body of 334.

Medical education is subdivided into two so-called preclinical years and two clinical years.

The first 2 years are devoted largely to laboratory study of the basic sciences of anatomy, physiology, biochemistry, pathology, bacteriology, and pharmacology. In the last 2 years the student's time is spent mostly in hospital wards and outpatient departments. Here he learns by watching his teachers practice and gradually being allowed to do some of the work himself under supervision. Before he can be permitted to assume responsibility for the life and death of his fellow men the prospective physician requires much training and complicated and costly facilities and equipment.

All of which underscores the fact that if we are to get more doctors it will take not only much money but years. So the time to start doing something about it is now.

The State Versus the Individual

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 1, 1951

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to insert the following speech made by Mr. Louis Bromfield, noted author and farmer, at the Cleveland freedom dinner held at the Hotel Statler in Cleveland, Ohio, on February 1, 1951:

THE STATE VERSUS THE INDIVIDUAL

(By Louis Bromfield)

I have been requested to keep what I have to say tonight outside the realms of partisan politics and I shall endeavor to do so insofar as this is possible, but in such a time and in such an age when the entire world is engaged in a struggle between two ideologies, I find it extremely difficult to make a nonpolitical speech on the subject of freedom, and the preservation of man's right to his own individuality.

I think it is quite clear by now to almost everyone that what we are witnessing is a battle between two principles—on the one hand the principle that man is and should be subject to a vague but tyrannical, impersonal machine known as the state. On the other the principle that man's most sacred right is his freedom to live, think, and develop his own character and personality within reason and that government should remain forever subject to the combined will of individual citizens and that officers and bureaucrats from President to policeman are inevitably and eternally the servants of the people.

It is only within the past 2 or 3 years that the true nature of this struggle has become apparent to what we might call the average man, the man in the street, John Q. Citizen, or what you will. Until very recently many of the rights of our citizens have been extracted, as you might say, painlessly, as a tooth might be extracted painlessly by employing the very latest in pain killers. In this process, extending over the past generation or longer, the pain killer has always been employed in the form of subsidies or offers of security in one form or other, with the ultimate in doses being Sir Albert Beveridge's "womb to tomb" state in which, by theory, all material worries would be removed from mankind in return for his giving up the right to choose what kind of work he would perform, where he would perform it, how much he would be paid, and so forth. In other words, in return for the security of the "womb to tomb" plan, he would cease to exist as an intelligent, creative, vigorous individual and become merely a kind of robot, sacrificed to an immense bureaucracy, operating with little consideration for him as an individual. In return for a theoretical security he becomes the victim of an impersonal, inhuman machine—and let me add, from the experience of every nation in which bureaucracy has continued to grow—with a waste and inefficiency that becomes an increasing material burden to the very people whom it is supposed to benefit.

This system of using bribes, subsidies, promises, and so forth as a pain killer confused many—indeed most people—for a considerable time, and it is only since we have begun to see the results in operation has it become apparent, even to the simplest fellow, that when the pain killer wears off, the pain, in terms of insecurity and material cost, is much worse than ever. We, as a Nation, have been very fortunate in having placed before us a laboratory example of how the "womb to tomb" pattern works out. With us, the menace of this false and unworkable political philosophy has crept up slowly and gradually, but in the British Isles, owing to a great number of circumstances, it was put into operation rapidly and with a high degree of completeness.

To establish this "womb to tomb" state, capital was liquidated or confiscated, industry was very largely nationalized, and every sort of assumed benefit was established for the so-called little people (incidentally a disgusting phrase invented by the "womb to tombers"). Quickly every sort of weakness in the system became apparent. The rich were wiped out almost entirely and with them the vast tax revenues which they provided. Industries were taken over and in the process another great block of vast tax revenues was destroyed. Worst of all, perhaps, was the virtual destruction of the solid middle class which built the wealth and power of the British Empire in the past and which is inevitably the very backbone, not only of Great Britain, but of any democratic government. The assumed aim of the "womb to tombers" was to level off everything and everybody, leveling up "the little people" and leveling down the rich, the middle classes and those individuals who were formerly rewarded in high earnings for their value to the state, the economy, and the general national welfare.

Essentially the process has proven to be much more one of leveling down rather than of leveling up and as this has occurred, increasing burdens, both material and of the spirit, have fallen upon the "little people" and will continue to do so with a rapidly gaining momentum.

In this process certain inevitable economic flaws developed—flaws which should have been apparent to any man who could add two and two. The "womb to tomb" theory made necessary at once a huge growth in bureaucracy to administer all the benefits of this new paradise, to pay out subsidies and benefits and police the inevitable chiselers, to collect more complicated and more burdensome taxes, to administer the nationalized industries in which the previously great tax revenues were destroyed. The cost of government increased enormously while the revenues from taxes upon capital, industry, and large incomes disappeared almost entirely. Somebody had to pay for this simultaneous increase in expense and decline in revenue. The next step was to try to pass the costs along to the middle class, a process which in an unbelievably short space of time destroyed the middle class itself, together with its revenues. So in the end everyone has to pay for "the womb to tomb" government and the burden of taxes and finances becomes levelled off and the "little people" pay more and more until it becomes apparent presently that in terms of high prices and taxes they pay in the end far more for a free set of false teeth or a dose of calomel than they would have paid under the old system. Moreover, the workingman and the miner found that there was no gain in working overtime to help national production and income because the government promptly took from him in taxes the money he was paid for the overtime. Some workers even have figured so closely the operations of the system that they have begun to practice deliberate absenteeism, because they found that taxwise they kept more money if they worked less.

These factors are, of course, only material and economic ones but they are far less important to the survival and welfare of nations and even of mankind than the other sacrifices which have been made for a bigger bureaucracy, more taxes and greater hardships. These sacrifices concern directly and inevitably the spirit and the dignity and the freedom not only of the individual but eventually of civilization itself. Let's examine some of the noneconomic sacrifices in the case of that once great nation and that once great democracy known as the United Kingdom of Great Britain.

The so-called Labor Government, let us remember, and especially when we are listening to the arguments of Walter Reuther and some of his friends. Let us remember that the Labor Government is almost entirely made up of the leaders of the trades-unions. Once these unions became the Government, the organized workingman lost the right to strike or even indeed to negotiate in a free sense. They could not strike against themselves, and we have already been treated to the spectacle of the British Labor Government ordering out troops to break strikes occurring among its own unionized Labor Party members. In Great Britain today many workers are frozen on the jobs they are doing and have lost the right to take another and better job or to move to another community. Wage raises are entirely determined by the bureaucracy. A man cannot erect a building, from chicken coop to palace, on his own land with the materials coming from his own land without a permit from the bureaucracy. There is even the absurd case of one farmer who started constructing a small building made from rammed earth coming from his own farm and was ordered to stop the construction and destroy what already existed because he did not have the necessary permit. And the farmer * * * today if a farmer does not operate his land according to the ideas and orders of a distant bureaucracy it is sold from under him and he is dispossessed and the land goes into the hands of a man more amenable to the wishes of bureaucrats in far-off London, who, often enough, know little, or nothing, about agriculture.

The average British citizen can no longer even travel freely outside his own country, since he is not allowed to spend more than the equivalent of about $40 outside the islands. The ration of meat, eggs, and other edibles is today actually lower than at the very peak of the war shortages.

But the list is endless. It explains easily enough why a recent poll showed that 37 percent of British young people would leave England today for this country or some part of the Commonwealth if they found the means of getting out. Probably that 37 percent represents the cream of the nation's youth in terms of initiative, energy, and creative ability. But what young person of ability and ambition would want to live under the "womb to tomb" government if it were possible to escape?

All these troubles have been offered to the British in return for security, and security is something that no government and no bureaucracy can either bestow or guarantee. Security comes from the economic prosperity of a nation, from the rewards which go to intelligence, energy, and initiative, from the stability of a national currency and the freedom to develop the resources of a nation. Administrative bureaucrats, let me add, have never been brilliant and creative men and never will be, by the very nature of their calling and by the type of man who seeks a bureaucrat's job. That is mere simple psychology.

As the pain-killer begins to wear off in this country, the aches associated with the Socialist "womb to tomb" Government are beginning to appear. As the bureaucratic costs of our Government have been increased 3 to 500 percent, the tax burden has increased steadily and, under the theory of taxing according to ability to pay has been carried out, the burden has fallen on the big corporation, the big fortunes, the big earning capacity until the point of diminishing returns has been reached and the higher the taxes the less the revenue is the result. Beyond this point lies the crisis where confiscation of capital in one way or another becomes the rule, and when that comes the vast productivity which is the source of our wealth and power as a Nation will evaporate as it has done in Great Britain. We have already reached that point where the burden of increased taxes to operate our bureaucracy will have to be spread largely over the people in the lower-income brackets. This has already begun to occur. It will not benefit this most important element of our society to increase taxes in the higher brackets until these incomes begin to disappear, nor will confiscation of capital or nationalization of industry make their situation easier. Such a process would only mean that the taxes in the lower brackets would be steadily increased as they have been in Great Britain. On the other hand if the able individual and the great efficient corporation is permitted freedom of operation, the tax revenues from both increase steadily and the burden on the smaller income becomes progressively less and less.

The operations of economic laws are fairly exact and much simpler than Lord Keynes and some of his followers would try to make us believe. That this is true, we are beginning to discover the hard way and let us hope that we shall not have to go through all the miseries of Great Britain in order to act in time.

The idea that Government or bureaucracy alone can provide security is at this very moment blowing up in our faces. As a very nearly perfect example, let us take the case of social security. At the time this manifestation of the "womb to tomb" state was set up, a certain rate of in-payments was established and in relation to it a certain pension was established which was regarded as sufficient to provide comfort for the declining years of the average citizen. And so what happens? We have a Government and a system and certain economic conditions which bring about and even encourage inflation, and suddenly the pensioner who gets his social-security payments upon retirement finds that he is being paid off in 50-cent dollars while the money which he paid into the fund for his security was largely paid in 100-cent dollars. In other words, he is getting half as much as he was guaranteed by a Government who took his money, giving him no choice in how he might invest it. And so Congress is forced to increase the amount of the security pensions by 100 percent or more and increase in-payments as well. This process could, of course, go on indefinitely for we have no assurance that inflation will not bring us within a few years to a 30-cent dollar or even a 10-cent dollar. Then where will be the retirement security promised by Government and bureaucracy? I have spent a good part of my life in Europe and I have seen what happened under these conditions in Europe. The process destroyed not only the security of people living on government or industrial pensions but the security of those who had invested in insurance annuities and government bonds. People in old age who believed themselves safe were forced to go back to work by the thousands in order to get enough to eat. The situation was worse and more cruel than anything happening here during the great depression of the thirties.

For a generation the political and social progression in this country has constantly moved toward the abominable fallacy of the "womb to tomb" philosophy. It has been variously called the New Deal, the welfare state, and by other names. That does not matter. What is serious is that the whole movement has been toward greater power in government and the gradual destruction of free will and individual determination for the citizen and the individual community. The very measure which imposes participation in social security by law is in itself a fundamental infringement upon the rights of the individual who should not be ordered where and how he is to invest any portion of his savings, much less so when an acre of land or a small house would provide for him a much greater degree of security than the currency or the bonds of a government engaged in the inflationary process.

If we had no other means of gaging the welfare of peoples and states under the "womb to tomb" philosophy, we have only to check off for comparison the nations of Europe. The greater the degree of state dominion and Socialist "womb to tomb" philosophy, the lower the living standards and the greater the hardships of the people, the lower the state of economic prosperity of the nation and the greater its peril in the world struggle for production and markets. Check off the countries one by one from Belgium or France with the lightest burdens of socialism through to Great Britain with its "womb to tomb" government of Soviet Russia and Hungary where not only are all personal liberties destroyed but the living standards are as low as any in the world. Those nations in which free enterprise was allowed to flourish made the quickest and most solid recovery. In the others, including Great Britain, the prospect of any recovery at all seems dim indeed.

What we are witnessing is the final struggle between the German ideology of the painful nineteenth century on the one hand and the French philosophy of the enlightened eighteenth century on the other, a struggle between the ideas of a disgruntled psychoneurotic called Karl Marx and the civilized and serene philosophy of Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin. And do not be deceived by those quibblers who insist that there is a difference between communism and socialism. Both have their roots in the brutal and primitive thinking of Marx. Socialism is merely the old Marxian fallacies watered down by the intellectuals and the so-called liberals. Those who believe that one can engage in a little socialism without arriving in the end at the full bureaucratic ruthlessness of communism are merely deceiving themselves. To quote an old chestnut, you cannot be a little Communist any more than you can be a little pregnant. The mere continuing weight of bureaucracy, of taxes, of state domination, forces more and more measures which oppress the people stil further until in the end all their liberties are destroyed.

We have heard a great deal in recent years about communism and Communists, and their infiltration into our Government. They are dangerous and subversive and their influence should be stamped out but I doubt that the influence of the direct and avowed Communist is so dangerous to our welfare and our liberties as that of the so-called liberal, the pink thinker and politician, the demi-Socialist, the demivirgin of political life. In this group some advocate the "womb to tomb" state cynically and unscrupulously because so long as the pain killer is working, it gets votes. Some advocate the paternalistic state through plain stupidity and confused thinking. Some promote it because it gives them a warm feeling in the pit of the stomach and makes them feel that they are better and more humanitarian and more sanctified than other citizens, although they are actually destroying slowly the greatest privileges man can know—the privileges of free thought and independence and the right to mold his own life.

The out-and-out Communist is easy to detect and to some extent an easy snake to scotch. Not so the demi-Communist liberal whose ideas are direct from Karl Marx and watered down. He insinuates his poison under the guise of virtue and smugness. He is the one who is used by the Communist as a front behind which the Communist can hide. Recent history goes to prove that the Communist could not have operated at all within our Government save with the cooperation and behind the shelter of the so-called liberal. Of the two I would prefer to fight the Communist. Often enough he is easier to fight because you know him as your enemy. He does not deceive himself or wrap himself in the robes of sanctity and hypocrisy as does the liberal who is often enough too stupid to understand what he is doing or that he is being used. It is through the pinkish reformer that Great Britain has arrived at her disastrous situation. In the case of every nation in Europe taken over by communism and Soviet Russia, it has always been the so-called liberal who prepared the way and held the door ajar. Once the enemy was inside the gates the liberals were liquidated in a wholesale fashion, but it was too late. The tragic damage had already been done.

You may have noticed that I have used the expression "so-called liberal." I do so advisedly because the word "liberal" has become debased both in this country and Europe. It no longer has any real meaning and for some it has even the color of opprobrium. Franklin and Jefferson were very great liberals, indeed, but who would dare suggest that they would support for an instant the freedom-destroying doctrines of many of those half-Mexicans who today call themselves liberals.

I believe that at last, as the pain killers of subsidy, bribery, promises, and humbug are wearing off, all of us are beginning to understand where lie the roots of our freedom, our strength, our prosperity, our human dignity. The recent elections, particularly in this great State of Ohio, pointed in that direction. If we have any doubts let us simply look at the record, let us look at what happens to any nation throughout history which has followed the theory that the state should rule man and not man the state. The record is as clear as the rising sun on a beautiful morning.

Investigation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, March 16, 1951

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The RFC Should Be Abolished," published in the Baltimore Sun, an editorial entitled "Time To Ring Down Curtain on the RFC," from the Jacksonville

Journal, and an editorial entitled "Why Keep the RFC?", from the Washington Star.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore (Md.) Sun of March 16, 1951]

THE RFC SHOULD BE ABOLISHED

No single episode in the shabby RFC story brought out by the Fulbright investigation really justifies the abolition of the RFC. And yet there is a rising demand that the RFC be abolished. Why?

The answer is implicit in the original establishment of the RFC back in the days of the depression. This organization, properly called the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, was a creature of the emergency. The credit system of the United States had broken down almost completely. A pinch hitter was needed for doing what the banks and other credit institutions normally do. The RFC was the pinch-hitter, and it did what it was designed to do.

The emergency passed away. But the RFC did not. The crying need for private access to public credit disappeared. But the RFC kept right on providing private access to public credit. Government agencies have a way of lingering, and even of continuing to expand, after the need which brought them into being is gone. That is just what happened in the case of the RFC.

But when a public institution outlives its usefulness it sometimes becomes not merely useless but noxious. That also is what has happened in the case of the RFC.

For one thing, we find that, because banks and private credit institutions stand ready to lend money to sound enterprises, it is the marginal enterprises, the highly dubious credit risks, which tend to flock around the RFC. The RFC has become a "soft touch."

There is another point. When the RFC came into being, this country was in deep depression. Now conditions have been exactly reversed. This country enjoys an unexampled business activity. This country, far from being in depression, is in a period of inflation. One of the recognized methods of combating inflation is to cut down on available supplies of credit, since lending swells the supply of money.

The United States Government at the present time is supposed to be fighting inflation. In various ways it is trying to cut down on credit. And yet, while it struggles with this problem, it continues to maintain the RFC as a "soft touch" credit agency—an agency, in other words, which, by making easy loans to marginal enterprises, actually promotes inflation.

A reorganization such as Mr. Truman now proposes would wash the face, so to speak, of the RFC. But it would not correct the Government's inconsistency in maintaining an easy-credit agency in time of inflation. We do not see any justification for its continuance. There are no useful RFC functions which cannot be dealt with as readily by some other agency of the Federal Government. We believe that the RFC should be abolished, its assets liquidated, and such useful functions as it may still have transferred to other appropriate agencies.

[From the Jacksonville (Fla.) Journal of March 13, 1951]

TIME TO RING DOWN CURTAIN ON THE RFC

It seemed fair to hold off conclusive judgment about the RFC until the Senate's inquiry was well advanced. That stage has now been reached. And the findings point to just one sensible course: The abolition of the RFC.

As everyone knows, Herbert Hoover created the RFC as a depression emergency device to help keep tottering big business going in the dark days. It was never contemplated that the agency should go permanently into the banking business in competition with our private banking system.

But that is in fact exactly what happened. More than that, the RFC became a sort of court of last resort to which business firms appealed after all regular banks had turned a deaf ear. Many such concerns were granted loans, in defiance of what private bankers considered sound lending practice.

No doubt this greater liberality often had beneficial results, but that cannot be allowed to obscure the essential that the RFC was serving as a vast commercial bank. On several occasions, indeed, the RFC's well-known liberality enabled private banks to transfer to that agency outstanding loans the banks rated as poor risks.

The private banking system is perfectly qualified, except perhaps in extreme emergencies, to meet all the credit needs of the expanding United States economy. There is no point in having the Government competing in this field.

But as it has developed in the Capital, the issue goes well beyond the economic justifications for keeping or abolishing the RFC. Basically, the problem has become a moral one.

What the investigation of Senator FULBRIGHT'S subcommittee has disclosed is a supreme example of the folly of Government by crony—"cronyism," as some have styled it.

Too often President Truman has placed in key Government office not the most fit men, nor even well-qualified men, but simply men he knew and liked. He frequently complains that he cannot attract competent men to many important posts, but the record indicates he at numerous times went out of his way to assure such jobs to his friends.

It is the thoughtful testimony of several seasoned Washington observers that Mr. Truman has thereby committed a host of Federal commissions and bureaus to deteriorate dangerously. The Civil Aeronautics Board, the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Power Commission, these are among them.

Worse than this, the President has maintained an almost fanatical loyalty to the cronies holding these jobs. Loyalty is a noble trait, and it isn't the only one the American people admire in Mr. Truman. But loyalty to incompetent men—friends or not—is misplaced. The President would do much better to be loyal to high standards of performance.

Moreover, this attitude has been aggravated by his insistence upon regarding every attack upon a subordinate as fundamentally an assault upon him as President. Thus he has tended to discount the criticisms as always political, never sincere.

Senator FULBRIGHT may not be without political motive, but the facts unearthed by his committee cannot be brushed off as campaign fantasies. The expensive mink coat given to a White House secretary, the free vacations for White House functionaries (and Senators, too, for that matter) at the expense of a Florida hotel manager who won an RFC loan, the innumerable pay-offs through awards of high-salaried business jobs to former RFC men, these compound into a sordid, immoral story.

Apparently only the strongest men, administrators like Jesse Jones and Eugene Meyer, can keep a Government lending agency from sinking into the morass of loans by political favor. Establish an institution dealing in billions—passed out on fairly easy terms—and you have a set-up ideally suited to political machinations. Flies always collect around the honey pot.

The result is not only a weakening of the RFC itself, but a general lowering of moral behavior in many parts of the administration, in Congress, and elsewhere.

Mr. Hoover, Jesse Jones, and others have called for RFC's demise. To abolish the agency would be to set an example, to start Government back up the road to sound moral performance.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Star]

WHY KEEP THE RFC?

If the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is to be kept alive, the reorganization plan advocated by the President, and which has survived a Republican attack in the House, is clearly desirable.

Under this plan, the five-man Board of Directors would be abolished and all RFC operations would be placed under a single Administrator. Senator FULBRIGHT, whose subcommittee has been letting a little light into some of the darker RFC corners, favors this change. The single Administrator system, he says, is "the best method of preventing or, at least, minimizing the conditions now being revealed in our hearings."

When this matter comes before the Senate, however, that body should give very careful consideration to the desirability of abolishing the RFC. Certainly this should be done if the reorganization would do no more than minimize the disgraceful practices which have been exposed by the Fulbright committee. And even if the change would prevent such practices, which is doubtful, it is hard to see wherein the public interest would be served by continuing, in a period of inflation, a Federal agency that was created to meet a need born of deep economic depression, and whose economic influence in these changed times probably is definitely harmful.

When Herbert Hoover asked Congress to set up the RFC on December 8, 1931, this country was in the grip of a paralyzing depression. Normal sources of credit had dried up or had been cut off. The need of Federal assistance was self-evident. Still, even so, Mr. Hoover urged that the proposed RFC "should be placed in liquidation at the end of 2 years." But the familiar pattern has been followed. Twenty years later, when cheap, easy, and abundant credit is our greatest source of economic danger, the adminstration wants to maintain as a going concern an agency which has outlived its usefulness, and which has become a kind of happy hunting ground for those who want to finance dubious ventures with public funds.

The Hoover Commission task force which studied the RFC strongly urged that it be abolished. The full Commission did not adopt this recommendation, although it frowned on many of the things the RFC had been doing. Senator BYRD has taken up the task-force proposal, however, and has served notice that he will seek the abolition of the agency, which he regards as being not only useless in these times, but which also serves as a "workshop for get-rich-quick political predators."

The most meritorious argument that can be made for continuing the RFC is that the agency, if kept alive on a stand-by basis, might serve some useful purpose if conditions should change. But experience has shown that Federal agencies, especially agencies with money to lend, do not sit quietly by waiting for a change of economic climate. If the money is there, the smart operators will be after it. And the chances are that they will always be able to get it, by one device or another, regardless of whether any public interest is served in the process. Senator FULBRIGHT's statement indicates that this is true; and, in the Star's judgment, the RFC should be liquidated as quickly as possible, unless better arguments can be made for its continuance than have been heard to this time.

Pensions for Disabled Veterans Inadequate

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACOB K. JAVITS
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 27, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, compensation for totally disabled veterans is lagging so seriously behind the cost of living as to jeopardize families and family life. The Nation owes these veterans the highest obligation. The fact speaks more eloquently than argument. Their case demands correction. Appended are two letters from a constituent of mine, a totally disabled veteran, expressing this plea and the need for correction in such detail as to deserve the study of every Member. It is such testimony as this from those directly affected which should produce the needed legislation promptly:

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 20, 1951.
Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am a totally disabled veteran of World War I. I receive compensation of $171 per month for a service-connected disability. Considering the present-day high cost of food and medical care, I assure you that this is entirely insufficient for my wife and myself to live on decently. I don't mention the prohibitive cost of clothing, because those items are in the realm of luxury for us, even though we are sorely in need of new clothing as a sheer necessity. Every time we buy food or medicine, another item has been increased in price. My wife has been ill for several years and, not desirous of accepting charity treatment, she has foregone some necessary medical care, resulting in a detriment to her state of health. Even at this writing, my wife needs a doctor's attention, but we cannot afford to consult one. There are many other disabled veterans and their families who are forced to exist under similar conditions.

The totally disabled war veterans have no other source of income, and we are entirely dependent upon the Congress of the United States for a decent existence. I am therefore appealing to you and the collective heart of our Congress, as a humanitarian gesture, to alleviate this situation with appropriate legislation to reasonably increase the present disability compensation rates. As your views in this respect are well known to and appreciated by disabled veterans, we will be highly honored if you would cosponsor such legislation on the floor of the House. And may I further request that such legislation be favorably consummated at a very early date, so that we may enjoy the luxury of living decently as soon as possible? In the past, such matters have generally been taken up at the close of congressional sessions. But are not disabled veterans entitled to more pressing consideration, after national security?

Are we asking for too much, just to live decently? You have my utmost assurance that, were I able to work, I would not humiliate myself by writing this letter.

I assure you that such a kind act by the Congress, and by you, personally, will be sincerely appreciated by my wife and myself; by the thousands of disabled veterans, like myself, who are unable to work; and by those disabled veterans who further jeopardize their disabilities by working.

Won't you please make the waning years of an old soldier happy with a favorable reply to his appeal, and with your favorable reaction to match the reply? All disabled war veterans will be sincerely grateful to be able to finally live decently.

In these days of world crises, may our Congress and Government be guided by the wisdom of God.

Very respectfully,
PHILIP E. RICHARDS.

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 19, 1951.
Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I appreciate very sincerely your kind, sympathetic, and encouraging letter of February 16, in reply to mine of January 20, a copy of which I am enclosing. In these days of the entirely uncalled-for high cost of living, when the disabled veterans depend on the humane understanding of our Congress, and a prayer to God, for a decent existence for our families, it fills me with exhilarating relief to receive such a genuinely sincere and understanding letter from you.

Is there not someone in our Congress who will take the initiative to ease the burden of the disabled war veterans, and follow it thru successfully at a very early date? Since the advent of the Korean war, the cost of living has been increasing regularly every week, especially food and medicine. And even though food prices were supposedly "frozen" on January 25, the prices of these necessities of life are still increasing. And, according to the OPS, the prices of food will continue to increase until midsummer.

The great majority of organized labor has not felt this increased cost of living, having received substantial pay increases. But what about me, with a fixed income of $171 per month, as a totally disabled war veteran? What are my wife and I supposed to eat? And how am I supposed to take care of the medical needs of my sick wife? I don't like to beg all the time—it's humiliating. But, like most disabled war veterans, I am entirely dependent on the Congress for a decent existence. Am I not entitled to live decently, just like organized labor?

There are several bills, calling for increases in disability compensation rates, pending in the House Veterans' Affairs Committee. In view of the tense situation in which disabled veterans find themselves in order to live decently, and as you are greatly respected as a sincere friend of disabled veterans, would it be an imposition on my part in urgently requesting that you do something to have one of these measures expedited through this committee, and then acted on favorably and expeditiously by the Rules Committee, so that it can reach the floor of the House for a vote very soon?

My wife and I will be very grateful, like all disabled veterans, for this humanitarian gesture on your part, and all of us will anxiously await early action, in this respect, by the Congress. Please favor me with some good news at your very earliest convenience.

In my humble way, permit me to hope that you may enjoy good health, happiness and Godly wisdom in the future, so that you will continue to serve our country in the same unselfish manner for many years to come.

Very respectfully,
PHILIP E. RICHARDS.

Good Forestry With Competition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, March 16, 1951

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement entitled "Good Forestry With Competition," by Joe M. Crahane, of Brownsville, Oreg.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOOD FORESTRY WITH COMPETITION

State and United States foresters, conservationists, the Department of the Interior, together with various other public agencies and local and national organizations, have in the past few years been concerned with the depletion problems of our forests, both publicly and privately owned. There have been, likewise, scores of bills introduced in both our Congress and our State legislatures attempting to provide protection for our natural resources, so that we and future generations may have timber, that the mills may operate steadily and furnish annual employment, which will play a big part in the stabilization of our communities. A constant source of employment is very essential.

Now in view of all that had been said with respect to depleting and denuding our forests, there had been comparatively little done in way of good forestry management up until the last few years. But in the last few years, through the continual rising price of stumpage caused by the shortage and scarcity of timber, it became apparent to many that timber is a profitable crop. They have also concluded that it pays to be careful in logging not to destroy the reproduction. Many are also of the opinion that trees planted now will produce a fair crop in 60 years. Some are so strong in this belief that they are really practicing good forestry and are putting a large portion of their earnings into forestry as an investment. But it took an incentive to bring about this new thinking. It wasn't altogether the thought of the future generation. It wasn't that our public spirited people and conservationists were demanding it. It was the potential profit they could see in good forestry. Yes, if it wasn't a profitable investment no one but the Federal Government could invest in such a long-shot program. But while some are convinced that sustained yield forestry is good business many are doubtful and say the risk is too great. Personally I agree—it is a big risk. But it is worth it.

There are others, however, who will not be convinced that the policy is sound. There are too many things, political and economic, which might cause an investment to be worthless. These very people who preached conservation might help implement some deal whereby it would be a poor investment.

Some operators are definitely of the opinion that only the United States should attempt such long-range planning and they have resolved to take what timber is available and run the mill just as long as they can without attempting to conserve timber, protect the reproduction, or make an effort to restock, as well as have consideration for the economy and general stability of the community.

However, if we are allowed to continue under the new policy adopted by the Bureau of Land Management, Department of the Interior, about 2 years ago I am sure that at least one-half of the operators will fall in line with the few who are now practicing good forestry. They, too, would see that it is the only way they can hope to have a lasting—perhaps perpetual—lumbering operation.

This new policy that I refer to came into existence in 1948 and it had to do with the administration of O. & C. lands in western Oregon. This new regulation is based on the premise that all operators shall have an equal opportunity to purchase Federal timber, and that Federal timber shall be sold on bids to the highest bidder in accordance with some qualifications of the bidder pertaining to State and Federal laws, roads, marketing areas, etc.

The Bureau of Land Management is doing a splendid job of administering the public lands, opening up these timber tracts for the public to buy on auction and sealed bids, giving the mill operators a chance to compete for the purchase of the timber, and in so doing has caused the bidders to pay a good price—as much as 30 percent on an average more than the appraised values. It is true that it required good milling facilities to get the most out of the high-priced stumpage but we are pleased with the results. If the other fellow can outbid us, we are still happy. We will be happy as long as we have an equal opportunity to compete. We hope we can continue to have competition and not allocation as it would obviously be if Federal stumpage price is to remain frozen. For if stumpage is frozen it will be impossible to deal justly with the many bidders. If there are six bidders on one tract, who will have the knowledge to judge which one of the six shall get the timber? Even if there are two bidders or a dozen bidders, who can make such a decision? Shall he allocate the timber to the mill that has some timber of its own or to the operator who has done nothing to perpetuate the industry or who has done a very poor job of forestry or who has given little thought to what effect the denuded lands in his logged-over areas would have on the economic stability of the community? Will the allocator take into consideration the good forester who has been doing the job which has in the past been so strongly recommended by good forestry men and conservationists, as well as put a fair part of his earnings into this program which is so essential to perpetuate good forestry?

The Bureau of Land Management has gone a long way in good forestry in the last 2 years. It is the Bureau of Land Management and the competitive system that has caused many operators to practice better forestry. These operators believe that with the small stands of their own timber, some purchased from ranchers and others, and an opportunity to bid in Federal tracts of timber—maybe two or four million feet a year—they can operate perpetually on a small scale. These small operators will always be a source of revenue for the small towns and their employees will feel they have job security and in turn will build better homes and schools.

We must understand there is not enough Federal timber to go half way around and if we lose out on our bid for it we will have to assume that the other fellow is a better operator and has a better mill and will come to the conclusion that we will have to bring our plant up to date in order to compete with our competitor. But if the timber is allocated to certain mills, good mills as well as poor ones do not have an opportunity to bid. It will destroy the incentive for those who have tried to do the job right. Encourage the good operator by giving him an equal opportunity. Encourage the man who is doing good forestry. All he wants is an equal opportunity. He doesn't necessarily have to buy timber but he does want an equal opportunity, and especially so if he has practiced good forestry.

In order to supply a greater amount of lumber for the military requirements, it is essential that we have competition in the purchase of Federal timber. We cannot have competition with allocation, and allocation is essential with the price ceiling on stumpage. It is not necessary to put a ceiling on stumpage to keep operators from paying too much. Ceilings are created and applied to check hoarding and profiteering and are also a factor in checking inflation but it is not necessary that Uncle Sam place a ceiling on his own commodities.

Don't destroy the good system we now have for fear an operator is going to pay too much for Federal timber. They have taken care of themselves in the past and they will continue to do so. The ceiling on lumber will regulate the price of stumpage. Operators will not bid more than that which they can afford to pay. They have not done so in the past and there is no reason to believe they will in the future. Take the freeze off Federal timber and avoid discrimination. Make timber available with access roads. When timber is available it creates competition. The extra money obtained through access roads will more than pay for the roads and the lumber industry will more than meet both military and civilian requirements.

Intertie Between Bonneville Power System and Shasta Dam in California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, March 16, 1951

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "State Master's Comments," published in the Grange News of February 24, 1951; also an editorial entitled "Mr. Chapman Has Spoken," published in the Grange News of March 3, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Grange News of February 24, 1951]

STATE MASTER'S COMMENTS

CALIFORNIA INTERTIE

Much is being said and written these days about the proposed intertie between the Bonneville power system and Shasta Dam in California. One of the latest arguments advanced is that the intertie would save 5,000,000 barrels of oil which otherwise will be needed to operate steam plants to generate electricity for California.

This seems like a mighty flimsy excuse when we consider the huge cost of the intertie and the heavy load losses that would result from such long-distance transmission of power. This would greatly increase the power costs in this region, which has so ably demonstrated the soundness of the existing Bonneville wholesale rates.

Of the $521,000,000 that the Government has spent on these projects, the Bonneville system has in this short time returned to the Federal Treasury $170,000,000, of which $70,000,000 represented interest. In the fiscal year 1949–50 the surplus of $42,000,000 was increased to $54,000,000. In other words, the system earned more than $12,000,000 above the amount needed to retire the principal and interest due on the entire cost of the system.

Not until we have a surplus of power here will the people of the Pacific Northwest feel justified in permitting any of this power—so essential to carry on the region's industries and production—to be siphoned into other areas.

No amount of statistics and political maneuvering will ever convince the people of this region that they should stand by and submit to being robbed of their great natural heritage, the Columbia River and its power. (H. P. C.)

[From the Grange News of March 3, 1951]

MR. CHAPMAN HAS SPOKEN

Oscar Chapman, Secretary of the Interior, has calmly brushed aside Pacific Northwest opposition to the "California intertie" power transmission line which would link the Bonneville system with that of the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. near Shasta Dam. Although practically everybody in this region has "kicked like a steer" at the intertie proposed by his Bureau of Reclamation for the past 2 years or more, this sentiment has not ruffled a hair of Mr. Chapman's smoothly combed head. Ordinarily one would think that people living nearest to a problem would be best qualified to analyze it, but Mr. Chapman seems to know more than all of the Pacific northwesterners put together—even at a 3,000-mile distance.

There has been real basis for the fear that this power link would make an irreparable break in the breastworks of space that now protect the Northwest from raids on its Columbia River water and power supplies. Recent events lend more substance to this fear.

Without waiting for a congressional appropriation, Mr. Chapman blandly announces that the Bureau of Reclamation has started surveys of the intertie, and that construction will be completed in November 1952. Ignoring arguments challenging the feasibility of the project, its lack of defense need as compared with steam plants within this region, and the unjustifiable "profits" to be made by the Bureau of Reclamation from selling 2-mill Columbia River in California's 5-mill market, Secretary Chapman blithely reiterates that the intertie will bring 100,000 kilowatts of California power to "firm up" supplies for Northwest aluminum plants, like a dog team firming up a Great Northern freight train. In the same breath he says it would save California 730,000 barrels of oil, which indicates the real one-way nature of the plan.

Last year, on a Grange radio program here, Mr. Chapman denied any intention of permitting construction of the intertie. A verbatim transcription of his remarks shows him trying to reassure the Northwest that the intertie was "just talk." He said there had been "no request" for funds, "no authorization * * * whatsoever for any kind of these projects." "Moreover," he added, "you have got to protect your basic resources, which is cheap power. You would have to be very serious and careful before you would make an interchange of connection which would raise your cost."

But the outbreak of the Korean war 2 months later furnished Mr. Chapman an excuse for labeling the intertie a defense project, and as such it was put through the O. K. mill of the Defense Power Administration which he heads.

Now it seems that the people who opposed a Columbia Valley Administration are getting a taste of what they so lovingly referred to as "efficient existing agencies." Instead of a "three-man dictatorship" we've got a one-man paternalism telling us what's best for us—from 3,000 miles distant.

If the Northwest can't stop construction of a supertransmission line which will tap its main power supply, how can it hope to prevent that line from being used to draw the lion's share of that power to a "market" that's ready, eager and waiting to take it? (B.)

Truman Administration Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, March 16, 1951

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "The People Say No" published in the Omaha World-Herald of March 9, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEOPLE SAY NO

Dorothy Thompson's column which appears elsewhere on this page was written before yesterday's vote by the Armed Services Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate.

But that vote strongly emphasizes the truth which Miss Thompson cites, namely: That the American people, by overwhelming opinion, have rejected the foreign policies of the Truman administration.

This truth is attested to by virtually every poll that has been taken. It is emphasized by the floods of letters received by newspapers and Members of Congress. It is revealed anew by the vote of the two Senate committees, requiring that the administration gain the assent of both Houses of Congress before committing troops to the North Atlantic Command.

This was a staggering and generally unexpected reversal for the Messrs. Truman, Marshall, Acheson and Connally.

When Nebraska's Senator WHERRY first introduced the resolution which provided virtually the same restrictions as those voted by the committees yesterday, the administration leaders brought out the vitriol. This, they said, was vile isolationism. It would tie the hands of the responsible officials and give Joe Stalin a huge advantage vis-à-vis the democracies.

But yesterday the vote was 14 to 10 in favor of the Wherry stand. Three Democrats joined with the solid Republican block to reject the administration's demand.

What had happened?

Clearly, we think, the Senators had been reading the mail from home.

Since last June 25 the American people have been marched up to the very gates of the garrison state, and they do not like what they see.

They do not relish the prospect that for many years, possibly for the rest of their lives, they will be required to live in accordance with the iron whim of bureaucrats. They see little pleasure in giving a huge share of what they earn, and every year a huger share, to the tax collector.

This, they sense, is not the way to achieve true security nor is it the end to which a democratic people should aspire. Surely, they reason, there must be better ways to approach the problems of mankind than to plunge blindly down the road toward despotism and, maybe, oblivion.

It is unfortunately true that the Truman administration may be somewhat embarrassed, in its dealings with other nations, by the developments of yesterday.

But that is only an incident of the day. The embarrassment will pass. Of vastly more importance is the fact that the attitudes and convictions of the people finally have been communicated forcibly to the Congress.

At last we, the people, and our representatives are beginning to understand each other. That growing understanding, heralded by yesterday's vote, may prove to be the most significant event of 1951.

Resolutions Adopted at Chicago Conference of American Association for the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, March 16, 1951

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD resolutions which were adopted at the Chicago Conference of the American Association for the United Nations, held on February 25–27, 1951.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT CHICAGO CONFERENCE FEBRUARY 25–27, 1951, BY AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

PREAMBLE

We the duly appointed delegates of 91 broadly representative national organizations are gathered in Chicago under the auspices of the American Association for the United Nations in an emergency conference to discuss United States responsibility for world leadership. Speaking as individuals with a sense of responsibility to the organizations which appointed us, we express the following as the consensus of our meeting.

We believe that all people are equal and united to one another in the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God.

We are united in our support of the United Nations as the best hope of the peoples of the world to prevent war, to develop collective security, to promote negotiation among governments, to create world law, to aid the self-determination of peoples, to promote universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, and to advance economic welfare among all the peoples of the world.

We are united also in our conviction that war is not inevitable, and that the common efforts of the international community can direct the destinies of mankind.

Already the United Nations in five short years has to its credit the following impressive accomplishments:

1. It has through the Assembly resolution on uniting for peace pledged common action to resist aggression anywhere in the world and created the immediate means to do so not subject to veto.

2. It has moved through the overwhelming majority of nations to resist aggression in Korea and for the first time in history placed at the disposal of the international community the military and other aid of member nations.

3. It has aided in resolving conflicts that threatened the peace in half a dozen areas throughout the world and through its good offices brought about cease-fires, basic principles of self-determination, and peaceful settlements, notably in Indonesia and Israel.

4. It has aided the development into nationhood of subject colonial peoples and promoted the independence of non-self-governing peoples.

5. It has extended technical assistance and economic aid to underdeveloped countries, and through its many specialized agencies all over the world attacked the obstacles to world trade and economic welfare.

6. It has promoted human rights through the adoption for the first time in history of universal standards and is following them up by drafting enforceable covenants for freedom of information internationally and for economic and social rights as well as political and civil liberties. It has advanced the status of millions of women throughout the world and gained recognition for their political, educational, and economic rights. It has outlawed by international treaty the crime of genocide.

These are only the outstanding lines of achievement among a host of activities unprecedented in international action.

The United States, in conformity with the Charter's principles, is championing under its bipartisan foreign policy these efforts. Support of the United Nations Charter is the keystone of American policy. That policy, in and out of the United Nations, has buttressed the purposes of the Charter through economic aid to Europe and other parts of the world, the promotion of freer trade, and regional pacts for defense against aggression.

The United Nations is still in an early stage of development, with the prospect that its machinery will be improved as it may become necessary to make it more fully representative of the peoples of the world and with larger powers to meet their claims and needs. To strengthen it member nations should implement by their domestic action the decisions reached by United Nations organs. The leadership of the United States, for instance, in promoting the convention aganist genocide, adopted unanimously by the General Assembly in 1948, cannot be convincingly maintained until the United States Senate ratifies the convention, now already in effect by the action of other nations. Nor can the moral position of our country in world councils be maintained unless at home we raise our own standards by eliminating practices of racial and religious discrimination and by observing all the rights which we champion internationally.

The United Nations will grow in influence as it is faithfully used by the member nations as the major instrument of foreign policy. Unilateral action bypassing the United Nations in the fields of its activities tends to weaken the whole structure. Membership should be universally open to all nations who adhere to the principles of the Charter, so that it may as rapidly as possible become both the forum for negotiation and the means for action for all mankind.

COLLECTIVE SECURITY

We support the principle of collective security by which we mean the use of common force to protect all nations from aggression, as provided by the Charter. We reject as false the doctrine, from whatever source or spokesman, that the United States shall regard certain areas or peoples as expendable in its strategy of security. We reject such a doctrine as an inducement to aggression. We reject it as destructive of the collective strength of free peoples. We reject it as contrary to the Charter. Every member of the United Nations has an obligation to do what it reasonably can do to promote collective security. No nation has a right to purchase its security at the expense of another.

Intervention in Korea to repel the North Korean armies was the first demonstration of collective security by the use of armed forces under the flag of the United Nations. It was action based upon the law of the Charter, authorized by the United Nations, endorsed by 53 of its members, 26 of whom have furnished or offered practical military assistance.

The principle of collective security is as sound today as when the United Nations took action to repel the aggression against the Republic of Korea on June 25. The nations must profit by experience. The experience in Korea clearly demonstrates the necessity for improvement in collective-security action.

In the first place, troops must be designated in advance for call by the Security Council or the General Assembly; an adequate United Nations military staff must plan in advance for their coordination and command. The absence of such advance designations resulted in one nation sending a disproportionately large number of forces and in the inability of the United Nations to use all national forces that were offered.

The experience in Korea also shows that the United Nations must have appropriate organs to assess the political consequences of proposed military measures. Collective security cannot be achieved by permitting smaller aggressions to grow into universal war. Careful diplomacy by the United Nations and its members should seek to localize policing actions.

The United States should urge the United Nations immediately to implement the uniting-for-peace resolution adopted by the Fifth General Assembly, which provides for the designation of forces to be available to the General Assembly or the Security Council, for a Collective Measures Committee to plan further strategy of collective security, and for a Peace Observation Commission to watch troublesome frontiers.

DISARMAMENT

We fully support President Truman's suggestion in his UN Day speech of October 24, 1950, that there be a merger of the UN Commission on Atomic Energy and the UN Commission for Conventional Armaments, and that the new commission devise a plan whereby an enforceable, general, and universal disarmament might be achieved. Certainly an enforceable plan must provide for effective UN inspection and police forces.

We believe that the United States must under present conditions continue to muster its strength until the defenses of the free world are so strong that they will deter aggression by making its price too high. But no reasonable ground must be left for anyone to regard the measures of defense as designed for any purpose other than the preservation of peace and the protection of freedom against aggression. The gains for defense of any particular measure might otherwise be balanced by its dangers in provoking countermeasures or even aggression by others.

Therefore, in building our military strength we must make clear to the world that the goal of our country is a collective system to make possible the disarmament of all nations. The United States should boldly and forthrightly advocate a UN plan for stopping the arms race through general disarmament, enforceable by the United Nations. The clear vision of this as our goal would win the hearts and minds of war-weary peoples everywhere and inspire our allies and our own people in the common struggle to resist aggression.

CONCILIATION

The United Nations Charter places the processes of negotiation and conciliation first in its program for maintaining international peace and security. The United States and other members of the United Nations should with boldness and imagination seek every practical avenue of conciliation.

We urge that the proven and diverse patterns used in Palestine, Indonesia, Iran, and Greece be applied to new areas of conflict.

We do not accept the inevitability of war. While it is necessary to strengthen regional arrangements and to develop military forces for collective use against aggression, we urge unrelenting negotiation to find areas of agreement. Negotiations involve concessions by both sides. They require of the United States a broad understanding of the views and circumstances of other nations, without appeasement of aggression or any surrender of the basic principles of the Charter.

The work of the United Nations Good Offices Committee to arrange a cease fire in Korea should be encouraged. We recommend that the United States support a resolution in the General Assembly formally recommending to the parties the pattern of the Renville principles which became a basis for the settlement of the Indonesian dispute. Essentially these principles are a cease fire, demilitarized zones, progressive withdrawal of forces, interim government, free elections, a constitutional convention, and economic rehabilitation, all under the supervision of the United Nations. These principles are applicable not only to Korea but to similar conflicts that may arise. They are basic to any fair solution in the spirit of the Charter.

Negotiations in the major world conflicts will have a far greater chance of success as the collective forces of the free world become stronger. But there is danger that in their all-out determination to develop the necessary military forces, the American people may come to assume the inevitability of war and fail to seek all practical avenues of negotiation and conciliation. We Americans must not lose the capacity for a bold initiative for peace.

COEXISTENCE OF DIVERSE SYSTEMS

More important than any specific decision is the growth of a United Nations mind with its developing parliamentary practices and sense of unity of mankind. The Soviet Union, it is true, leads a minority of Communist states in frequent opposition to the majority. We must evidently accept for an indefinite future the coexistence of diverse policies and systems of government. Adjustment to such differences is urged by the basic principle of the Charter—the sovereign equality of states. All states, whatever their forms, must now learn to live and let live under the principles of the Charter. The fact that both the dictatorships and democracies continue to take a vigorous part in United Nations debates keeps the door open for eventual adjustment of the conflicts that now divide the world. That door should never be closed. The ultimate dissolution of police states and tyrannical governments will be measured by the degree democracy succeeds in meeting the insistent demands of the world's peoples for greater freedoms, enduring peace, and rising standards of living.

SPECIAL PROBLEMS OF ASIA AND AFRICA

A great economic and social revolution is taking place in Asia. Hundreds of millions in that part of the world are throwing off the yoke of colonialism, and at the same time are striving for better economic and social conditions. Communism is not the moving impulse behind the revolutionary upheavals in Asia. Communism is the means by which Soviet imperialism has attempted to take advantage of the vacuum created by the failure of the Western World to understand the forces of nationalism and social revolution in Asia. The liberal policies pursued in freeing India, Pakistan, the Philippines, and Indonesia have led to a spirit of cooperation and friendliness in these countries with the Western World. These newly awakened peoples in Asia have taken their place in the United Nations, and from their ranks have come some of the great statesmen of the United Nations.

The same nationalist and revolutionary forces are alive in Africa. Whether we shall see repeated there the tragedies of China and Indochina will depend on the understanding and leadership which the members of the United Nations give to the peoples of that great continent.

In finding peaceful solutions there must be greater understanding of the appalling conditions of poverty, illiteracy, and disease under which millions are living and which prevent them from responding to the appeal of our democratic society. Each people must recognize that its culture and political ideals cannot have a universal application.

HIGHER STANDARDS OF LIVING

One of the basic goals of the United Nations for an orderly world is to assure to the peoples of underdeveloped countries, numbering more than two-thirds of mankind, the opportunity to raise their living standards by developing their resources, food supplies, and industries. Only so can hungry and desperate peoples be saved from the false salvation of totalitarian promises, and participate in international efforts for universal education, human rights, and peace.

Already the United Nations through technical assistance teams is engaged in such a program. Bilateral projects by the United States are also in progress under point 4. The British Commonwealth nations have set up a regional technical assistance and aid program on a vast scale for southeast Asia. The resources of the United States devoted to such purposes should be channeled to the maximum degree practical through the United Nations, or with the advice of its agencies, in order to unify all effort under international direction. Similar aid which may be given to the British Commonwealth plan should be likewise channeled.

The deplorable disparity between arms and welfare is illustrated by the fact that the world's military budgets this year approach $100,000,000,000, but total contributions for technical assistance and aid through the United Nations, from the United States and from the British Commonwealth plan, will not exceed a tiny fraction of the military totals.

Greater boldness and imagination must be aroused in carrying forward this program on a world scale if the false promises of communism and fascism are to be discredited. Food surpluses in some nations should be used for relief in others. Mutually advantageous trade must be greatly increased. Capital investment in undeveloped areas should be encouraged. Technical assistance to enable these peoples to pool their own capital through their own agencies should be used to expand their facilities, skills, and industries.

While recognizing as we do the immediate necessity of a large rearmament program on all the fronts of the free world, we believe that the fullest development of the United Nations technical assistance program will only become possible as the disarmament goals here stated become effectual. The United States Government should take the lead in declaring its intention that with the gradual reduction of its military appropriations that will be possible with a workable enforcement of disarmament, it will contribute correspondingly increasing sums to the United Nations fund for economic development.

At the same time, however, our Government should now give reassurances that during the present period of necessary heavy military expenditures we will maintain and expand our United States program, both governmental and private, of technical and economic assistance to the greatest extent possible within the limits of our economic capacities. For we must not relax our vigorous pursuit of the constructive task of raising the standards of living of the peoples of the world. This will demand of us all that we sacrifice for this great goal as we are sacrificing for military preparedness.

HUMAN RIGHTS

The United States, with other nations, has assumed great obligations for the advancement of human rights through the diverse efforts of the United Nations.

Despite the political conflicts which so largely mark the United Nations, practical work is steadily progressing to promote one of the major objectives of the charter: the universal protection of human rights for all men and women in the world. The universal declaration adopted at Paris in 1948 is being followed up by the drafting of a covenant, which we urge the United States to support with provisions for the right of private petition and for effective inquiry and conciliation, and for judicial review of legal issues. No reservations should be adopted which concede to state jurisdiction any exemption from the operations of international standards agreed to by the United States.

Simultaneously with the drafting of a covenant, we urge the practical implementation of the universal declaration, already recognized in principle in many situations. The Assembly resolution urging wide popular education in the principles of the declaration should be a concern of all organizations committed to promoting the United Nations.

We support the varied efforts of the United Nations in the promotion of human rights through its agencies on the status of women, freedom of information by press, radio, and newsreels, on the prevention of discrimination and the protection of minorities, on forced labor, trade-union rights, slavery, and the greater liberties of non-self-governing peoples.

We regard all these efforts as constituting a basis for the growth of world law to promote and defend standards of rights applicable to all peoples everywhere, with increasing resort to the agencies of the international community to assure their practical application. These efforts strike at the tyrannies of the police state, whether Communist or Fascist, and also at the causes of manifold grievances and injustices which arouse strife and endanger peace. As such, they constitute one of the greatest hopes of human progress through the United Nations.

Our commitments under the Charter and the universal declaration are to principles grounded in the traditions of our own Bill of Rights. Both our own heritage and our role of world leadership make it imperative that we maintain at home in these critical days the utmost freedom of opinion, debate and dissent, and that we secure equality of all our people without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

We are running the grave risk of sacrificing the spirit and practice of independent and critical expression through fear and hysterical measures to check subversion. An apparent unity purchased at such a price would be a false front, dangerous in its effects on world estimates of the true sentiments of the American people and on the construction at home of a solid foreign policy.

The soundest defense and security of our country lie not in unity enforced by fear, but in the courageous exercise of those liberties which are both the tradition and the hope of the whole free world.

CALL TO ACTION

Recognizing that the governments of free peoples receive their mandate from their citizens, we urge Americans to accept the responsibility to carry forward into their communities and organizations the practical work of education in the policies and principles we have expressed.

We call upon all citizens to maintain contact with their elected representatives for the furtherance of these principles, so that the will of the people for peace and justice through the United Nations may be realized.

INFLATION

We believe that in the present world emergency inflation threatens to hinder the work of the United Nations.

We therefore call for immediate action by the United States Government for a firm and vigorous stabilization program that will distribute the unavoidable sacrifices with fairness and justice, and will enable the United States to discharge effectively its international responsibilities.

WHEAT FOR INDIA

Whereas the people of India are facing serious famine within the next 6 months;

Whereas there exists a surplus of food grains in the United States;

Whereas the traditional practice of the United States has been to give such emergency humanitarian aid as resources permit to peoples in distress solely on the basis of need: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Emergency Conference of the American Association for the United Nations convened in Chicago urges the Congress of the United States to adopt without delay pending legislation which would make available to India 2,000,000 tons of food grains without regard to any political conditions.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT THE CHICAGO CONFERENCE, FEBRUARY 27, 1951

Never before in the history of our Nation has there been so much need for enlightened understanding on the part of our people—of the role it can and should play in the field of international affairs.

The fact that representatives of 91 national organizations, representing practically every phase of American life, have met together for 2½ days in the city of Chicago to consider in emergency session the problem of our responsibility for world leadership, is indicative of the great desire of our people to help maintain the peace of the world at this critical juncture in history and to help bring about a universal state of affairs which would guarantee the peace for generations to come.

As representatives of a great cross-section of American public opinion, we applaud the high level of participation which brought to this conference a rare blending of representatives of public and private agencies, which together with excellent delegate participation will undoubtedly bring forth a set of findings and resolutions which will hearten and provide a spiritual lift to those forces who are so valiantly striving for peace and world understanding.

For the great service provided in making this conference possible, we take this opportunity to express to the American Association for the United Nations, its director, Clark Eichelberger, and his staff, our deep sense of gratitude and appreciation for the wisdom they have shown in conceiving and planning this conference and for the leadership they have provided in bringing together the representatives of these 91 great national organizations to explore their common interests and problems in this field.

We urge upon the American Association for the United Nations to take the leadership and help establish similar conferences on local and regional levels toward the end that a grass-roots educational program to implement the findings of this conference might go forward at the earliest possible moment. We are confident that our local and State organizations will cooperate in this endeavor in every possible manner. We firmly believe that such a program will have a great and continued impact upon the thinking of our Government and our people and will provide for continuity of the magnificent work begun here.

Confusion Peddlers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE M. RHODES

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial from the New Era, AFL publication in Reading, Pa.:

CONFUSION PEDDLERS

Headline writers, mink coat sellers, influence peddlers, sports fixers, crime commissions, and 5 percenters are having a field day. Almost hourly new revelations or charges in one field or another adds to the spectacle, and before one accusation has died out another has taken its place.

And while the merry-go-round spins wildly, the political undertones grow more and more prominent until they eventually drown out the original complaints.

The Kefauver Crime Commission which recently skyrocketed into No. 1 spot on the TV hit parade, has certainly done much to throw the spotlight on gambling and rackets in the United States. Even though the committee functions as an arm of a democratically controlled Congress, it has struck without regard for political welfare or future. Just last November ex-Senator Scott Lucas, then majority leader of the Senate, bitterly charged the Kefauver group with bringing about his defeat by training its probers on gambling in Illinois.

Right now we are witnessing the revelation of alleged irregularities in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation where mink coats battle $100,000 fees to the Republican national chairman in an effort to win headlines.

A Democratic Congressman charges that GOP National Chairman Guy Gabrielson collected a fee of $100,000 for helping his own corporation to get healthy RFC assistance.

Republicans tried to hush up this charge by calling it old stuff. They are probably correct. If the Republican techniques employed by Pennsylvania State government and State officials can be considered typical of the GOP nationally, then Gabrielson's influence peddling most certainly is old stuff. They have been doing it for years.

Actually, we don't believe the big press and the Republican-Dixiecrat outfit is too concerned about the evils of gambling as such. We believe they are more concerned with discrediting the present administration so that the basically more important issues are drowned in confusion.

Certainly we want no truck with the goings on inside the RFC. If somebody's guilty, give 'em the right kind of medicine. But do it to both sides.

The people are the losers in this business, no matter how you look at it. In the short-range picture, the workers lose as a result of RFC losses because it's the taxpayers' money. But the workers lose a lot more when the party which stands for liberal social legislation is discredited to the point where it cannot get its bills enacted into law.

One thing's certain. Workers don't stand a chance of getting better social security, a workable health program, a higher minimum wage, a break in the Federal tax program, and other benefits as long as the Republican-Dixiecrat crowd is in control. Crime probers, worthy as they are, are sensational and take the play away from the long-range problems affecting not only a handful of gamblers or five-percenters, but every one of the 150,000,000 people in America.

Some day we'd like to see a slum probe, an old-age probe, and a minimum-wage probe in which groups of Senators and Representatives toured the United States with the same amount of publicity given the Kefauver commission. We'd like to hear the plain people of America talk about the hovels they live in and we'd like to catch their expressions on the TV screen. We'd like to hear the 7,300 families of Reading and Berks County testify as to their substandard housing and then force the owners of those properties to reveal their profits from human misery.

Or perhaps an aged couple could sit before the cameras and give a detailed budget of how they pay their rent, buy their food, buy their clothing on a social-security check of $75 a month. And then maybe a General Motors Corp. executive could tell this old couple never to fear because GM made over $800,000,000 last year and therefore everything must be right with the world.

Yes, kick out the five-percenters, the influence peddlers, and all the rest. And then put the spotlight on the real problems that face the vast majority of Americans.

American Gift Dollars Buy Strategic and Critical Materials for European Countries While American Citizens Are Denied the Right To Buy and Use These Same Items

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the American taxpayers who filed their income-tax returns last Thursday and made their payments as required by law ought to know that many of the dollars they now are compelled to pay into the Federal Treasury are going to pay for strategic and critical materials now in short supply in this country, which are being bought by European countries with gift dollars supplied under the so-called Marshall plan.

So far, Mr. Speaker, we have authorized total expenditures for Marshall plan aid in excess of $11,000,000,000.

It is indeed a sad commentary on the economic situation we now find this Nation to be in when it is learned that within the past 2 weeks, ECA has authorized new procurements in this country of copper, copper products, lead and lead alloys, and nickel and nickel alloys, all of which products are under strict allocation and control for our own consumers. The following are examples of recent procurement authorizations:

Mar. 8, 1951. Tin plate to French North Africa	$800,000
Mar. 7, 1951. Copper and products to United Kingdom	5,880,000
Mar. 12, 1951. Copper and products to United Kingdom	600,000
Mar. 12, 1951. Copper and products to Austria	250,000
Mar. 12, 1951. Lead and lead-base alloys to Austria	90,000
Mar. 12, 1951. Tin plate, terneplate, black plate to Belgium-Luxemburg	200,000
Mar. 14, 1951. Copper and products to Norway	350,000
Mar. 14, 1951. Nickel and nickel-base alloys to France	35,000
Mar. 14, 1951. Copper and products to France	15,000
Total	8,220,000

How Much Longer Before United States Joins Second-Front Movement Against Chinese Communists?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 7, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington News of March 15, 1951:

CRIMINAL NEGLIGENCE

For practical purposes, something close to a second front has been opened on the mainland of China against the Chinese Communists.

Reports from Hong Kong yesterday said the revolt against the Communist rule was growing rapidly. Hungry farmers armed with hoes and scythes are staging food riots and storming Red strongholds for arms.

Nationalist sources on Formosa have estimated that 200,000 guerrillas are active in two southern provinces and a total of 1,500,000 throughout China.

The figures may be high, but from the Communists' own admissions the Reds have their hands full with determined rebellious forces in their own backyard.

And fear of Nationalist landings across from Formosa has forced the Communists to halt their flow of southern troops toward Korea, thereby potentially if not actually relieving pressure on American forces.

But our Government is doing nothing about it. We're passing up a momentous opportunity. We're offering no aid to these anti-Communist forces who are fighting on our side, and little or none to the Nationalists on Formosa who are inspiring or directing them.

We won't even let the Nationalists airlift supplies to their own people, or bomb the common enemy. Nor, under the Truman-Acheson neutrality order, will we permit the Nationalists to throw another half million trained troops into the fight.

All we do is sit back and fervently wish the United Nations would think of something to get us off the hook in Korea. And the UN is doing nothing.

An aggressive, straight-thinking United States Government—one not mainly concerned with covering up its own mistakes and bad guesses on China—would pick up the ball at this point, and run with it.

To ignore this virtual second front that has opened in South China is criminal negligence and callous indifference to the sacrifice of American lives in Korea in the last 8½ months.

At the very least, our Government could adopt the suggestion of Representative WALTER H. JUDD, of Minnesota, whose ideas on China run to a high percentage of good sense. In a New York speech Tuesday night, he said:

"If the defeatist and appease bloc in the State Department is still trying more to justify its past than to win the future, let us at least demand that a mission of top-notch leaders be sent to Formosa to survey the situation."

Congress should on its own responsibility dispatch such a mission immediately. Not another Philip Jessup mission, but a group unquestionably unbiased and powerful enough to withstand any suppression of its findings.

Let them report back to us on the feasibility and possible results of unshackling Chiang Kai-shek and aiding his forces on the mainland.

Surely that much is owed to the American public now confused by State Department vacillation and squeamishness over what to do next in our war in Asia.

Northwestern's Tragic Prank

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 5, 1951

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following timely, significant, and well-written editorial from the Shreveport (La.) Journal of March 13 on a subject that has touched deeply the hearts of our people in Louisiana:

NORTHWESTERN'S TRAGIC PRANK

Like many other shocking happenings, the prank which resulted in the death of a Northwestern State college student should teach an important lesson—stressing the need of suppressing any activity with violent potentialities. It should be taught in all institutions in which youths indulge in hazing and similar programs, which always are expected to be enjoyed without serious results but at times are too dangerous to be immune from fatal consequences.

Naturally, there is widespread sympathy for the family and friends of the victim of the Natchitoches escapade, and also compassion for the college officials, faculty, student body, and citizens of the hospitable community in which originated the tragic experience. But nothing now said can make the outcome of the students' prank any different. Only words of regret, sorrow, and sympathy can be spoken and written. But the terrible incident can and should result in public opinion strong enough to effectively discourage further use of possibly violent stunts, especially the prank now in question—that of directing a youth to a "blind date" and having a mythical "irate husband" appear with shotgun. The college boy, blessed with promising future, fled precipitately in the woods as the gunblast suddenly exploded. Presumably he fell over the high Grand Ecore bluff into Red River, where several days later the body was found.

Obviously fellow students taking part in the prank had in mind only harmless amusement. They expected that the youth chosen as victim of the "irate husband" would return to the campus after his flight from the scene of the "shooting" and become the target of good natured jests. None entertained any thought that the prank would culminate contrary to their friendly wishes. Previous staging of the same "play" had resulted only in such entertainment. But, unfortunately, it ended in tragedy and in consequent sorrow, distress, and regret that can never entirely disappear. The youths who staged the stunt can never be free from the knowledge of their responsibility. That too, is a dreadful result of the fatal incident.

The victim's father, who collapsed upon learning of the death of his son, realizes that nothing can be done punitively, since the tragedy was unintentional, as judged by his comment just before leaving the college for home, including these words:

"I realize that this college prank, even though it resulted in the death of my son, could have happened anywhere. I hold no malice in my heart toward anyone involved."

Dr. H. Lee Prather, president of Northwestern, expressed himself similarly:

"The college officials at present concur with the generous opinion expressed by the distraught father—that no attempt should be made to punish the group of young college students responsible for the prank that had such a tragic result. Obviously any reasonable measures that might be taken to that end would be wholly inadequate to atone for the lamentable affair."

Foreign Policy Must Be Changed—Lippmann Points Out Lessons for Survival

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 12, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, when Mr. Walter Lippmann admits that a change in foreign policy is necessary, Mr. Truman and the State Department should give serious consideration to doing so. For 2 years this outstanding authority on international questions has warned that this country must not undertake commitments which we cannot fulfill. The record is clear from admissions by the Secretary of State and his policy makers that we have many commitments all over the world that these United States will be short on performance and this means a loss in honor and prestige.

Mr. Speaker, so that all Members may have the benefit of Mr. Lippmann's reasoning on this important question before the American people, I am inserting, at this point, an article of his that appeared in the February Atlantic Monthly:

LESSONS FOR SURVIVAL

(By Walter Lippmann)

As I write we find ourselves wondering whether we are facing the awful dilemma of appeasement or war—of default and surrender and the death of the soul, or of a war that would be as inconclusive as it was irreparably destructive. What, we say to one another, must we do, that the Nation, and the western society to which it belongs, may survive to fulfill their promise and to complete their destiny?

The answer that each of us makes to these questions will be determined by the conclusions he draws from his reading of the history of other societies which have risen and have flourished and have passed away. For myself, I hold with those who, like René Grousset, say that in general no civilization is destroyed from the outside unless it has already decayed from within, that no empire is conquered from abroad unless it has first destroyed itself. And so, I would say that the questions about our survival have no human and practical meaning unless we believe, as I do, that we are still the masters of our destiny and not the mere spectators of our own downfall.

If we believe that we are responsible for our own fate, and that we are still free to choose, then out of the experience of Korea, which is so bitter, we can learn the lessons for survival. The lessons deal with the elemental facts of our situation in the world. When we ignore the elemental facts, as we have done from the proclamation of the Truman doctrine to its application in Korea, we are inviting certain defeat. But if we can learn from experience and will make the truth about ourselves and our friends and our adversaries the foundation of our policies, we shall be able surely—I have no doubt at all—to make ourselves invulnerable, be it in war or in the great struggle which is neither peace nor war.

Let us set down, then, the elemental and unalterable facts of the American situation.

In this century North America has become the citadel, the main arsenal, and the central workshop of the Atlantic community—of the nations that are the bearers of the western civilization.

North America is an island—a continental island, to be sure, but in relation to all the other nations of the world an island nonetheless. Canada, the United States, and Mexico are surrounded by the three oceans and by the air above them in the Pacific and the Atlantic and the Arctic. No enemy can conquer them unless he is master of the sea and air. And unless we in North America are the masters of this sea and air, we cannot support our allies or wage war against our enemies. The first rule of our diplomacy and of our strategical doctrine is therefore that we must never forget the limitations, and that always we must take the utmost advantage of our island character.

On this continental island of ours live fewer than one-tenth of the inhabitants of the globe. We cannot prevail, or even in the end do more than survive ignominiously and miserably, unless, like all the seagoing people before us—unless, like the Athenians, the Venetians, and the English in the days of their greatness—we learn how to make up for our inferiority in numbers. Like David with Goliath, we have to learn to live by our wits and not to engage ourselves in wrestling matches with the Philistines.

We and our neighbors in North America are outnumbered. We must take this truth to heart. We must write it on the walls of our council chambers. We must never forget it. The Communist coalition can raise more soldiers than we or our allies can ever have. These soldiers have weapons which on any battlefield in Eurasia are quite deadly enough to kill. Any policy which compels us to fight them, as we are fighting them in Korea now—across an ocean, within walking distance of their own inexhaustible reserves, on terms of battle in which they are forever incalculably superior—cannot be anything but what it has turned out to be; a bloody entanglement.

Our superiority is in our technology and our productivity and in the science that has flourished and can flourish only in free societies, and in the magic of freedom to arouse the best in men. These are the sources of our strength. If they are drawn upon skillfully, we shall have forms of power, suitable to our island character, in which we excel. With them we can defend the North American citadel and arsenal and workshop. Within it we can create an offensive power that will make the cost of military aggression against the Atlantic community very nearly prohibitive, and in any event most certainly inconclusive.

But that will mean that we have fixed our military frontiers not along rivers or at mountain ranges, and certainly not on demarcation lines in the Eurasian Continent, but in the oceans of sea and air. For the defense and for the offense, for our own security and for our power to protect our friends and to deal with our enemies, we must rely on the speed and the range, on the tactical and the strategical mobility of sea and air power. Where, as the saying goes, the Infantry is the queen of battles, there the American soldier and statesman must avoid the battle.

The recognition of these elemental—though they are not self-evident—truths should lead, I contend, to a clarification of the assumptions and to a revision of the policies on which we have been acting. The cold war has been a struggle over the future of Germany and of the European Continent which Hitler occupied, and over the future of Japan and of all that large part of the Asiatic Continent which the Japanese occupied.

We have believed, rightly I am sure, that it is the purpose of the Soviet Government to become the heir of all of Hitler's and of all of Japan's possessions, including and above all Germany and Japan. We have realized that if this expansion were successful we should be confronted with an overwhelming combination of powers—by the Germans and the Japanese who nearly conquered the world themselves, allied with and not opposed by the Russians.

Our answer to this fearful menace has been an attempt to bring Germany and Japan, and as much as we could of the lands they once occupied, within the orbit of the Atlantic community. Our thesis has been that whatever is not within the military orbit of the west must fall within the orbit of the Soviets and vice versa. The policy we have founded upon this assumption has always and from the beginning been doomed to fail. For it could be enforced only if we had possessed, and had been able and willing to commit, ground forces capable of defeating the armed and armored hordes of the Soviet Union. We could never have found the Infantry to contain the masses of the Communist orbit in Eurasia.

But if we cannot permit the Soviets to become the heirs of Hitler and of the Japanese war lords, if the Atlantic community cannot, in defiance of the Soviets, bring Germany and Japan within its own military system, then there is only one tolerable course open to us. It is to base our military posture toward Germany and Japan on a decision not to make them our allies, but in all cases to deny them to the Soviets. We cannot, I believe, defend them on the ground while they rearm. We cannot, I believe, defend them at all against Soviet atomic attack. We cannot, I believe, count on their loyalty to the Atlantic community if that were to mean the sacrificial destruction of their own countries in order that Britain and France and America should survive.

What we can do is make it equally unprofitable and intolerable for the Soviets if they take Germany and Japan into their military system. There can be no question of our military power to neutralize Germany or Japan in case of war. The Russians are as little able to defend them as we are.

Whether the Germans or the Japanese would like to be incorporated within the Soviet rule, I seriously question. But leaving that point aside, it lies within our power—our power to bomb—to make sure that no military cell within them shall swing either country into the Soviet orbit. This initiative we have always held. We hold it still and should hold it in the future.

The best, indeed the only, military course effectively open to us in Germany and Japan is in fact the counterpart of the political course which most Germans and, I imagine, most Japanese believe in. That is a policy of neutrality like that of Sweden and Switzerland, which rests not on pacifism and disarmament, but on the realization that any other course is suicidal.

The Russians must understand beyond doubt that we shall be certain to retaliate if they attempt to conquer Western Europe, and that we shall destroy the material assets which they might seek to gain by conquest.

I believe myself that we should revise our present policy—which is a corollary of the Truman doctrine and is designed to make Germany and Japan our military allies. We should espouse the policy, which corresponds to our own military capacity, and to our own military necessities, and to the real will of the German and the Japanese nations, which is to guarantee their independence, and to deny them to the Soviets.

I do not know whether we shall be at war with the Soviet Union when this paper is published. If we are not at war, the one course most likely to avert war is the acceptance by the Russians, the Germans, the British, the French, and ourselves of the conclusion that no one can now rearm the Germans and the Japanese and make them, and that is use them as, military allies or satellites. Were our diplomacy at all astute, we should make a virtue of what is in fact a necessity.

And if, God forbid, we are at war, there will not be on the Elbe that German Army which some of our military dreamers dream about, and we shall be facing the hideous question of whether we must go back and once again destroy the Ruhr. We shall then be wondering whether it was indeed wise, even sensible, to suspend diplomacy while we sought to conjure up a theoretically desirable but an imaginary German Army.

What Our Young Men Think About the Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly evident that the youths of this land have definite ideas with reference to our foreign policy. I believe that the Congress should give serious consideration to the views expressed by young men who offer their lives and their blood to their country, whether they do so voluntarily or under conscription. The future of our country is in the youths of this land of the free and the home of the brave, except those who are plunged into foreign slaughterhouses to be crippled, blinded, or liquidated.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting a letter which I have received from nine servicemen now stationed in one of our military camps. These boys are all from the Forty-fifth Congressional District of New York, which I have the honor to represent. I feel a great responsibility, not only to these boys but also to their fathers and mothers and families.

The letter reads as follows:

As our Representative in the Congress of the United States, we wish in this letter to convey to you our personal convictions on the foreign policies of this Government and the defense of our Nation.

We shall list our opinion below.

1. We believe in accordance with ex-President Herbert Hoover in regard to foreign policy and national defense—in that the dispersal of our Armed Forces about the globe can only lead to defeat, disaster, and economic ruin of our beloved country.

2. We believe that our armed invasion last fall of territory north of parallel 38 in Korea was a definite departure from democratic principles under which this Nation was founded and lived so many years in peace.

3. We believe that this invasion has cost us as a nation a terrific price in human lives—both our soldiers and also helpless South Korean civilians whose land we have devastated for what little we or they (South Korea) could ever hope to gain.

4. We believe that Russia would like nothing better than to lure our forces into scattered conflicts with her satellites throughout the world, thus creating long supply lines and leaving our hemisphere open to concentrated attack by her own untouched military might.

5. We believe that the defense of America lies in building a powerful strategic Air Force.

6. We believe that the futile hope of matching ground forces with the Communist world is not only illogical but tragic.

7. We believe that the conscription of men physically and mentally unfit and the placing of them into combat organizations has undermined the strength, efficiency, and morale of our Army Ground Forces. This to us is an obvious fact.

8. We believe that the inefficiency with which the Army classification system has dealt with draftees has caused much bitterness and loss of respect for those in charge of military administration, and has and will continue to cause needless waste of valuable skilled manpower.

9. We believe that if American blood is to be spilled on foreign soil in an attempt to save the free world from the evils of statism abroad, this blood must not be spilled in vain by allowing these evils to strangulate here in our homeland the very freedoms, economic and political, for which we fight. In short, we, as soldiers, do not wish to come home to another England.

10. We believe that, finally, unless the above-mentioned blunders are corrected as soon as possible, and a coherent, intelligent foreign policy and sound military strategy instituted, America as a free nation might go down to defeat, carrying with it the hope and future of free civilization upon this globe.

In conclusion of this letter, we would endeavor to impress upon you as our Representative in our Government that these are our views as loyal citizens and soldiers. These views are shared by many other soldiers whom we know but who are not in our congressional district.

Gwilym A. Price Analyzes Performance and Prospects of Reorganization of the United States Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ELLIOTT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 12, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article by Mr. Gwilym A. Price, president, Westinghouse Electric Corp., styled "The Hoover Plan: Performance and Prospects," which deals with our progress toward putting the Hoover Commission recommendations for the reorganization of the executive branch of the Government into effect.

Mr. Price points out that the Eighty-first Congress put into effect approximately 50 percent of the Hoover plan for reorganization, at a total savings of approximately $2,000,000,000 per year. However, it should be borne in mind that this half is the less controversial half.

I hope Congress will do its full duty by putting into effect such further reorganization plans as are justified during 1951.

Mr. Price's article follows:

THE HOOVER PLAN: PERFORMANCE AND PROSPECTS

(By Gwilym A. Price, president, Westinghouse Electric Corp.)

There is wide agreement on three steps we must take if we are to survive a long war. These do not make up a complete program; they are not a complete solution to our problems. But we cannot control inflation, keep our economy dynamic, and rearm ourselves effectively—which is the same thing as saying we cannot survive—if we do not carry out these steps.

We must improve the efficiency of our civil government. We must achieve the maximum possible efficiency in military procurement. We must reduce nonmilitary expenditures by the Government for the duration of the crisis.

The report of the Hoover Commission on the Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government is directly concerned with all three of these very vital requirements.

The total Hoover plan includes suggestions for ways to save money in running the Government, but it goes beyond that into the field of creative reorganization. It recommends the consolidation of some services, the elimination of others, and the creation of still others. It calls for the abolition of some jobs and higher pay for others. In short, the Hoover Commission carried out its assignment of drawing up plans for the reorganization of big government into an effective and economical instrument of public service.

Savings possible under the report were unofficially estimated at no less than $3,000,000,000 and possibly as high as $5,000,000,000 annually. The report made some 300 specific recommendations. Every department was examined.

The great majority of the American public was solidly behind the Hoover Commission, what it was trying to do, and what it finally recommended. According to Dr. Gallup that majority was about 25 to 1. More than 12,000 editorials about the Hoover report appeared in 1949, and less than 1 percent were opposed. Some 30 organizations joined in support of the Citizens Committee for the Hoover report, a nonpartisan organization for public education in support of the report which had been formed with the encouragement of Mr. Truman and Mr. Hoover.

THE OPPOSITION

However, there has been strong opposition from some of the two million Federal employees and their friends, particularly from agency heads who felt that their empires were in danger. One Cabinet member approved that part of the plan affecting his department which raised his salary and gave him several assistants; the other recommendations, he said, would require "further study."

Opposition also came from some Congressmen who saw the Hoover plan chiefly as a force for reducing their patronage and the Federal spending in their districts. The plan for military unification brought about a tug-of-war among the three services.

Most regrettable of all, opposition came in many directions from private citizens and organizations. It came in much the same way and for much the same reasons it developed among department heads in Government. They favored the report as a whole, but (in the words of the Citizens Committee) "just wanted an exception made for some agency or bureau with which they happened to have a wel'-developed working relationship or from which they received some form of patronage, subsidy, or beneficent relation."

THE $5,000,000,000 QUESTION

As the Eighty-first Congress convened at the beginning of 1949, the $5,000,000,000 question was this: What, if anything, will be done about the Hoover Commission recommendations? Here is the record as it stood in December 1950.

The recommendations of the Hoover Commission Report can be put into effect in three different ways.

Administrative action: About 40 percent of the Commission's original 300 recommendations do not need changes in existing laws in order to be adopted, but can be put into effect simply by Presidential directive or administrative action from within the departments and agencies.

In order to work out plans for doing this, the President formed a President's Advisory Committee on Management Improvement, consisting of 10 men who are top executives in government and private organizations. As Chairman he appointed Thomas P. Morgan, president and board chairman of the Sperry Corp.

This committee is concerned particularly with the progress being made in budgeting and accounting, development of executive staffs, reduction of operating costs, and use of supplies and facilities.

Reorganization plans: Under the Reorganization Act of 1949, the President can submit reorganization plans to the Congress. These automatically become effective in 60 days unless disapproved by a constitutional majority of either House of Congress.

The President submitted seven reorganization plans to the Congress in 1949 and 27 more in 1950. Of these 34 plans, 26 have become effective and are in operation.

Public laws: The balance of the Commission's recommendations must be formally approved by Congress as statutory legislation and signed by the President.

To date, 20 public laws based on the Hoover plan have been enacted. There has been considerable criticism of the way the administration proposed and carried out some of the Hoover Commission recommendations. Most of this criticism arose in connection with the 34 reorganization plans submitted to Congress. Some of it is justified.

The first plan submitted by the President in 1949 would have confined the Federal medical, education, and security programs in a department with Cabinet status. This went far beyond the recommendations of the Hoover report, was not certified by the Citizens Committee as conforming to the report, and was rejected by the Senate.

The reorganization plans for 1950 were likewise deficient in some respects. Plan No. 12, an attempt to abolish one of the offices of the National Labor Relations Board, involved a matter of policy and raised issues beyond the authority of the Hoover report. It was not certified by the Citizens Committee, and was defeated in the Senate.

Despite the suspicion cast on the rest of the reorganization plans by these two false moves however, almost all the other plans were in conformity with the basic principles laid down by the Commission. The Citizens Committee certified all 26 of the plans which passed as conforming to the report. Of the eight which were rejected, only four were so certified.

By these three methods, then—administrative action, reorganization plans, and public laws—almost 50 percent of the Hoover Commission's recommendations are definitely enacted and in operation. Some of these fell short of the original recommendations and some varied in details, but most of them conform to the report.

THE MAIN ACCOMPLISHMENTS

The Reorganization Act, under which the 26 plans mentioned above were adopted, permits the President to unsnarl some of the tangle of boards, bureaus, and agencies under him. "On the record," said the Citizens Committee, "this is the best reorganization act given any President of modern times."

A new General Service Agency, combining four previous agencies, has been created to bring a degree of common sense and efficiency to Government purchasing, storage, inventory, records management, and other housekeeping procedures. It is hoped that General Services has ended the kind of confusion whereby one agency stocked a 93-year supply of fluorescent lamps and another laid away a 247-year supply of loose-leaf binders.

By administrative action, a modern budget format was adopted by the Bureau of the Budget for fiscal 1950–51. It is a graphic, simple, and clear document and has been praised by the Hoover Commission as the foremost advance in Federal fiscal procedure in many decades.

An Accounting Procedures Act prescribes a new, modern, and uniform system of Federal accounting. It can release several thousand Federal employees from unnecessary work. It can end an accounting system that dates back to the first Secretary of the Treasury and slows down the business operations of the whole Government, with some agencies forced to wait 12 months or more to get the results of their previous year's activities. The act is largely permissive, however, and requires firm execution if it is to do any good.

One bill, nicknamed the "President's time saver," has relieved the President of legal obligation to sign great piles of documents relating to such affairs as Osage Indian oil royalties, whale-hunting licenses, and migratory birds. It saves about 2 weeks of Presidential working time each year.

The Commission found a virtually disintegrated Labor Department, with its logical functions scattered in other agencies throughout the Government. On Commission recommendations, the Department is being rebuilt to true Cabinet stature.

Under Public Law 73, streamlining of the organizational structure of the State Department has begun. Communications have been improved within the Department, transactions have been expedited, and the Secretary's burden of paper work has been cut in two.

The Post Office accounting reform has brought a degree of reorganization to one function of the largest single Government business enterprise. The accounts of the Post Office had previously been kept by the General Accounting Office, an outside agency, under an obsolete and inadequate system. The Department normally waited a year for its official accounting figures and, therefore, it based its operating plans on estimates which it worked up itself with duplicate accounting machinery.

The Military Unification Act of August 1949 has strengthened the authority of the Secretary of Defense, introduced a performance budget system and modernized accounting, and helped to bring about real teamwork among the three military services.

The last of these nine—military unification—has been called the greatest single achievement of the Hoover Commission. Much of the value of unification lies in the field of morale and cannot easily be appraised. Specific, measurable examples of interservice cooperation and economy, however, are beginning to add up to a heartening total.

There is now being developed, for example, a common cataloging system of supplies for all services instead of the 17 different systems previously used, and it has already cut the 5,000,000 items previously listed in half.

All three services are now using unified printing plants, a single Washington telephone switchboard, a single improved method (the Navy's) of issuing uniforms, and a unified code of military justice. They are cooperating for the first time on such matters as wind tunnels, research, purchasing, and construction. More than 10,000 job classifications used by the Military Establishment in World War II have been cut to 3,000.

These, then, are the main accomplishments of reorganization to date. There have been, in addition, many lesser reforms within the framework of these nine major accomplishments. All Government transport services have been consolidated within the Department of Commerce. The management and government of the Panama Canal have been recognized and a modern business-type organization and a new tolls policy installed.

The Federal Executive Pay Act has given some 200 top Federal officials salaries somewhat more in line with those of private industry. The number of military attachés in foreign embassies has been cut 30 percent and their work consolidated. Wandering bureaus have been put where they belong; the Treasury Department no longer operates the Bureau of Federal Supply.

HOW MUCH IS IT WORTH?

How much actual savings can we expect from these reforms already enacted? The Citizens Committee estimates a total savings of around $2,000,000,000 a year, most of it arising from economies worked in military unification. I cannot, of course, judge the accuracy of this estimate. As military expenditures and the total Federal budget rise, the total of savings effected, of course, will also rise.

Some savings are clear and apparent. For example, a year ago General McNarney stopped the unnecessary operation of 30,000 military passenger vehicles and released the services of 3,500 officers and men for better use elsewhere. Last fall enough Government records and dead files were transferred to an abandoned factory outside Washington to allow office space for 10,000 employees—space which otherwise would have to be built or rented.

Other savings, unlike these mentioned, are of a less obvious nature, and still others, I presume, will take months and perhaps years to develop. Three-fifths of the Hoover laws and plans enacted, after all, were passed within the past year, many of them within the past few months.

I am inclined to think that economy is only half the story of the Hoover report, and perhaps the half that has been emphasized at the expense of other things that the report can do for us.

It is from changed policies that the greatest savings can and must come, and with these the Hoover Commission was not directly concerned. Far more than $3,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000 can be saved if the Government will simply cancel, postpone, and reduce some of its nonessential, nonmilitary programs in this crisis, withdraw from competition with private industry in a score of fields, and stop handing out subsidies.

THREE WAYS TO SAVE

There is a widespread misconception about how savings in Government—or in private industry, for that matter—are made. Consolidation and reorganization do not save money in themselves. They simply provide the means by which such savings can be made. When you merge two private companies, you have the same number of people working for one firm instead of two, with a new need, probably, for additional supervisory personnel—unless you press the opportunities for savings that come with merger. The same is true of merger in Government.

There are three requirements to effect savings. The first is reorganization. The second is the technical knowledge of how to use that reorganization. The third is the will to use it.

The Hoover Commission Report is simply a plan for reorganization. If it is all put into effect tomorrow, it will save nothing unless the knowledge and the will to make savings are there, too. On the other hand, no administrator, regardless of his knowledge and will, can make appreciable savings in our Federal Government without first having reorganization to build upon.

The other half of the Hoover report story, efficiency, now seems to be growing more important every day. In order to survive the long emergency we face, we must have an efficient and effective Government as well as an economical one.

It seems apparent to me that the Hoover reforms have helped us considerably in this respect in the past 6 months. Washington is still a jungle, to be sure; but it is probably a good deal less of a jungle than it would have been if the Hoover plan had not unsnarled some of those agencies and bureaus.

IMPROVEMENTS FOR DEFENSE

There is impressive testimony from military men, including General MacArthur and Secretary of Defense Marshall, that military unification as wrought by the Hoover plan has worked well in the Korean action, both at the front and in Washington. The new single military sea transport service carried 129,000 troops and a tremendous amount of material to Korea with unparalleled speed. The military air transport service moved 35,000 persons to Korea and saved weeks of time in evacuating wounded to the United States.

It is unfortunate that there has been some confusion among our people on the relationship of the Hoover report to the amount and kind of armament and the number of men we had under arms when the war broke out in Korea.

It must be pointed out that neither the Eberstadt task force of the Hoover Commission, the Hoover Commission itself, nor the Tydings Act based on the Hoover report, ever made any recommendations, one way or the other, for cuts or increases in the amount or nature of military appropriations. That was not their job. They were concerned only with two things: Operating economies and the bringing about of unified military thinking, planning, and organization.

I think we know enough now to say positively that the Hoover plan has rewarded us well both in efficiency and economy to the extent that it has been adopted; that the remainder of the plan surely should be put to work.

A little more than 50 percent of the Hoover Plan remains to be put into effect. That is a statistical figure only. The fact is that not one Commission recommendation has been adopted that offends any major pressure group or that makes possible a major reduction in Government employees. With the exception of Military Unification, no recommendation has yet been adopted that will lead to major economies. The easier, less controversial half, emphasizing efficiency, has been adopted. The harder half, in which the greatest economies can be achieved, still lies before us.

POLITICS VERSUS ECONOMY

The remaining recommendations will certainly be fought more fiercely than anything that has gone before. And yet they must be adopted. Mr. Hoover has stated over and over that his Commission's report should be judged and accepted in its entirety. "The pattern is a unity," he said. "Any major exceptions would damage or destroy the whole." And again: "They stand or fall together. To give in at one spot, whatever the political pressures, means, almost inevitably, the collapse of the whole."

The Veterans' Administration has not yet been touched. The Department of Agriculture has not been touched. Our antique and patched-up Civil Service System has never been overhauled since it was inaugurated 67 years ago.

The Hoover Commission Task Force for Personnel Management, headed by the late John Stevenson, president of the Penn Mutual Insurance Co., made 33 recommendations on this latter subject, only a few of which have been adopted.

There must be drastic reforms in methods of hiring, promoting, firing, and paying Government employees. Such reforms would make Government service more attractive to better and younger people. They would reduce a costly turn-over that now runs to about 25 percent a year. They would increase the efficiency of two million workers by an estimated 10 percent. They would reverse the protective, negative Civil Service philosophy which is based on rights and not on ability. As Mr. Hoover has declared, "We cannot entrust the Government of today to second-rate men and women."

The Post Office Department needs the thorough overhauling slated for it in the Hoover plan. The report made 9 recommendations for this Department, and of the 6 that must be enacted by Congress, only 1 has been passed. The postal service would be decentralized into 15 regions and operated under procedures somewhat similar to those of national chain-store management.

A start was made when the President, for the first time, appointed a career official instead of a political figure as Postmaster General. He has asked the Congress to place the appointment of 22,000 postmasters on a career instead of a patronage basis. These 9 recommendations, if properly carried out, will improve morale and service and cut in half the annual three to five hundred million dollar deficit.

WASTE AND DUPLICATION

The United Medical Administration recommended to take over the Public Health Service and the military and veterans' hospitals has not been created. Five big Federal hospital systems are competing with each other, and with all other hospitals, for nurses, doctors, and technicians. Forty Government agencies are still offering medical services to various groups.

The recommendation that all Federal conservation and construction be consolidated in the Department of the Interior (renamed the National Resources Department) has not been adopted. The rivalry and duplication of work between the Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation are still unresolved. There is no check and balance system on projects, and no review board to prevent duplication of surveys and planning. The agencies themselves are deciding whether or not their projects are economically or socially sound.

Land management functions have not been consolidated within the Department of Agriculture. The Forest Service, Soil Conservation Service, and Bureau of Land Management are still competing with each other and duplicating work and services. Rental for grazing land varies according to which agency administers it, and if two agencies administer it, a cattleman must have two leases.

A start, but no more, has been made on the reorganization of Federal business enterprises. Certain enterprises should be incorporated in one agency and uniform budgeting, accounting, and other business procedures installed. There should be uniform corporate requirements. Hidden subsidies should be discontinued. If the Federal Government is going to continue to lend money and buy and sell mortgages, it at least should do it properly and under one roof.

THE HOOVER PLAN OF 1951

The Hoover report has not been tested until all its recommendations have been adopted. The country cannot be considered fully or effectively mobilized until they have been put in force.

To the extent that we believe this and believe in the Hoover report, we must now bear down to see that the rest of the plan is accepted—and accepted in 1951. Some of us may feel a moral obligation to do this. Certainly we will be benefited as citizens if we do so.

We can do this in the usual ways in which we would support any idea we believe in or any piece of legislation we want to see passed. To these ways, however, we can add one more: we can think twice and deeply before we speak or act against any specific Hoover report reform that works to the apparent disadvantage of us as individuals or of some group with which we are associated. We can, in other words, support the Hoover plan when and if it hurts. We can subordinate personal interest, if the occasion arises, to the interest of good government.

There is a grave and real question whether we can survive the perils of the years that lie ahead. As one of the world's great powers, we have the factories and the know-how. Our enemy has immense resources of manpower and raw materials. The factors are increasing against us as time goes on.

We must make the best possible use of everything we have. We must put our house in order and prepare for a long siege. The Hoover Commission report—all of it in effect and working—can help us to do that.

Address by Hon. Brien McMahon, of Connecticut, at Anniversary Dinner of Charitable Irish Society of Boston

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an accomplished and interesting address delivered by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] at the two hundred and fourteenth anniversary dinner of the Charitable Irish Society of Boston, held at Boston, Mass., on Saturday, March 17, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BRIEN MCMAHON AT THE TWO HUNDRED AND FOURTEENTH ANNIVERSARY DINNER OF THE CHARITABLE IRISH SOCIETY OF BOSTON, COPLEY-PLAZA HOTEL, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1951

I am sure that St. Patrick must have given a special blessing to the devoted pioneers who joined together so early to plant a little bit of Irish warmth in the heart of America.

The Charitable Irish Society of Boston has more than 2 centuries of splendid traditions behind it and I am sure you will agree with me that it still stands on the very threshold of its growth. The capacity of the Irish race for expansion, especially in deeds of charity, is simply beyond the imagination of those unfortunates who lack a bit of Celtic in their make-up. In fact, growth is synonymous with the Irish character.

Other races have tall men and tall tales to grace the annals of their heroic past; but the Irish have taller men and if we don't have taller tales, we know how to supply them. We simply won't be outdone in such matters, especially on March 17.

The peculiar talent of our people, which some mistake for Celtic boasting, is nothing more than sober fancy, undistorted by fact or fiction. But I think our kindly neighbors appreciate by now that there is nothing in life more real than the delightful exuberance of Irish imagination.

This is the day we love and the saint we love because divine providence fashioned for us a heavenly patron ideally suited to the needs of the Irish temperament. The ancient chronicles tell us that Patrick was like a lion in strength and power; like a dove in gentleness and humility. In short, St. Patrick had those simple, sturdy virtues which we prize above all others.

This is a day of undisguised sentiment because sentiment is that shining power of the soul, a special gift of the Creator, which sustained and kept alive generations of Irish forebears under the harsh exactions of a cold and brutal tyranny. It was the Irishman's secret that a day of laughter and good cheer could banish the bitter misery of a winter of sorrow and heartbreak. And this lesson must never perish from our memory—the lesson that no tyrant will ever crush out the spirit of a people sustained by love and by faith in the God who made them.

We meet on this day to enjoy the present and to win fresh inspiration from the mighty deeds of those who preceded us. The inspiring story of St. Patrick is as fresh today as it was nearly 15 centuries ago when he lighted the fire on Tara's hill which still remains as the eternal symbol of Ireland's faith and Ireland's glory.

St. Patrick was a slave boy who escaped his captors to return half a century later to conquer the people who held him in bondage. But his weapons of conquest were not made of steel and they were not designed for physical destruction.

There is a striking parallel between the age in which St. Patrick lived and our own times. In the fifth century, the mighty Roman Empire was breaking up and the rule of law was fast disappearing under the steady advances of political chaos and social barbarism. The slow growth of civilization was in danger of extinction under the heavy blows of grasping despots, who knew nothing and cared nothing about the sanctity and dignity of human life. It was into this world of darkness and despair that St. Patrick brought the Christian message of hope and faith which spread its light over Ireland and eventually over the cultural and religious centers of Western Europe. I think the lesson for our time is so obvious that its significance will be lost on no one. How much has changed and how little has changed since the shepherd boy Patrick tended his flocks in the verdant pastures of ancient Ireland.

You have graciously asked me to respond to the toast "The United States of America." I think every American with a drop of Irish blood in his arteries can respond to this toast with love and reverence.

We are proud of the fact that men and women of our blood have lived and died for this land of America with fierce devotion. We are proud of the fact that a touch of Irish genius has quickened the soul of America, that Irish hands and brains have helped fashion its buildings and its political institutions. And above all, we are proud of the fact that this United States of ours is the finest symbol of justice and liberty and political fair-dealing which has ever been devised by mortal man.

Yes; this is a day of sentiment and we are a sentimental people. On St. Patrick's name day we are never afraid that emotional excess will blur the intensity of our love for this cherished land of liberty which means so much to all of us. The virtue of understatement has no appeal for the Irish.

But while we celebrate, we know deep down in our hearts that we are rekindling the fires of loyalty and patriotism because today mortal peril threatens the United States of America.

During the past 5 years, many people have charged me with excessive pessimism on the question of war and peace.

After Hiroshima, I repeatedly warned against the consoling notion that the Soviets might not achieve an atomic weapon for decades. When the President announced, in 1949, that the Kremlin had in fact produced an atomic bomb, I said that total power in the hands of total evil would confront our country with dangers such as it had never before known. Last winter, when many of my senatorial colleagues aspired toward the altogether desirable goal of balancing the national budget, I ventured to prophecy that the accelerating armaments race would mock at any such hopes—I predicted that necessary military spending would force our budget up and up and up.

Just a few weeks ago, I cautioned once more against the siren voices which take false comfort in repeating over and over that "war is not inevitable." Pious hopes do not change hard facts; slogans do not refute the lessons of history. History teaches time and again that prolonged armaments races always end in war.

If we refuse to heed this lesson, we do so at our mortal peril.

But history teaches another lesson. It shows that the destiny of men and nations does not proceed in an inevitable path. It demonstrates that intelligent and valiant action—if taken in time—can stave off looming disaster.

Only the philosophy of communism—with its historical determinism and with its denial of free will—asserts that the future is predetermined. We Americans, with our awareness that God has given man free will, know that the future is not already determined. We know that what happens in the future depends on what we do now—it depends on our present wisdom or lack thereof, on our present moral courage or moral cowardice. This is elementary Christian doctrine.

If it is downright dangerous to take unfounded comfort in the phrase "war is not inevitable," it is even more dangerous to think and act as if war is inevitable. The members of this cult of inevitability, even though they do not realize it, bespeak their lack of faith in the vitality of our own free institutions; they give the cause of communism undeserved flattery. In effect, they say that we Americans and our Allies do not have sufficient imagination and staying power to halt the onward march of Soviet power. They suggest that the Kremlin is invincible—that we can never halt Stalin in his tracks. Unwittingly, they subscribe to Stalin's own proud boast—that the Soviet Union represents the wave of the future and that our western society is decadent and slated for extinction.

As a moral people who believe in free will and in an open future, we Americans must reject this false doctrine of inevitable war.

I say that if we formulate—now—a positive peace program of splendid and compelling dimensions, we can—and will—win through to a just and lasting peace. I assert that if we now wage peace with the same fixity of purpose with which we would wage war, we have every reason to believe that a third world war can be averted.

Our program for waging peace need not start from scratch.

Over the past 5 years, let us never forget, we have recorded mighty successes in halting the spread of communism, and in leaving the door open to peace. I do not pretend for a moment that we have acted with perfect wisdom, or that we have not suffered important set-backs. Western Europe, nonetheless, whose economic and military potential is second only to that of the United States, is still in the camp of freedom. The Marshall plan has worked. Month after month, the Communist ranks in France and Italy diminish. Our military-assistance program, coupled with the growing armies of our European friends, holds forth real promise of deterring the Kremlin from all-out aggression. In Greece, communism has suffered a decisive set-back. Fortified with our aid, Turkey now stands resolute in the face of Soviet threats.

And above all, our country has created an imposing and fearsome stockpile of atomic weapons which has kept the Red armies out of Western Europe, and which now shields us and our allies while we go about the urgent task of enlarging our armies. I confess that I take no little pride in the opportunity given me, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, to help make our atomic stockpile the defender of our freedoms.

Our foreign policy has properly recognized that the peace can be maintained, and the Kremlin dissuaded from aggression, only through military and economic strength. No matter how noble the principles for which they stand, troops armed with pitchforks will never deter an aggressor. It takes tanks and planes, in vast numbers, to halt modern armies and air fleets. Likewise, disease-ridden and poverty-stricken populations are natural targets for conquest and infiltration. Empty stomachs must be filled if minds are not to be victimized by evil philosophies.

It is obvious that military and economic strength must be countered in their own terms. But perhaps less obvious is this, that military and economic strength are important only when translated into human strength, into the strength of people. Tanks and guns are of no avail in defending liberty unless we have soldiers who are willing to fight, and if necessary, die. By the same token, an aggressor needs the support of vast numbers of people to carry out his designs. If the Red army refused to carry out plans for foreign conquest, Stalin would be powerless.

All military leaders have recognized that military strength must be ultimately defined in terms of human strength. General Eisenhower underlined this truth time and again when he testified on the problem of defending Western Europe; he stated that morale was all-important. Even the Communists have paid obeisance to this principle, and have perverted it on behalf of their evil purposes. Marx and Lenin and Stalin have all declared that the struggle for the world will ultimately be decided by the morale of the opposing camps.

Now the words "morale" and "morality" sound very much alike. This is no accident of language; they are, in face, very much alike. Morale depends basically, not upon the strength of a man's weapons, but on the strength of his cause. That cause, if it is to command the allegiance of man of good will, must be the cause of justice and freedom and decency. People are incorrigibly moral. They do not really fight for boundaries or raw materials or factories; they fight for things of the spirit—for transcendent principles. Surely this is apparent to all who claim Ireland as their ancestral homeland.

I therefore put before you this simple series of propositions. Military strength ultimately rests upon human strength. Human strength rests on morale. Morale derives from a passionate belief in the justice of one's cause.

If these things are indeed true—and I am sure no one will deny them—it is clear what we must do to avert a third world war.

We must get squarely behind a moral program that will win people over to our side and away from Stalin.

We can do this only by approaching all the world's peoples—and the Russian people as well—with a positive peace program so in harmony with man's natural desires that it cannot fail to win the support of all men of good will.

In 1917, we did this. We told the world that we stood for the fourteen points. In 1940, we again declared ourselves in favor of concrete objectives of peace—the Atlantic Charter and the "four freedoms." Suppose that we had come out in favor of the fourteen points not in 1917, but in 1912—before the Kaiser sent his armies marching into Belgium and France. Suppose that the "four freedoms" had been proclaimed—not in 1940, but in 1938—before Hitler invaded Poland. I wonder if, in either case, the First and Second World Wars would have started. I wonder if the German people, whose consent was indispensable to both wars, could have been mobilized behind an aggressive policy.

Such a program, I fully believe, would accomplish what we have failed to do so far—to rally the moral and physical strength of the world's peoples as a mighty force for peace. Such a program, by mobilizing the moral strength latent in all men, would confront the Kremlin with a dynamic force far more powerful than even the free world's guns and tanks and atomic bombs.

The program I envisage would lay stress upon two things. First, that the supreme menace to world peace comes from the iron curtain. Second, that our country does in fact have a practical and realizable program for ridding the world of fear and bringing about a new community of men.

If the free peoples of Europe and Asia are presented with a cause which fulfills man's basic longings, they will be prepared to meet any armed assault. And if the peoples of Russia come not to believe in Stalin's cause, all the vaunted power of the Kremlin will be of no avail.

Our entire foreign policy must therefore be geared to this twin task—exposing Stalin's conspiracy against the truth, and approaching all the world's peoples with a constructive alternative to war.

The Russian people have passed through two dreadful wars, a bloody revolution, and incessant purges—all in a span of a generation. They long to be relieved of their crushing burden of armament expenditures. They long for the dignities which we Americans take for granted. If we can convince the Russian people that we stand for a decent and peaceful world, they will become Stalin's greatest liability and our greatest asset.

Not all the tanks rolling off Red assembly lines will help Stalin if the soldiers of the Red Army are unwilling to fight on behalf of aggression. If we can show the ordinary Russians that the Kremlin alone threatens the peace—if we can demonstrate that we stand for all the liberties and decencies which are now withheld from the Russian people—we will vastly reduce or even eliminate the chance of a third world war.

Stalin will no doubt use the iron curtain—as he has always used it in the past—to keep the Russian people from learning of our true intentions.

But let us draw hope and inspiration from the life of St. Patrick. He was a slave boy held in bondage by his captors—just as the Russian people are held in bondage now. And yet he ended as a conqueror. His only weapons were a flaming faith, an indomitable courage, and a Christian love of his fellow men.

An idea grounded in objective truth is invincible—and will win out whatever the obstacles raised against it. Against the sword of the spirit, no worldly weapon can prevail.

The Fix Pattern

REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, today I am inserting into the RECORD an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch entitled "The Fix Pattern." It discusses another tragic scandal coming to light at this time, the scandal of income-tax fixing.

The editorial asks the Attorney General what he is going to do about this. What is he doing about it? What is he going to do about it?

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of March 13, 1951]

THE FIX PATTERN

The Post-Dispatch yesterday reported a pattern of income-tax fixes so successful, so widespread, and so costly to the Government that it should shake the national capital all the way to the top of the Washington Monument. The reverberations should be quick to reach Key West, where the White House party is spending a late winter vacation on the beach.

The first source of information about the fix pattern in income-tax prosecutions is a retired agent of the Intelligence Unit, Robert L. Sharp, who served for 25 years, some three of them in St. Louis.

How did Mr. Sharp express his protest?

He did the highly unusual thing of writing personally to a Federal judge to complain that many important cases recommended for prosecution were fixed along the way.

What form has this fix taken?

The pattern is that political lawyers, with highly placed connections, take up these prosecution cases, with the result that they are removed from prosecution channels.

How high up do these influences go?

In at least one instance, a widely known St. Louis businessman, who is a friend of President Truman and Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, escaped prosecution for income-tax evasion after pressure was exerted in Washington.

Who handles these fixes?

In St. Louis, three lawyers who are highly influential in Democratic Party politics seldom fail in getting prosecutions stopped once they take a case which has been recommended by the Intelligence Unit for action by the Department of Justice.

Why do not more agents protest as Mr. Sharp has done?

Along with the fix pattern goes a pattern of intimidation. As described by Mr. Sharp, agents believe that they have no chance of advancement unless they do the will of the higher-ups.

Is this pattern confined to the lower levels of income-tax administration and prosecution?

In his highly unusual charge to the Federal grand jury now investigating this whole situation, Federal Judge Moore gave the jurors authority to take income-tax cases out of their usual channels to press prosecution. Since then, Attorney General McGrath has phoned United States Attorney Drake Watson several times to get these cases returned to their regular channels.

Officials in both St. Louis and Washington have a lot to explain. These officials include:

Collector of Internal Revenue James P. Finnegan.

United States Attorney Drake Watson.

Commissioner of Internal Revenue George J. Schoeneman.

Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder.

Attorney General J. Howard McGrath.

If no satisfactory accounting is had from any of these officials, then it will be up to President Truman, who is responsible for them all.

We Can't Put a Price Tag on Defense of Our Freedom

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT E. JONES, JR.

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an editorial entitled "We Can't Put a Price Tag on Defense of Our Freedom," written by Mr. Louis Eckl, editor of the Florence (Ala.) Times, and appearing in that publication on March 13, 1951:

WE CAN'T PUT A PRICE TAG ON DEFENSE OF OUR FREEDOM

The so-called great debate on sending more United States troops to Europe still rages. Every American concern for his own and his country's future must hope it is wisely resolved on its real merits.

With that objective in view, it is possible here and now to eliminate from the argument one element that has been injected by some debaters. That is the issue of cost.

Senator TAFT and some others who oppose leaving the troops-for-Europe question to our military leaders have many reasons. And one of them is that we cannot send too many men abroad because we cannot afford it.

To say that this issue doesn't belong in the debate is not to say that we should be indifferent to the cost of our military ventures, in Europe or anywhere else. On the contrary, we should monitor the expenditure of every dollar spent for defense.

That's not the point. What is the point then? It's that the debate over troops for Europe is basically an argument over how and where we can best commit our strength for the defense of America and the whole free world.

Does a free people shrink from the cost of preserving its liberties? At what stage can you no longer afford to save freedom?

This country spent $350,000,000,000 to win World War II. Is there any American who doubts we would have put out twice that sum if it had been necessary to keep Germany or Japan or both from conquering this country?

The answer is evident to all. You can always afford the cost of guarding freedom. When you decide that you cannot, you have already yielded your liberties and succumbed to tyranny.

As we spent in World War II to snuff out the menace of Hitler and Tojo, so today we will spend to gird the free world to meet the threat of Russian global ambition. The only matter to decide is how we shall spend to do this job.

If the United States Senate, in its considered wisdom, votes to support administration proposals for the dispatch of a greater Armed Force to Europe, then there can be no hesitation about our providing the money needed. Whatever the reasonable cost, we shall have to afford it.

It would be small recompense to know we had balanced our national budget if in the pursuit of this goal we had lost our priceless heritage of freedom.

Morality in Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. POTTER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my radio broadcast over WJR, Detroit, last Friday, March 16:

MORALITY IN GOVERNMENT

It is a pleasure to again appear on this Your Congress program. I am sure we are all most appreciative of WJR's efforts permitting Members of Congress to report directly to the people.

C-bombs have been exploding all over Washington during the past several weeks. The C-bomb is not a new military weapon, but it could be just as dangerous to the people of the United States. The ingredients of this bomb are crime, confusion, and corruption.

The headlines of your daily papers, the news from your radio and television correspondents, daily report new discoveries in the field of crime, confusion, corruption, and communism, implicating personalities in Washington, in our Government. No person can condone officials in public trust who utilize that trust for selfish purposes. It is true you will find your Alger Hisses and your William Remingtons; you will find your Harry Vaughans and Donald Dawsons; you will find your Pendergast machine and your syndicate crime tie-up in politics; but we must not overlook the fact that these people so implicated, who are not deserving of their trust, are a small minority of our Government officials, either appointed or elected. The vast majority of our Government officials are sincere, hard-working, conscientious, loyal Americans. But, in order to protect the vast majority of public officials from being classified as a group as being conniving parasites, we have to expose the small minority who misuse their trust. In other words, we should throw out the few rotten apples or the public will assume that the rotten apples are typical rather than exceptions.

It is disconcerting to us, who believe in good, clean, honest government to note that the President, by being petty and stubborn, refused to aid the Congress in sorting out the rotten apples from the barrel. Loyalty to friends is to be condoned if that loyalty does not harm anyone else but you. But loyalty to friends in public office who have used their friendship to the President and their public office for immoral financial or political gain cannot be condoned.

The citizens of this country are still smarting from the red-herring charges made when Alger Hiss and William Remington were investigated for Communist activities while employed by the Federal Government. These two I have mentioned served in positions of high public trust and the President rather than aiding in their investigation ridiculed the investigation as a "red herring." We are all too familiar with Mr. Truman's stubborn insistence that Major General Vaughan remain his military aide despite the fact that the general used his office in the White House to put pressure to bear upon other Government officials in order to secure benefits based upon favoritism rather than upon merit. We recall that Major General Vaughan helped his friends get perfume, molasses, race-track permits, passports, and military passes and for the use of his influence coming from the White House, Harry Vaughan was paid off with deep-freeze cabinets. Friends of General Vaughan were able to get permits to build race tracks when materials were in short supply. He endeavored to secure a permit to purchase molasses which was in direct violation of war regulations. He is quoted in testimony as interceding with a departmental official to ease the permit through saying—"We Democrats must stick together." But despite all of the unsavory actions on the part of his military aide, the President laughed off the charges and General Vaughan retains his position in the inner White House circle.

Of course, we are all familiar with the most recent investigation conducted by a Senate subcommittee, chairmaned by Senator FULBRIGHT of Arkansas, into so-called influence exerted upon members of the FRC Board. There again the influence was traced into the White House inner circle. It was brought out time and time again that Mr. Donald Dawson, the President's assistant in charge of personnel, consistently used his influence on the RFC to secure loans. Many of these were loans which had been turned down by an examiner. Of course, one of the most flagrant cases was the one where Mr. George Sax—the punchboard king of the country who built the luxurious Saxony Hotel in Miami Beach secured a loan of $1,500,000 from the RFC. Mr. Dawson was a frequent guest at the Saxony Hotel, on a complimentary basis, while the Saxony Hotel was negotiating with RFC to secure the relaxation of certain conditions of the loan agreement. The Fulbright committee wrote Mr. Dawson asking he appear before the committee to give his side of the story. This, however, he has failed to do and the President has given no indication that he either had asked Mr. Dawson or would permit him to appear before the committee. The only assumption we can make is that the implications made by the committee—that it was Dawson who brought pressure to bear upon RFC to make the Saxony Hotel as well as other loans which were not justified—are true.

The most amazing story coming out of the Fulbright committee is of the payoff of a mink coat valued at $9,500 to a White House secretary for the influence she and her husband—who is an influence peddler—had on the RFC to secure approval of a loan to a fur company. Mrs. Young and her husband, Merl Young, came from Missouri. Eleven years ago Merl was a messenger boy receiving $1,800. His wife was Senator Truman's secretary at the time. When Mr. Truman went to the White House, he took Mrs. Young with him and she was able through her connections to get Mr. Young placed with the RFC as an examiner at a salary of $7,100 per year. He aided in securing loans for the infamous Lustron Cop. and the Jacobs Corp. of Detroit. He left RFC and took executive positions with both these companies, which gave him a total income of $46,000 per year. In his spare time he worked for the Democratic National Committee. But still the President has not seen fit to discharge the bribe-taking secretary, Mrs. Young. She is still on the Government payroll in the inner circle of the White House.

Members of the House of Representatives from the State of Mississippi were shocked to find that Federal jobs were being sold in their State of Mississippi for prices ranging from $250 to $1,500 each. These jobs were sold by the Truman Democrats in an effort to build up their organization in the State of Mississippi to undermine the so-called Dixiecrats or States-rights Democrats. Many a veteran who was entitled under law to Federal job preference had to pay a large sum in order to secure placement. It is a strange commentary that President Truman has not denied the charges and has remained completely silent on the whole affair.

Senator KEFAUVER, who is chairman of the Crime Investigating Committee has been severely chastized in private by certain powers that be for his investigations which have exposed the tie-up between syndicated crime and political machines in Missouri, Illinois, New York, and Florida. Many of these political machines in some of our large cities owe their existence to organized crime—and still, there has been no effort made by the President to purge the gangsters, slot-machine kings, and gamblers from these Democratic organizations.

I have cited these examples—which are common knowledge—for the purpose that irrespective of political party, irrespective of our personal philosophy of government neither a forthright Democrat nor Republican citizen will, or does, condone corruption.

Our way of life—our republican form of government—can be lost just as easily by immoral activities in Government as it can by outward aggression. It is my sincere hope that the investigations that have taken place—and are now in progress—will spark the fire of a moral awakening to insure that public officials will be more conscious of their public trust, that the individual voters will insist that the people who represent them are above reproach. We cannot long last as a free nation with representative government if the citizens of this country lose faith in their Government. It is tragedy of the first order for people to assume that this is politics and politics is rotten. Politics is what you make it. Politics will be rotten if we, as individual citizens, become callous and assume that all people in political life are corrupt and if you replace one corrupt man you will get another. You cannot legislate morals. You cannot legislate ethics. Public officials—elected or appointed—should be—and in the main are—responsive to the wishes and desires of the people they represent. I hope that throughout the country there will be a wave of indignation against immorality in Government. We need to live by Christian principles. We must take a greater interest and be more active in governmental affairs whether it be in your local precinct, school district, city, State, or National Government. If all citizens would actively participate in political affairs either within or without their party, we would be assured of a complete house cleaning and the morals and ethics of government in general would be greatly enhanced. But if, as individual citizens, because of apathy, lack of interest and callousness we accept corruption as a byproduct of politics your moral standard in government will sink lower and lower. So, we as individual citizens have a solemn duty to perform. We must be as conscious of corruption as we are of communism. Either one allowed to go unchecked would mean we would lose the way of life and the form of government so dear to us.

The Roman Empire fell because of internal corruption, which was allowed to grow unchecked as a malignant cancer. Other great governments have fallen when they became arrogant, cocky, and conceited. We cannot allow corrupt practices to go unpunished.

I do not blame the people of our country for being tired and fed up with the headlines they have been reading of late as a result of the several investigations being conducted by congressional committees. Neither party has a monopoly on good government. The vast majority of Democrats and Republicans in Congress are anxious to rid our Government of unsavory practices. As a matter of fact the investigations taking place at the present time are conducted under the chairmanship of Democratic Members who believe as you and I in good government. It is not a question in many cases as to whether an action is legal or illegal. Many practices are legal but they are not moral. It is not enough to judge an action by whether it is legal or illegal. You can misuse your public trust by unethical practices that are within the law.

These are trying days indeed. Not only does the United States need a strong military arm for our defense but we must have strong moral fiber and our Government must reflect the honesty, the integrity, the character of the American people. If the Government so reflects the true character of the American people, we then will have a Government whose feet will be so well entrenched in the respect of the people that unity will exist and our people will be welded together to fight for a common cause.

Education and Agricultural Progress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, Editor Wheeler McMillen in his column All of Us, in the March 1951 issue of the Farm Journal, makes a statement with respect to the influence of education in agricultural progress. I am in hearty agreement with what Mr. McMillen so well says and, under permission granted me by the House, submit his statement herewith:

[From the March 1951 Farm Journal]

ALL OF US

(By Wheeler McMillen)

Boys and girls get too little attention from county agents, home demonstration agents, and 4-H Club agents. That's a flat statement. I am talking about the total effort by the agricultural extension services. Only about one-third of extension work aims at youngsters; nearly two-thirds aims at adults. Some of the adult farmers will keep on learning new things anyway, and would get along without extension agents. Other adults do not learn, and time spent on them is not very productive. Young people from 10 to 20 will always learn if their interests are aroused. That's the time to pry minds open.

Every oldster can see that farming has progressed enormously these last 30 years. Why? Well, science has shown us many better methods. Invention has given us far better equipment. But do science and invention by themselves explain why one farmer today produces much more than one farmer did 30 years ago? Don't people count? Hasn't something happened to farmers, too? Our top farmers today, in most cases I believe, started differently from the ways their grandfathers started. They had 4-H and FFA experience. Their minds were opened early, and they have ever since eagerly grabbed at new ideas and new equipment.

The time to educate comes when people are young. I am sure that education deserves more credit than it has been given for agricultural progress. I am sure that this progress would continue and advance faster if less time were now spent trying to change those who are too old to learn, and the same effort were expended on the youngsters who are at the right age to learn. Plain arithmetic dictates the lesson that educating youth pays longer dividends. Teach a boy something, and he may use it for 40 years; teach a man the same thing, and he has less time to use it, just because the undertaker will get the man before he gets the boy.

Time for PMA To Face Facts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BURR P. HARRISON
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I include an editorial written by Mr. R. Frank Frazier, executive secretary of the Virginia State Poultry Federation, intended for publication in the forthcoming issue of the Virginia Poultrymen and the Southeastern Poultryman. The latter publication circulates in 11 Southeastern States.

I should like to commend this editorial to the consideration of my colleagues from these States and elsewhere who are interested in the future of the poultry industry.

In reading Mr. Frazier's statement, and in talking with a number of prominent poultrymen I have become convinced of the urgent need for reform in the administration of Federal grading and inspection activity in poultry.

It should be abundantly clear that there is no logic in having a poultry grading and inspection program administered by the dairy branch of PMA when PMA has a functioning poultry branch familiar with the particular problems of poultrymen.

Inasmuch as the indicated adjustment has not been brought about administratively, legislative action must be taken toward achieving a more sensible arrangement.

The editorial follows:

TIME FOR PMA TO FACE FACTS

Those unfamiliar with the Washington Production and Marketing Administration set-up are shocked when they learn the dairy branch is still administering grading and inspection programs for the poultry industry. And to justify not having these programs in the poultry branch where they belong, top level PMA administrators claim that in some past years it has been necessary to take tens of thousands of dollars from dairy program fees to subsidize those for poultry. If this be true, then we are amazed that our dairy friends haven't already arisen in righteous indignation to demand their money's worth for services they were buying from PMA.

Remembering the exhorbitant fees charged for the so-called "Washington supervision" of poultry grading and inspection work, many industry leaders are at a loss to understand why the operation of these programs hadn't been on the black side of the ledger all along, if they were administered with a reasonable degree of efficiency. But now, at long last, poultry programs are self-supporting, according to John I. Thompson, Deputy Administrator of PMA. He also said, when visited recently in Washington by a delegation from your association, that he favored the transfer of these programs to the poultry branch as was being requested by your representatives. He expressed the view such a transfer should not be made until the opportune time. When pressed for clarification of this statement, his answer was general, vague, and noncommittal.

In the minds of the leaders of your association is the conviction that the opportune time for this transfer has arrived. In fact, it is long overdue, and they can find no justification for some dairy administrators continuing to supervise poultry programs which they apparently do not understand.

The record of their administrative blunders is no longer a secret among informed poultrymen. When industry leaders assist the poultry branch in developing improvements in regulations under which grading and inspection programs operate, these regulations, although approved even by the Secretary of Agriculture, have been either sabotaged or completely ignored in some instances by dairy administrators. But perhaps even more serious from the standpoint of our industry is the fact that certain ill advised dairy branch administrators kill many worth while recommendations for improvements in poultry programs even before they can become a part of the official regulations. Is this not weak administration by those who seem to be shirking their duty? Is this fair to the poultryman?

Admittedly, back in the horse and buggy days when most poultry marketing firms also handled butter, cream, cheese, nuts and hides, there may have been a degree of justification for both dairy and poultry programs being administered by the same people. But this is not true today. An immediate transfer of grading and inspection programs for poultry and poultry products to the poultry branch of PMA must be made for these programs to perform their maximum service to our industry.

Boxcar Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, the boxcar situation in the Middle West is becoming more desperate as time goes on. One of the primary causes of this shortage is the large percentage of western cars which are tied up on eastern lines. In a letter to Dr. W. M. W. Splawn, Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Sam P. Wallingford, an extensive and prominent grain dealer in Kansas, calls attention to this situation. Because the matter is of such great and general interest, I am herewith including a copy of Mr. Wallingford's letter as a part of my remarks:

MARCH 12, 1951.

Mr. W. M. W. SPLAWN,
Chairman, Interstate Commerce Commisssion, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPLAWN: We operate quite a large group of country elevators, and own and operate a six-million bushel public terminal elevator here in Wichita. I feel that something of a drastic nature is going to have to be done about the present boxcar shortage which we are having in the Southwest, and which threatens to be the worst situation in all of our history by the time of harvest, say from June 1 on.

The writer feels that a most serious situation confronts the southwestern lines, which can only be helped by radical action on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The latest figures I have show that the Boston & Maine Railroad has on its lines today 259.1 percent of its ownership; New York Central, 122.1 percent; New York, New Haven & Hartford, 173.2 percent; the total Allegheny group, including the Pennsylvania Railroad, 107.8 percent; and the Reading Railroad, 121.1 percent. Now we'll take the western lines, with a percentage of 86.5 of ownership, and you can see the serious injustice that is being handed out, not only to the railroads, but to the shippers in the great Southwest.

I have been advised, Mr. Splawn, that if our western lines could be permitted to use 100 percent of their boxcars, that our situation would be materially improved. Cannot something be done to help this situation? I note that insufficient steel is being allotted to freight car builders, so that cars are not being built to the full capacity of these plants. What, may I ask, is more important to the commerce of America, and to the war effort, as well, than the 100 percent efficiency of the railroads. Personally, I feel that the railroads have, through efficient management, performed an almost superhuman task with the cars that they have.

I, as a shipper, would like to have you advise me what I can do, first, to help correct the improper distribution of boxcars, and, secondly, what can be done to assist in a more adequate new car building program.

I am sending a copy of this letter to our Kansas Senators and Representatives, who are fully cognizant, I am sure, of the drastic need of more cars and of their more adequate distribution.

Very truly yours,
SAM P. WALLINGFORD.

Leadership, Not St. Lawrence Seaway, Vital in Current Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the January 19, 1951, issue of the Wilkes-Barre, Pa., Times-Leader, speaks for itself:

LEADERSHIP, NOT SEAWAY, VITAL IN CURRENT CRISIS

An Associated Press dispatch from Detroit yesterday quoted President Truman as saying that the St. Lawrence project has become a matter of very high urgency. He was, of course, referring to the seaway. His message was addressed to a group of Great Lakes labor leaders who will back the seaway for obvious reasons, with or without a Presidential appeal.

Truman lets himself wide open when he implies that all will be lost in the developing struggle without the seaway. It is absolutely untrue that the seaway is vital to our national security as he states. Franklin Roosevelt said the same thing a decade ago and history records we won the Second World War without any seaway. We shall come out on top in the current crisis, too, if we can survive the incompetency in Washington.

What the United States needs at the moment urgently is not the seaway, but leadership. What passes for that in the Nation's Capital today is pathetic. Perhaps never in the country's history have we been so impoverished in the top echelons.

When the President of the United States tells the public the St. Lawrence seaway is essential when it manifestly is not, and when it is generally known he is trying to put across this pet scheme, together with other crackpot ideas, under the guise of national defense, then it is time to call a spade a spade. Truman, the vigilant opportunist and politician, obviously is willing to gamble with American lives as well as dollars, to say nothing of liberty itself, just to advance his program. Such an attitude when Americans are being called on to sacrifice is despicable.

If the St. Lawrence seaway were as essential as Truman pretends, which it isn't, it could not be constructed in time to have any bearing on the outcome of the current controversy.

Home Folks Urged To Write Often to Boys in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I believe that every Member of Congress and, indeed, all of the American people will be deeply interested in the attached letter which I have received from an Army sergeant now stationed in San Francisco:

I am a sergeant in the United States Army, recently returned from Korea. I am not writing this in any official capacity (but with knowledge and permission of Sixth Army PIO).

I am trying to keep a personal promise I made to my buddies in Korea and elsewhere.

I am in the Army—I've been in the Navy—I served with the Marines and Air Force. I have spent over 6 years overseas and many months in Army hospitals and I have seen too many servicemen there fighting the unnecessary extra battle against despondency, lonesomeness, and the terrible feeling of being unloved and forgotten by the folks back home.

All the attention and care of the various morale, recreational, athletic, spiritual, and special-service sections of the various components of the Armed Forces, the Red Cross and their unsurpassed Grey Ladies, the superlative entertainment of such top-notch entertainers as Bob Hope, Bing Crosby, and others cannot completely combat this melancholy and misery without the wholehearted support and cooperation of the folks back home themselves.

My request of you will clarify the entire problem and solution.

Will you please join with other radio, TV, stage, movie, magazine, newspaper, lecture, church, club, and other celebrities to urge the folks at home to please write cheery, newsy letters—often—with their latest snapshot—and some small, inexpensive gift once in a while, to their relatives, friends, acquaintances, or home-town boys overseas or in the Armed Forces' hospitals?

This is my own personal campaign for mail from home for my buddies. Will you please let me know what you sincerely and frankly think of it and what you will do to help get mail from home for the boys overseas and in our Armed Forces' hospitals?

Respectfully yours,
Sgt. WILBUR F. H. RADELINE.

P. S.—I have received some specific requests for mail from home from servicemen from many localities, races, and creeds.

Thirty-second Anniversary of the Founding of the American Legion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to insert a statement I am making in regard to the thirty-second anniversary of the founding of the American Legion.

Thirty-two years ago there gathered at Paris, France, a caucus of more than a thousand of our fighting men of World War I, led by the son of our former fighting President, a hero of another war, Theodore Roosevelt. The purpose of the meeting was to start the organization of veterans of the just-ended war. They appointed an executive group to make the initial organization in the States and adopted the name, "The American Legion." The preamble of its constitution is:

For God and country, we associate ourselves together for the following purposes: To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to maintain law and order; to foster and perpetuate a 100-percent Americanism; to preserve the memories and incidents of our associations in the great wars; to inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, State, and Nation; to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses; to make right the master of might; to promote peace and good will on earth; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy; to consecrate and sanctify our comradeship by our devotion to mutual helpfulness.

From the million and a quarter members from World War I, its membership increased to more than 3,000,000 when its charter was amended to admit veterans of World War II. Last December Congress further amended its charter so that veterans of the present fighting will be eligible. It is now the world's largest veterans' organization and no one can estimate what its future membership will become.

Over the years this great organization has continued to serve in peace as it served in war. This service has not been limited to service to its membership or to veterans. A great part of its time and money has been spent on activities for the welfare of the community, State, and Nation. At its 1922 convention in New Orleans it started upon a program of child welfare. Since that time it has spent over $80,000,000 on the program and is now recognized as one of the Nation's great agencies in this field.

Its other great programs of Americanism—national security, juvenile delinquency, and others—have rendered outstanding service. In my opinion, its programs for Boys' State and Girls' State are outstanding. In my own State for 1 week selected boys from our high schools are brought together at Jacksons Mill for lessons and experience in government at all levels. For another week there is the same program for girls. Here they receive instructions from officials of government. I am proud of the fact that the Legion of West Virginia established the first Negro Boys' State and the second White Boys' State in the Nation.

Ever since its organization the American Legion has fought for adequate national defense, including universal military training. Most of us have seen it assume leadership in times of floods and other local emergencies. Its work for education is well known. It is credited with the origin of American Education Week, which has been observed annually for 30 years. During this week it directs public attention to the accomplishments and needs of our public schools.

Its accomplishments in the fields of unselfish service to all of our people, not just veterans, can hardly be mentioned much less discussed in the short time at my disposal. I congratulate the American Legion on its outstanding record and express my sincere appreciation.

Eloquent Tribute to St. Patrick by Hon. John F. Shelley, of California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an eloquent speech made by my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHELLEY], at the 1951 St. Patrick's Day banquet given by the Ancient Order of Hibernians in Washington, D. C.:

SPEECH BY HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY, OF CALIFORNIA, AT ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS DINNER, ST. PATRICK'S DAY, 1951

In the course of my forty-odd years I have attended a great many St. Patrick's Day celebrations—listened to a great many speeches in praise of St. Patrick in particular and the Irish, God love 'em, in general. I have even made a few myself. Looking back on them now—my own included—I think that they may have been bad speeches, although they went over big. They were pretty much the same; they recounted the glorious history of St. Patrick; followed up with accounts of the Irish heroes of history and their heroic deeds; and then the speaker sat down, with his audience emotionally charged, and cheering.

I think now that those speeches may have been bad, not because they were not oratorical masterpieces, nor because they were not true—but because they dwelt too much on the glories of the past and said nothing constructive about the future in which we and our children and their children must live. Now, I do not intend to ignore St. Patrick—he wasn't the kind of man you can ignore. Neither do I intend to forget the countless other Irish heroes, saintly, or warlike, or both. What I want to do is to place those ancestors of ours in the context of our times, and to say what I think they would say about the future of Ireland and the world, and Ireland's place in the present crisis and the future struggle.

The age in which St. Patrick lived was one in which ancient institutions were breaking down and confusion reigning in men's minds. The Roman Empire was disintegrating and with it the political structure of the civilized world. Fear and uncertainty were everywhere in that chaotic time.

Into his part of that world—into Ireland—St. Patrick brought two great and related ideas—faith and freedom. He was first and foremost an apostle of the Catholic faith. There were apparently Christians in Ireland before him, but he made the country dominantly Christian, and so thoroughly that Ireland became for the next several hundred years a center of learning and a center of missionary activity. It remained so, in fact, until the energies of the people were consumed in fighting off the attempts of their neighboring island to conquer them and they had no more left for teaching their arts and ethics to others. Up until that time Irish missionaries had gone to Scotland, to Northern and Central Europe, and Ireland was a kind of headquarters of culture and religion for Western Europe.

As well as being an apostle of faith, and quite as logically, St. Patrick was an apostle of freedom. He had been slave. He endeavored to make people free. He challenged the royal authority of the pagan chieftains, protested and opposed raids by British bands who carried Irish captives off into slavery, and raised money for the ransoming of these captives.

Ladies and gentlemen, the story of St. Patrick has peculiar relevance today, because we also live in a chaotic age when the old structures, political and otherwise, on which humanity rested are breaking down under the force of wars and history. Fear and uncertainty reign in many places and in many minds. Moreover, there is a great and powerful concerted attack on just the things for which St. Patrick stood.

The specter of Soviet communism which is stalking over the world today is the denial of religious faith, and at the same time the denial of human freedom. Communism is Godless. It is also a system of slavery based on contempt for, and oppression of the common man.

But there are weapons which will defeat Stalinism. They are the same weapons as those wielded by St. Patrick in his fight against false gods and inhuman men. On the one hand he held to his faith in God, on the other, to his faith in human freedom, and the human will to be free. These are indestructible, and while we cling to them we are indestructible too. That is the lesson of St. Patrick for this year 1951.

We know how those weapons served the Irish people—helped along, it is true, by other weapons which Irish courage saw fit to use—in the long struggle against British domination; a struggle not yet completely won. From the three O'Neills to the days of Wolfe Tone; from O'Connell and Parnell to De Valera and McSweeney, the Irish have kept their faith, their freedom of spirit, and their fists, alive to fight against religious persecution and foreign control. Though the wall built by the partitioners still casts a shadow over the island, the whole world knows that, essentially, Ireland is one, united, free, and ready to fight to remain so.

The Irish have not fought for freedom in Ireland alone. The United States can count an endless number of heroes of Irish birth or descent. Charles Carroll, founder of Maryland, was one of these, and it was in Maryland that religious freedom was really born in this country. Twelve signers of the Declaration of Independence were Irish. Eleven Irish generals of the Revolutionary armies, including a Sullivan and a Conway; the Navy's Barry and McDonough, and hundreds of other Irishmen helped to set the country free; Andrew Jackson, fighter and great defender of democracy, was of Irish descent. The list goes on through Gen. Phil Sheridan to Al Smith, and the many Irish heroes of World Wars I and II, including General McAuliffe who said "Nuts" to the Germans at Bastogne, Colin Kelly, whose heroic death in the Pacific gave us renewed courage after Pearl Harbor, and the five Sullivan brothers who gave up their lives when the cruiser Juneau was sunk by the Japanese in the Pacific.

Our sister republics in South America have likewise benefited from the leadership of men of Irish blood. There was Bernard O'Higgins, whose name is a byword among liberty-loving South Americans, and there were a great many others too numerous to mention. Wherever Irishmen immigrated they gave new life to the nation of their choice.

Now, the achievements of these men were remarkable, but they did not achieve what they did simply by sitting in admiration of St. Patrick. They followed the old precept of "Go thou, and do likewise." The glory of St. Patrick was reflected in their deeds, but they also infused something of their own spirit. They took the good saint's principles and they fitted them to their own hour and their own need.

There is a lesson in that for us Irish, both here in America, in Ireland, and throughout the world. Ireland, and God knows our hearts are with her, is now in what may be hoped are the last stages of the fight to end the pernicious partition and to become what Cardinal O'Donnell referred to as "Ireland, one and indivisible, though the heavens fall."

The opposition to partition—the fight for a United Ireland—are in the very best of Irish tradition. It has been a bitter war marked by British deceit and brutality, and by typical Irish patriotism and courage. It should not be forgotten, nor should it be shelved. The world today has great need for the courage and the faith in God and his principles that St. Patrick gave to the Irish. The whole world is now lined up in a cold war in which the issues are clear. The choice is between western democracy and man's right to his belief in his God on the one hand, and godless communism on the other. A world-wide conflagration may break out at any moment.

In such a situation, I have no doubt as to what St. Patrick would do or say. He would be in the vanguard of the forces of freedom and Christianity leading the drive to rid the world of the serpent of communism. St. Patrick did not do his fighting from the side lines—he led the way.

Ireland is not now a member of the United Nations. She has been kept from full participation by the vote of Soviet Russia and her satellites. Though participating in the activities of some of the associated agencies, her voice has not been heard in the General Assembly or the Security Council. For that reason, Ireland should and will work doubly hard in combating the menace of world communism at every possible turn. By such action, and only such action, can she live up to the great tradition of St. Patrick and Brian Boru; of Commodore Barry and of General McAuliffe. Ireland is the true heir to the mantle of St. Patrick, to the principles for which he fought, and the leadership he showed. The Western World needs those principles and that leadership now as never before. Ireland must be allowed to take her place in the forefront of the battle and show the world that neither she nor her sons have forgotten how to fight the good fight, and to keep the faith.

It may be bitter for the people of Ireland and for its leaders to realize that while the United Nations, with the United States in the lead, are throwing the weight of the Western World into the battle in Korea in an effort to throw out a foreign power occupying a part of the nation, and to end the partition, if possible; Ireland herself suffers under a no less unjustifiable occupation and partition, and the rest of the world does nothing about it. England is left to work her will in the six counties—against the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the people of Ireland.

In spite of this we of Irish blood cannot afford to ignore our obligations to the principle laid down by St. Patrick—the principle that faith and freedom must be fought for if they are to be won and held. Communism has made fewer converts in Eire than anywhere else in the civilized world in proportion to population. It is up to her to show the rest of the world how to beat down the threat which faces it. Eire must not be isolated from the community of nations when her religious faith and her matchless ability to fight for freedom are so sorely needed. Ireland alone cannot keep her freedom if the forces of communism are not destroyed. But Ireland can provide inspired leadership to the democratic peoples of the world in the common fight to preserve freedom everywhere.

Let us take a look at Ireland's recent history—and in doing so, we cannot fail to get a better appreciation of what her present-day leaders could and would do for the cause of western civilization if they were permitted.

It remained for our own day to produce some of the greatest heroes and the brightest victories, as well as the most tragic martyrs of the battle for home rule for Ireland. Most of us know—some of us may have seen for ourselves, others have heard from our brothers, our parents, or our friends and relatives—the story of the Easter rebellion of 1916. We have been thrilled by the details of the battle around Dublin Castle and the heroism of Eamon de Valera and his comrades. We have grieved over those who died in the uprising or were executed afterward. We know that though the uprising failed of its immediate purpose it lit fires in the hearts of Irishmen everywhere which have not yet been extinguished.

For 2 years thereafter the civil conflict continued with the Sinn Fein leading the Irish people in their resistance to British rule. Eventually, in December of 1918, a general election was ordered for the whole of Ireland, supposedly to settle once and for all the question of independence for Ireland. The costly attempt to maintain control by force, and the weight of world opinion as voiced in the proclamation of the right to self-determination by the victorious democracies in World War I, had forced England to this step. Despite the fact that the election was held under British law and was carried out while a British army occupied the whole island, the result was overwhelmingly in favor of national independence. Out of 105 electoral divisions 79 voted for independence and only 26 against. The popular vote was over 80 percent in favor of independence.

In response to this expression of the national will the elected representatives of the people of Ireland assembled in Dublin on January 21, 1919, declared Ireland an independent nation, and established a government and the Dail Eireann the national legislature. The English, going back on their promises, refused to recognize this action, and thus a virtual state of war again broke out between the Irish Republic and Great Britain. The British sent in their Black and Tans, imposed martial law, and tried to force Ireland to give up her independence. Ireland, of course, continued the battle. Finally, as a last resort, the British Parliament on December 23, 1920, without an Irishman voting, passed a Government of Ireland Act—the Act of Partition, whereby the six counties were cut off from the homeland.

The Irish people rightfully refused to accept this settlement. The Sinn Fein again led the war against the occupying Black and Tan army of the British, and the attempt to force acceptance of the partition was wholly unsuccessful in the greater part of Ireland. Despite the fact that a Northern Ireland government was set up in Belfast, even this was the will of England only, and was opposed by the majority in the six counties broken off.

It was during this period that the heroic hunger strikes took place and Terrence McSweeney, in giving up his life, brought world sympathy to the Irish cause.

In the partition election of May 1921, intended to put the Government of Ireland Act into effect, out of a total of 186 seats in both the north and the south Parliaments, 140 were won by the Republicans; thus, Ireland, as a whole, repudiated the act. The British again set up martial law and bitter fighting again took place. Finally, on December 6, 1921, after almost 6 months of negotiations between the leaders of the Sinn Fein and the British, a treaty was signed establishing the Irish Free State, and partition became an accomplished fact. Even with this, the English deceit was not ended, since the treaty called for revising the boundary between Northern Ireland and the free state to free some of the Irish Republicans who form a majority in four of the six counties, and this was never done. England's latest act, intended to cement her position in Northern Ireland, was to pass the so-called Ireland bill in May of 1949. In this bill they presumed to declare that Northern Ireland will never cease to be a part of the United Kingdom without the consent of the Parliament of Northern Ireland. Incidentally, this is a fine time for England to begin to worry about obtaining the consent of her subject Parliament when questions of how they are to be ruled come up.

This Ireland bill has served to keep Ireland out of participation in the North Atlantic Defense Treaty, since one of the purposes of that treaty is to preserve the territorial integrity of the participating nations, and Ireland fears that her adherence to the pact would be interpreted as recognizing England's claim that Northern Ireland is an integral part of the United Kingdom.

That is where the matter stands today. Despite protest after protest, the English have refused to concede that, by any standard, Ireland should be one and united. Irishmen in either North or South consider themselves as Irish, not English or British, or anything but Irish. The population is homogeneous, the island is one geographic unit, her history and traditions are distinctively national, and even her churches, whether Catholic or Protestant, are organized on a national all-Ireland basis. Her learned bodies and her sports organizations are nationwide. Ireland is divided only in the minds of the Government of England and in the measures England has forced upon the island.

What can we here do to end this intolerable situation? It is true that our State Department has said that we should maintain a hands-off attitude; that partition is an internal problem, with which we should not be concerned. But I say that it is no more internal than the invasion of South Korea, and we are certainly involved there. It is no more right that the island of Ireland should be divided than that the Korean peninsula should be.

Fortunately, we Americans of Irish descent or birth, do have a program for putting the great moral weight of the United States behind the fight to end partition in Ireland, and to end English rule there forevermore. In April of last year the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives held hearings on a number of resolutions which had been introduced in the House, and which would have put the United States solidly on record as favoring unification of Ireland. Some of these resolutions provided means for our active participation in action leading to unification. Those resolutions had been introduced by Members of Congress of Irish descent, and received strong support in the hearings on the subject. Unfortunately, the Foreign Affairs Committee did not see fit to report any of them to the floor of the House. You may be sure, however, that this program will not be allowed to die, and eventually, we hope that the Congress will take action placing this country in the fight to end partition—and leading the fight, as it should. Ireland has made great contributions in culture and leadership to the United States, she has given the same strong support to democratic ideals; it is time that the United States do something to help Ireland gain her complete freedom.

We of Irish blood in Congress did something else last year to open the eyes of the English to how strong the feeling in this country in opposition to partition is. On March 29 of last year, when the Foreign Economic Assistance Act of 1950 was under consideration by the House, an amendment was introduced by Congressman JOHN FOGARTY and was accepted. This amendment was designed to withhold assistance from the United Kingdom until partition in Ireland was ended. Although the amendment was later stricken out of the bill, it did awaken England to some consciousness of American and world feeling on the matter. As a matter of fact, there was much scurrying about the Capitol and the State Department by worried British diplomats during the period of debate on the bill. These actions have forced England to take a new look at her policy.

You may be sure that I and all the other Congressmen who have engaged in this fight will carry on until England does more than simply take a new look. We want her to take positive action and get out of Ireland, and we will not be satisfied until she does so. If Irish people everywhere get behind this program of pressure on England from the United States, we may be able to write a new page in Irish history for our grandchildren to read—the story of how the English were finally driven out of Ireland.

Knowing this history of persistent courage and remarkable leadership on the part of the Irish people, who can doubt that their full participation in the titanic world struggle now shaping up would provide inspiration for the rest of the democratic world—inspiration which might well spell the difference between victory and defeat?

I realize, however, quoting an official Irish Government memorandum, that although "Ireland is earnestly desirous of playing her full part in protecting Christian civilization and the democratic way of life * * * [she] is faced with grave difficulties from the strategic and political points of view." This is true, both because the "continued partition of Ireland is naturally and bitterly resented by the Irish people" and because without a single integrated authority either the defense or the effective utilization of the island's capacities are impossible.

I therefore, call upon our own Government to recognize that as long as the Western World countenances the unjust partition we cannot muster our fullest strength to fight the injustice of communism. I call upon the Congress of the United States and the present administration to accept the program sponsored by the friends of Ireland in Congress and to put the full weight of the United States behind unification of Ireland and the end of partition.

To that end, may we of Irish descent or Irish birth go forward, inspired by the holiness of St. Patrick and the legions of Irish heroes through the generations, guided by Christian principles, encouraged by our knowledge of and adherence to the righteousness of our cause, thankful to Almighty God for His blessings and praying for His strengthening so that the day will come in the near future when Ireland will be one.

May God give to all of us the courage and strength of St. Patrick so that we may fight until that day, and beyond that day, until the time when the whole world is free of tyranny and oppression.

It Is Just Common Sense to Ask Why We Arrived at Our Present Positions

REMARKS

OF

HON. B. CARROLL REECE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, we are now in the months of hallowed memories of great Americans. February 12 is the birthday of the sublime Lincoln, whose faith in democracy and freedom was expressed in always telling the people the truth, whose noble nature was incapable of betraying free government by resorting to political subterfuge. February 22 is the birthday of George Washington, whose last words of warning to the Nation he loved was to keep away from foreign entanglements. December 29 is the birthday of Andrew Johnson, the able and fearless defender of the Constitution. April 13 is the birthday of Thomas Jefferson, who clearly foresaw disaster to the Republic if the Federal Government developed into an inquisitorial bureaucracy sustained by crushing taxes on the backs of the people.

Today the political wisdom of these great Americans is desperately needed. For many years now the people have lived under a government which has repeatedly deceived them, which has led them blindfolded into global wars that have wasted their resources and drenched the soil of far away lands with the blood of their sons. They have lived under a government which in only 17 years has grown into a bureaucratic Frankenstein which picks their pockets of vast sums to support hordes of spoil seekers. More ominous than all, however, is the fact that all this misrule has now brought the Nation to the verge of another global conflict the prospective burdens of which may be reckoned in the lives of millions of American youths and the economic exhaustion of America.

Within a few weeks Congress will probably have approved of the drafting of 18-year-old youths. A staggering budget has already been requested by the President. Across the waters we still do not know what real effort our hailed allies such as socialist England and radical France are willing to make, or how much trust we can put in foreign divisions reported to be honeycombed with Communist influence, or whether the troops we may commit to Europe will be subjected to the same vacillation and procrastination of a United Nations organization which for 7 months has been unable to take the action necessary for us to save the lives of thousands of American boys in Korea as well as our national honor. While war with Russia is still far from certain, our Socialist planners in Government are moving swiftly to utilize the emergency to clamp down authoritative controls on the life of the people in every direction—a pattern which they hope to make permanent.

Never before in our history is it so necessary for the people to think clearly about the perils which confront us. It is just common sense to ask why we arrived in our present perilous position—where we find ourselves after distributing vast largesses in the form of money and food and materials throughout the globe, comparatively alone and friendless in the world of diplomacy. This just did not happen. It has come about as the result of a series of tragic mistakes—mistakes which must be carefully examined. For it is only in the light of past performance that the Congress and the American people can judge of what they can expect in the future.

Let me go back some 30 years to World War I. That was the start of our troubles today. It was under the aggressive leadership of a Democratic President in 1917 that America first departed from the wisdom of Washington and took sides in a European war. Europe has been the great war factory of the world for centuries. Since the twelfth century there have been very few years when nations of Europe were not warring among themselves. But under President Wilson the farsightedness of Washington was abandoned and America launched on an interventionist role in Old World quarrels which has gained us nothing as a Nation but a staggering load of debt and foreign burial grounds for our youth and gained nothing for the world but the destruction of free government.

How was America lured into World War I? From the beginning international banking houses in the United States took a definitely unneutral attitude, favoring investment in the bonds of the Allied countries and discouraging or refusing investment in the paper of the Central Powers. This immediately gave us a strong financial stake in the cause of the Allies—a stake that grew larger with each year of the war. Likewise American industry became violently pro-Ally. The illegal British blockade of the Central Powers crippled our foreign trade and industry eagerly embraced the opportunity to sell to the Allies. All this made it easy for propagandists of the Allied cause to mold public opinion in America toward our participation in the war. Americans knew little about the history of Europe and they swallowed bait, line, and sinker the most unblushing and vicious propaganda. Allied propagandists shaped public opinion to believe that the Kaiser started the war for the purpose of conquering the world and in consequence the United States had to get into this struggle to "make the world safe for democracy." German militarism was represented as the taproot of European wars. This central thesis was reinforced by a collateral one that the Central Powers were moral degenerates. The American people were deluged with atrocity stories about the Germans, such as cutting off the hands of Belgian children. Little Serbia was pictured as the victim of brutal aggression by Austria, the declaration of war by Austria against Serbia having started the European conflagration. The sinking of the Lusitania was branded as a classic case of barbarianism. The unrestricted submarine warfare of the Germans against merchant ships was denounced to the high heavens as a barbaric violation of international law. The lofty moral propaganda of the Allies strongly influenced the American people to feel that they could not possibly keep out of the struggle without becoming unfaithful to all that was good and decent in their own manhood.

Ten years after the end of World War I the most distinguished historians in America, England, France, and Russia had amassed sickening but thoroughly convincing evidence that America had been tragically misled by foreign propaganda. Looked at coldly from the American standpoint it was all too clear we had been fooled into a war that was not worth the life of a single American mule. The facts established showed that—

First. The Kaiser did not start the war. On the contrary, he tried to stop it. The real culprits were Russia and France, the former seeking to gain possession of Constantinople—the dream of Russian foreign policy for many years—and the latter seeking to recapture Alsace-Lorraine which Germany had taken from France in 1870. The immediate cause of the war had been the order of the Russian Czar to mobilize the Russian Army on Germany's borders. This was followed by French mobilization since Russia and France had been working together for years to bring about a showdown with Germany and Austria so that their territorial ambitions could be realized. Germany caught between these two mobilizations had no choice but to strike as quickly as possible.

Second. When the German archives were finally opened to the world there was not the slightest evidence that the Kaiser had been plotting to conquer the world. German militarism was less potent than French and Russian militarism at the outbreak of the war. Germany had an army of 806,000, France, 816,000, while that of Russia was 1,284,000. Pitrim Sorokin's masterful study of the frequency of wars in Europe from the twelfth century to 1925 showed that in terms of percent of years at war Spain registered 67 percent—the highest—and Germany 28 percent—the lowest. England during 56 percent of this time period was at war and France 50 percent of the time. But the defeat of Germany did not free Europe from militarism. France became the big military bully of Europe after World War I—so bad a bully that Woodrow Wilson before he died in the twenties said, "I would like to see France licked and I would like to tell Jusserand so to his face." In World War II the American people again set out to crush German militarism only to find that Russia took over the role of bully on a far bigger scale in European politics.

Third. The facts revealed about Serbia were particularly depressing. Serbian officials had actually organized the plot to assassinate the Archduke Franz Ferdinand at Serajevo in 1914. The Prime Minister of Serbia knew all about the existence of the plot nearly a month before it was executed, but made no effort to warn the Austrian Government. Serbian officials had supplied out of Serbian arsenals the bombs and pistols used in the assassination and had even given the assassins pistol practice in the woods of Belgrade. During the war the Serbian Government fearful that its complicity in this plot might leak out liquidated Dragutin Dimitrijevitch, chief of the Intelligence Division of the Serbian General Staff, who had been the administrative brains in organizing the murder of the archduke. The weapon of assassination failing, Dimitrijevitch was condemned to death on a trumped-up charge of treason and shot at Saloniki in June 1917.

Fourth. The atrocity tales about the Germans had been faked. Belgian authorities denied them after the war. Lloyd George, of England, and Nitti, of Italy, admitted that no one had ever seen a Belgian child with its hands cut off by the Germans. Gen. J. V. Charteris, Chief of the Intelligence Division of the British Army during the war, in a speech before the National Arts Club in New York City on October 19, 1925, cheerfully told how he had faked photographs to arouse both British and American public opinion. The most nauseating evidence was uncovered showing the existence in France of photograph factories which turned out faked atrocity pictures on a mass scale.

Fifth. The Lusitania was an armed merchantman and carried contraband on her last voyage. More shocking she was at that time a registered auxiliary cruiser of the British Navy which automatically deprived her of any protection by international law.

Sixth. Unrestricted submarine warfare had been forced upon the Central Powers because of English violations of international law with respect to the rights of neutral shipping. These violations even included using the American flag on British ships carrying war cargo. Through its illegal blockade of Germany the people of the Central Powers were being starved out. Had America effectively protested British violations of international law Germany would not have had to resort desperately to submarine warfare. German submarine warfare was conducted without atrocities. Admiral Sims challenged anyone to produce evidence of more than one German atrocity in the period of submarine activity, and the officers guilty of this were punished by the German Government.

The idealistic professions of allied propagandists about World War I were completely discredited by the discovery of the notorious secret treaties between the Allies—treaties that embodied as sordid a program of territorial pilfering as can be found in the history of diplomacy.

Seventh. America was taken into World War I by a President who concealed his intentions from the people. In January 1916 President Wilson sent Colonel House abroad to inform Lord Grey that the United States would enter the war "as soon as he could bring American opinion to that point." A month after the departure of Colonel House, Wilson emphatically declared in a speech at Milwaukee that the United States would not intervene in the World War. In April 1916 Wilson called to the White House the Democratic leaders of Congress and asked them to aid him in throwing the country into war, but they firmly refused to support him in any such action. Yet Wilson coolly planned the campaign of 1916 to get himself reelected on a platform of that "He kept us out of war." This duplicity of Wilson is shocking enough, but under President Roosevelt political duplicity to force America into another global war was elevated into an all-out weapon against democracy.

What were the results of World War I so far as America was concerned? We took the lead in imposing on Germany a vicious and unjust peace making her solely responsible for the war and in setting up a world organization to enforce it and thereby sowed the seeds of World War II. At a tremendous cost in American lives and economic resources we handed out "freedom" to a number of newly created European states only to find that within a few years these states had gone fascist and freedom had been destroyed from within them by the people themselves. To repair the ravages of war in Europe billions of American investor's dollars were poured down a rat hole and the problem of always-at-war Europe intensified.

In between World Wars I and II public opinion in America, following the revelations of the revisionist historians, soured on America's first crusade. There was a deep national feeling of having been tricked into the First World War, or for reasons which, in retrospect, seemed inadequate to justify the expenditure of blood and treasure. In this change of sentiment a student of public opinion recorded: "American newspapers in 1921 said that the only American book supremely popular in Europe was Uncle Sam's pocketbook; in 1923 we had become a leading member of the league of donations; in 1928 that Europe counted too much on being 'Yank-ed' out of economic difficulties; in 1932 that our being expected to succor Europe suggested too strongly sucker; in 1933 that whenever an international conference met to get at the bottom of things, one of the things is Uncle Sam's pocket."

In 1937, 71 percent of the people who replied to a national public-opinion poll expressed the opinion that our participation in the First World War had been a mistake. This judgment of the people found reflection in legislation designed to remove for any future war emergency in Europe the immediate cause of America's involvement in the First World War. This immediate cause had been Wilson's assertion of America's rights on the high seas against the German submarine blockade. So it was decided to forego those rights in advance, as not worth the cost of war. On May 1, 1937, neutrality legislation, passed overwhelmingly by both Houses of Congress, was enacted. In the event of any war in Europe or elsewhere there was to be an embargo on the sale of arms, munitions, and implements of war to all belligerents. American citizens were forbidden to travel on belligerent ships and to buy or sell securities of warring powers.

Now how did we get into World War II after the people had had their eyes opened to the truth about World War I and after the people themselves had brought about the enactment of strong neutrality legislation?

There is no better summary of how this was accomplished than the words of Sir Oliver Lyttleton, British Minister to the American Chamber of Commerce in London June 20, 1944:

> America provoked Japan to such an extent that the Japanese were forced to attack Pearl Harbor. It is a travesty on history to say that America was forced into the war.

To millions of Americans Pearl Harbor was an attack by Japan that spoke for itself. Actually, it was the inevitable end result of a long series of political maneuvers conducted behind an iron curtain of secrecy by President Roosevelt. Behind this iron curtain—which had as much iron in it as its Russian type—Roosevelt was able to do three things:

First. To fool Congress into passing measures on the ground that they were intended to keep the Nation out of war when he intended them to put the Nation into war.

Second. To arouse the war spirit in the people by deliberate misrepresentations of military facts.

Third. To force Japan to fire the first shot which automatically put us into war.

Let me give you some examples. Lend-lease, which repealed in substance the Neutrality Act, was put forward by administrative spokesmen in Congress as a measure intended to keep America out of war. Churchill had said, "Give us the tools and we will do the job," and these spokesmen harped on the theme that in this way the United States could stay out of the war. Yet at the very time when anxious Congressmen were being assured that the lend-lease bill was designed to avoid war, important American and British staff talks were taking place in Washington in an atmosphere of extreme secrecy. Before the bill had even passed these military and naval experts had adopted a report which took for granted American participation in the war. The report read:

> The staff conference assumes that when the United States becomes involved in war with Germany.

Robert Sherwood in his book, Roosevelt and Hopkins, admits that "had the details of these plans—the staff meetings—fallen into the hands of Congress or the press, American preparation for war might have been wall-nigh wrecked and ruined." There could scarcely be a more candid admission from a Roosevelt worshiping source that America was stealthily maneuvered into war behind the backs of and without the knowledge of the elected representatives of the people.

Lend-lease contained amendments to prevent the President from using the bill as an authorization for carrying on an undeclared war. Convoying by United States naval ships was forbidden as was the entry of any American vessels into a combat area. From behind his iron curtain Roosevelt announced a patrol policy which he could secretly employ to get around the amendments to lend-lease. To the public this policy meant use of our naval vessels and planes to patrol American waters to prevent any sudden attack by Germany on our shores. Our ships and planes were directed to report the presence of any German raiders or submarines in our waters to the British Navy. The catch in this was that our ships and planes tracked down German ships and subs far beyond the limits of American waters—in fact all the way across the Atlantic—so as to protect British convoys laden with American implements of war.

As a result of his patrol policy Roosevelt did not hesitate to falsify the alleged attack on the Greer, an American destroyer bound for Iceland. He told the people that this ship, flying the American flag, had been wantonly attacked by a German submarine. What he concealed was the fact that the Greer had followed the German sub for hours reporting its position to the British Navy far beyond American waters. The sub in desperation had finally surfaced and fired at the Greer and had then fled.

After reporting similarly distorted incidents to the people, Roosevelt then calmly announced a shooting war in which our ships and planes would supposedly in American waters—but actually all over the North Atlantic—go after German ships and subs without continuing to report their position to the British Navy for the kill.

Thus the United States behind Roosevelt's iron curtain was actually at war with Germany more than a year before Pearl Harbor unbeknown to the American people. But in spite of all this Roosevelt could not push the Nation into war. A number of polls registered the dismaying fact that the people still did not want to get into another European war. So Roosevelt, behind his iron curtain of secret diplomacy, concentrated his efforts on Japan, and there he was successful. He was finally able to maneuver Japan into firing the first shot and to plunge the Nation into the war for which he had been working for a long time. Because of secret diplomacy the American people knew nothing of Prince Konoye's efforts when he was the Japanese Prime Minister to meet with Roosevelt at Honolulu or Alaska or that he was willing even to get Japan out of China if given a little time to save face in the Orient. They knew nothing of the fact that Secretary Hull had actually worked out a reasonable program of compromise with Japan but withdrew it because of opposition of China and England and our own Lattimore to any compromise or that thereafter there were no terms whatsoever save the impossible ones submitted in the ultimatum to Japan on November 28, a few days before Pearl Harbor. They knew nothing of plan B submitted by the Japanese Government. All they knew was what Roosevelt permitted them to be told and this information was selected to picture the United States as doing its utmost for peace with a war-lustful Japan and getting nowhere. Behind his iron curtain of secret diplomacy Roosevelt finally goaded the Japs into making the attack which put us into the war.

If our policies toward Japan were not calculated to goad her into striking first at the United States, what excuse could be given for them. Japan consists of a group of islands inhabited before the war by some 70,000,000 persons—a population that was increasing yearly at the rate of 650,000. The total arable land surface of Japan is less than the improved farmlands of New York State alone. Since the turn of the century Japan had been forced to find an outlet for the extra people at home, territory which could also supply her teeming domestic population with food. She had found such an outlet in northern Asia, in a part of the world that is very lightly populated, and which had been accustomed to such outrageous forms of government that the inhabitants could not possibly be worse off than they were ever before. Every important nation in history faced with overpopulation has acted just as Japan did, and anyone in America who might deplore this in Japan is politely requested to weep on the shoulders of our own Indians. At any rate Roosevelt suddenly became indignant at Japan's war with China, a war that had practically become a stalemate because of the geographic unconquerability of China.

If Japanese expansion had been toward the United States, toward the Philippines and Hawaii, we would have had something to complain about. But Japanese expansion was away from our interests. So Roosevelt waxed more and more indignant over noble China, the same China that today has embraced communism, and froze Japanese assets in the United States, embargoed vital products from American to Japan, punched away at her from behind his iron curtain and finally had issued an ultimatum which Japan could not accept. We then brought down in ruin the only nation of Asia that had a democratic legislature which controlled the purse strings, the only Asisatic nation that could be counted on to oppose the expansion of Communist Russia in Asia. Today, having handed over food lands in Asia to Mao, the Communist, Japan's economy is now on Uncle Sam's bounty roll.

But even more repulsive in its consequences was Roosevelt's use of his iron curtain to build Russian military strength and to make war settlements with her that reeked of barbarianism and make inevitable her present challenge to civilization.

At Tehran Roosevelt sold Yugoslavia down the river to Tito, and abandoned the heroic Mihailovic, the anti-Communist leader, to the fate of death by a firing squad of Tito's Communists. This was a crime against the people of Yugoslavia. King Peter, head of the Yugoslav government-in-exile, pleaded with Roosevelt in a letter to him that "he could not abandon Mihailovic without betraying the people of Yugoslavia" and said "I would become a traitor to my people and to my army in Yugoslavia." But Peter got the brush-off from the great Franklin who seemed so eager to please Russia.

It was at Yalta that Roosevelt sold both China and Poland down the river to Russia. His gift of China to Stalin was unbelievable in the lights of the facts now known. Two days before Roosevelt left for Yalta he had in his hands a 40-page memorandum from General MacArthur outlining overtures of the Japanese for peace. All the Japs asked for was the preservation of the Emperor, the same terms that the Japanese accepted 4 months later after the dropping of the atom bomb on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Capt. Ellis M. Zacharias, Navy expert on Japan, asserts that intelligence reports indicating Japanese impending willingness to surrender were also available. American warships were known to be cruising along the shores of Japan bombarding at will.

Yet, at Yalta Roosevelt "bribed" Russia to get into the war against Japan by handing over to Russia Manchuria, the most industrially developed part of China as well as outer Mongolia, Sakhalin, Kuriles, Port Arthur, and North Korea. He did this, although a few weeks earlier at Cairo, Roosevelt had solemnly promised Chiang Kai-shek that Manchuria would be returned to China. During the Soviet occupation of Manchuria industrial equipment of an estimated value of two billions was looted and carried off to Russia. Ironically Russia did not get into the war with Japan until 2 days after our bombing of Hiroshima and her contribution to victory was negligible. But she was on hand in Asia to take over the guns and ammunition of Japanese forces there. These she passed out to Chinese Reds like Mao, trained in Moscow, and with this equipment plus the diversion of military supplies from American to the Red armies due to the efforts of the Red clique in our State Department the Chinese Reds under Mao beat Chiang and drove him to Formosa.

The handing over of Poland to Russia was particularly odious since England had gone to war with Germany over the latter's seizure of Polish territory.

Russia was even befriended by Roosevelt when our armies advanced on Berlin. We could have easily gotten to Berlin first. But our troops were first halted at the Elbe. They were then withdrawn from that river in wide circle—far enough westward to make Stalin a present of the great Zeiss optical and precision instrument works at Jena, the most important V–1 and V–2 rocket laboratory and production plant in Nord-hausen, and the vital underground jet plant in Kahla. Everywhere we surrendered to the Soviets intact thousands of German planes, including great masses of jet fighters ready for assembly, as well as research centers, rocket developments, scientific personnel, and other military treasures.

When it was all over, a large part of the formidable Russian militarism of today was clearly marked "Made in America" or "donated by America from Germany." But where Roosevelt left off President Truman resumed.

At Potsdam, Truman maintaining intact Roosevelt's iron curtain of secret diplomacy played fast and loose with American honor and security. He agreed to an enlargement of the boundaries of a Poland already delivered by Roosevelt and Churchill to Russian control through addition of areas that had for centuries been occupied by Germans or people of German origin. Some 14,000,000 persons were brutally expelled from their homes with the confiscation of virtually all their property. Only 10,000,000 finally reached the American, French, and British zones of Germany. Four million mysteriously disappeared though the finger points toward Russian atrocities. Thus Truman approved one of the greatest mass deportations in history which for sheer cruelty is a dark page in the annals of history.

At Potsdam, Truman also sanctioned Russian acquisition of Eastern Germany, the food bin of that nation before the war. It then became impossible for the remaining German economy in British, French, and American hands to feed its people. Germany, like Japan, also went on our bounty rolls.

Like Roosevelt, Truman did not neglect to build up Russian military strength when his opportunity came at Potsdam. He provided her with more factories, machines, and military equipment though at the time he attended Potsdam Truman knew that through lend-lease we had already dangerously expanded Russia's military might and that, in addition, we had given the Soviets some 15,000 planes—many of them of our latest type—and 7,000 tanks.

But at Potsdam Truman gave to Russia the entire zone embracing the Elbe and Oder Rivers, excepting Hamburg which lies within the British zone. Naval experts had known from the early days of World War II that it was along these rivers and their tributaries that the Germans had set up their submarine production line. The menace which the Nazi underwater fleet constituted during World War II is still remembered by residents along the Atlantic coast who saw oil tankers, merchant ships, and even a troop transport sunk within sight of our shores. Convoy losses during the early years of the war were tremendous. And special defensive methods had to be devised by our Navy to get our supplies across the Atlantic.

But in spite of this, the President agreed at Potsdam to deliver to Russia the parts which lay in satellite plants sufficient for her to fabricate hundreds of submarines. In addition to this, he agreed to give to Russia 10 of the latest snorkel-type long-range German submarines for experimental purposes.

That is not all. The Potsdam agreement delivered to Russia the city of Koenigsburg and the adjacent area on the Baltic Sea—thus we provided the Soviets with an all-weather, year-round seaport from which her newly received submarine fleet might operate.

But Truman's generosity to Russia went even further than this. In addition to the reparations already given to Russia in the eastern zone of Germany, including the uranium mines, article 4 of section 3 of the agreement permitted Russia to take "15 percent of such usable and complete industrial capital equipment" out of the western zone in exchange for raw materials.

Then the President went one step further. Section B of the article 4 reads:

> Ten percent of such industrial capital equipment as is unnecessary for the German peace economy and should be removed from the western zones, to be transferred to the Soviet Government on reparations account without payment or exchange of any kind in return.

A time limit of 2 years was set upon this transfer. But even if this section of the agreement had been questioned, the full text was not released by the State Department until 19 months later.

Perhaps it is sufficient to note that conservative estimates place the Russian submarine fleet at more than 300 today. The chances are that it is closer to 500. It was at Potsdam that Truman provided Russia with the materials and facilities sufficient for her to become a first-class underseas naval power.

It was also at Potsdam that the President and his advisers stupidly accepted a zone of control in the city of Berlin without providing any access to it. You all remember well how when the Russians chose to close the roads and railroads to us, we embarked upon a costly airlift in order to supply our zone in Berlin.

This colossal diplomatic blunder cost the American people $265,943,000—more than a quarter of a billion dollars.

The iron curtain of secret diplomacy which Roosevelt erected and which Truman after the war has continued to use is ably commented upon by Dr. Charles Beard, the great American historian, in his book, Roosevelt and the Coming of the War:

> If the precedents set by President Roosevelt in conducting foreign affairs as reported in the records of the congressional committee on Pearl Harbor and other documents are to stand unimpeached and to be accepted henceforth as valid in law and morals then—
> The President of the United States in a campaign for reelection may publicly promise the people to keep the country out of war, and after victory at the polls may set out secretly on a course designed practically certain to bring war upon the country.
> He may secure legislation in furtherance of his secret designs, misrepresent to Congress and the people its purport and the policy he intends to pursue if and when such legislation is enacted.
> He may after securing such legislation publicly announce that he will pursue, as previously proposed, a policy contrary to war and yet at the same time secretly prepare plans for waging an undeclared shooting war that are in flat contradiction to his public professions.
> He may hold secret conferences with the premier of a foreign government and publicly declare that no new commitments have been made when, in fact, he had committed the United States to occupy, by the use of American armed forces, the territory of a third country and joining the premier in parallel threats to another government.
> He may make secret agreements with a foreign power more fateful in consequences to the United States than any alliance ever incorporated in a treaty to be submitted to the Senate for approval.
> He may publicly represent to the Congress and the people that acts of war have been committed against the United States when in reality said acts were secretly invited and even initiated by the Armed Forces of the United States under his secret direction.
> He may after publicly announcing one foreign policy secretly pursue the opposite and so conduct foreign and military affairs as to maneuver a designated foreign power into firing the first shot in an attack upon the United States and thus avoid the necessity of calling upon Congress in advance to exercise its constitutional power to deliberate upon a declaration of war.
> He may as a crowning act in arrogation of authority to himself without the consent of the Senate make a commitment to the head of a foreign government which binds the United States to police the world at least for a given time—that in the eyes of other governments and people to be policed is to dominate the world; and the American people are thereby in honor bound to provide the military, naval, and economic forces necessary to pursue, with no assurance of success, this exacting business.

As in World War I, the bogy of German world conquest was revived. The numerous deceptions and public immorality of Mr. Roosevelt's foreign policy are now defended by his apologists on the ground that he had to "deceive the people into war" so as to crush Hitler before the Nazi blitzkrieg engulfed us. One recalls Mr. Roosevelt's fearsome reference to Hitler's timetable to invade Iowa, the official talk about the ease of invading the United States via Dakar and Brazil, though a movement of troops and supplies over this route would have compelled the Nazis to traverse about three times the distance from Berlin to New York City, and about the frequent discovery of secret Nazi plans for the invasion of the United States, despite the fact that the Nazis were not able to cross the less than 20 miles of the Dover Strait, when Britain was virtually helpless.

Even if Germany had had plans for world conquest that would not excuse a President of the United States from deceiving the people and manipulating them into a war behind an iron curtain of secret diplomacy. But the evidence is convincing that the Nazis had no plans for world conquest—that Hitler did not have even the most remote notion of invading the United States at any predictable period.

Gen. George C. Marshall, in his official report as Chief of Staff at the end of the war clearly stated that the Nazis had no actual plan of world domination. Marshall confirmed this in his deposition for use in the Tokyo trials. Wars in Europe have always been fought over issues that related solely to the interests of Europe, except in the case of Russia today which does have the intention to subdue the world. But, if when Germany and Russia went to war we had forced them to fight it out there would be no crisis today. These two totalitarian powers would have bled each other white. Even President Truman when a Senator saw this—and urged that we play one off against the other until both were prostrate. Instead Roosevelt elected under cover of secret diplomacy to fight Germany and coddle Stalin—and for that secrecy we are now facing a third world war.

The record is clear that under two Democratic administrations the people were tricked or deceived into wars which from the standpoint of our own interests were fruitless in results and devastating in their sacrifice of our sons and our resources. Under Roosevelt and Truman the Presidency has been fashioned into a ruthless weapon for forcing the people into war and for pledging their resources to foreign governments without consent of the Congress. We are now under a dictatorship in foreign affairs and on the brink of another global struggle. We have been pursuing a fatal policy of "perpetual war for perpetual peace."

Fortunately, today the American people are aroused as never before. They are far ahead of their leaders. They realize at last, that the very leaders who took us into World War II have created a Frankenstein in Russia with which they are totally unable to cope. They ask, how can we depend on these same leaders who have, through blundering, failed to win the peace after the last war, to make a lasting peace now, either with, or without, world war III?

The American people today are belligerent. They are protesting the leadership which blundered us into a war in Korea. They are protesting the leadership which is sure to blunder us into another global war and finally into socialism. They already see that our casualty list, which approaches 60,000, is a needless sacrifice of American lives and with no hope for a decisive military victory. The President on his own motion does not have the constitutional power to send abroad troops in force which could lead to war.

Growing out of their experience with the autocratic European kings, our founding fathers established two fundamental principles in the Constitution: First, individual liberty; second, the right of the people through their elected representatives in the Congress to provide for their own national defense and to declare war. This right of the people and this responsibility of the Congress were never challenged until President Truman sent large forces of our boys into Korea.

They are convinced the administration's spending program will disrupt our economy and carry us over the precipice to disaster. We must provide our people with a military program which will be, first, within the limits of sound economy; second, the most effective war deterrent available; third, enable us to win should war come.

The most ardent supporters of the army for Europe have never maintained it could win a war. At best, this—so far mythical—army is to be an alleged war deterrent. Claim is made that it could delay a Red invasion and absorb the surplus ammunition of the Red army.

What Stalin fears is the atomic bomb and the long-range bombers which can deliver it from bases outside of Europe. He knows what our bombing did to Japan and Germany, and he wants to save Russia from similar destruction. Consequently, we should have an allied air force which can dominate the sky over Russia and act as a shield over all Europe, preventing Stalin from striking with his Red army.

As Winston Churchill said:

> We are still under the shield of the atomic bomb, possessed in formidable quantities by the United States alone. The use of this weapon would shake the foundations of the Soviet regime throughout the vast areas of Russia * * * and constitute an effective deterrent upon Soviet aggression.

Our planners for European aid have strangely avoided mention of enemy air power in this program of ground defense.

How do they intend to gain a final decision over Russia and her satellites? The hearings on the Wherry resolution brought out the fact that all military leaders concede Russia can be destroyed only by air power. Yet our principal expenditure for the Air Force is for combat planes to protect the ground forces in Europe.

We must provide a military program which places the principal reliance in air power supported by an adequate Army and Navy. The main expenditure for the Air Force should be for strategic bombers which can strike anywhere in Russia from bases outside Europe which we know we can hold. The American people are behind such a program. They are unwilling to sacrifice their youth, who would be hopelessly outnumbered, in bayonet fighting against the enslaved millions under Stalin. Republicans must block this ruinous policy of the Truman administration. Time is growing short. The absolute deadline is November 1952. Only a Republican victory can save us.

Beware of false propaganda. Let us not be misled.

Postal Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. RHODES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1951

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a letter sent by the Reader's Digest urging its representatives to write members of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee with respect to legislation increasing postal rates, together with a reply to such letter by one of its representatives:

THE READER'S DIGEST,
Pleasantville, N. Y., March 7, 1951.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: On March 13, 1951, the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service will begin hearings on a bill (H. R. 2982) to increase postal rates on magazines.

On behalf of the whole magazine publishing industry, we are bringing this matter to your attention, because it may affect your well-being as a publisher's representative.

The object of H. R. 2982 is to increase postal rates on magazines 100 percent (50 percent this year, 25 percent next year, and another 25 percent the next year).

If such a postal increase should come about, it could directly and seriously affect your income because:

(1) Some publishers might be forced out of business.

(2) Others might be forced to—

(a) Increase subscription prices, and/or

(b) Increase emphasis on newsstand sales.

All of these things might affect the number of subscriptions you would sell in the future, and thus affect your income.

This letter is sent to you so that you may know what is going on, so that you may take whatever action you feel you should.

In the past we have encouraged you to sell all publications, because by so doing you could give more and better service to your community, and earn more money for yourself. We are sending you this letter in the same spirit.

If you feel that an increase in magazine subscription prices caused by increased postal rates would affect your income adversely (and you have first-hand knowledge of how resistant the public now is to increases in prices), you may wish to write to the Congressman who can be most influential on this subject. They are the members of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Their names are given on the next page. The address for each is: House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

HOUSE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

Democrats: TOM MURRAY, of Tennessee, chairman; JAMES H. MORRISON, of Louisiana; GEORGE P. MILLER, of California; JAMES C. DAVIS, of Georgia; JOHN ALBERT WHITAKER, of Kentucky; GEORGE M. RHODES, of Pennsylvania; FRANK M. KARSTEN, of Missouri; M. G. (BURNIE) BURNSIDE, of West Virginia; JOHN LESINSKI, JR., of Michigan; JOHN JARMAN, of Oklahoma; VICTOR L. ANFUSO, of New York; BILL LANTAFF, of Florida; FRAZIER REAMS of Ohio.

Republicans: EDWARD H. REES, of Kansas; HAROLD C. HAGEN, of Minnesota; ROBERT J. CORBETT, of Pennsylvania; KATHARINE ST. GEORGE, of New York; ANTONI N. SADLAK, of Connecticut; USHER L. BURDICK, of North Dakota; GARDNER R. WITHROW, of Wisconsin; H. R. GROSS, of Iowa; JAMES S. GOLDEN, of Kentucky; WILLIAM R. WILLIAMS, of New York; O. K. ARMSTRONG, of Missouri.

If you intend to write members of the committee, you should do so today, or within the next few days. Hearings are scheduled to begin on March 13 and will continue for several days.

And if you do want to write, don't feel that your letter may be inconsequential. Last year, when this same subject came up before the Senate committee, it was in large measure letters from representatives like yourself that convinced the committee that postal rates on magazines should not then be increased. This is definitely a place where your letter can have an important effect on the final decision.

Cordially,

ALLAN SCOTT.

MARCH 9, 1951.

Hon. GEORGE M. RHODES,
House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RHODES: On March 9, 1951, my wife received a letter from Allan Scott, director community representatives of the Reader's Digest, informing her that on March 13, 1951, the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service will begin hearings on a bill (H. R. 2982) to increase postal rates on magazines. He stated that the object of the bill is to increase postal rates on magazines 100 percent (50 percent this year, 25 percent next year, and another 25 percent the following year). He suggested that should this increase come about it would directly and seriously affect your income. He also stated that some publishers might be forced out of business, and that my wife should write to the Congressman now who can be most influential on this subject, even enclosing a list of such men.

Mr. Scott neglected to inform her of the present postal rate for magazines (or even his magazine). He also neglected to call her attention to the fact that the Post Office Department is operating at a deficit, and that no kind of business can operate at a deficit for very long, even the Reader's Digest. Fortunately, for all of us, the Post Office Department is a governmental agency and we all benefit by the low cost of mail handling, even if we do make up the deficit out of taxpayer's contributions. However, neither my wife nor I feel that the Government should subsidize the Reader's Digest or any other publication, directly or indirectly, as we feel it would if it took the burden of meeting the cost of operation away from those who use the mails and place it in bulk upon the taxpayer. If we were to suggest, as Mr. Scott would have us, that the Reader's Digest and all other publications should be mailed by the millions annually at a ridiculously low unit mailing cost to the mailer, and that any deficit in the cost of operating the post office should not be placed on the user but on the general public, we would certainly be selfish, unrealistic, and definitely not a fit citizen or businessman.

Out of curiosity, I called our local branch of the post office and learned that the Reader's Digest paid not less than 1 cent per copy for mailing its magazine in the United States. This is possible because of bulk mailing. To raise the cost 100 percent would be to require 2 cents postage per magazine. I can't see any reason why neither the Reader's Digest nor any other publication should not pay the increase when mailing is a service they require and should pay for.

Both my wife and I were surprised at the inferences contained in Mr. Scott's letter. He implied the proposed postal increase would be prohibitive and would force some publishers out of business. To say that he is not being realistic is to say that the Reader's Digest needs Government funds to continue operating successfully.

My wife and I feel that there are enough lobbyists in Washington bidding for their selfish interests and we do not want to come to the aid of anyone who is selfish. We feel that under the circumstances we should support your committee on seeking an increase of postal rates on magazines.

I am enclosing Mr. Scott's letter for your perusal.

Very truly yours,

A Footnote for Historians on the Strange Case of Alger Hiss

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement prepared by me entitled "A Footnote for Historians on the Strange Case of Alger Hiss," together with an article entitled "Links to Field Cited," written by Drew Pearson, and cabled by him from Frankfurt, Germany, on March 17.

There being no objection, the statement and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FOOTNOTE FOR HISTORIANS ON THE STRANGE CASE OF ALGER HISS

Mr. President, now that the Supreme Court of the United States has denied the appeal of Alger Hiss and it appears that before this week is over the doors of a Federal penitentiary will have clanged shut on Hiss, it is appropriate that there be placed in the permanent files of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any additional evidence that comes to light on the activities and associations of this badly misguided former high official of our Department of State.

As chairman of the House subcommittee that handled the investigation which led to the indictment and conviction of Alger Hiss, following our disclosure of the pumpkin papers on the farm of Whittaker Chambers, I have from time to time inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD data which I have felt historians will want to consult as they attempt to chronicle and interpret the trends of our times and the tortuous twistings of American foreign policy since the concluding days of World War II.

Clearly any attempt to record or understand our bizarre contradictions in foreign policy since the last war must take any serious-minded historian to an examination of the part played in them by Alger Hiss not only as a top-ranking policy functionary of the State Department but as a confidential participant in the Yalta Conference, in the San Francisco Conference where the basic format of United Nations procedures was prepared, and in the Bretton Woods Conference. Even more important to historians would be an analysis and report of the very significant activities of Alger Hiss at the unheralded Malta Conference, a preparatory conference for Yalta, at which Alger Hiss and a few associates conferred for many days and made significant advance determinations and studies to be taken by them to Yalta for the guidance and direction of those who represented the United States at the Yalta Conference.

In a lengthy address on the Senate floor on January 25, 1950, I discussed some of these activities under the heading, "What the Hiss trial actually means." Since then additional evidence is continuing to come to light. For example, in his release for Saturday, March 17, 1951, Drew Pearson cabled from Frankfort, Germany, a report conveying some significant information on the relationships of Alger Hiss, Laurence Duggan, and Harry Dexter White—all of whom worked contemporaneously as a clique of trusted Government employees. Drew Pearson also relates the manner in which Noel Field participated in these activities and the mysterious manner in which Field, his brother, and some of his relatives have vanished from the face of the earth. He labels this vanishing act as the No. 1 American mystery of Europe. In this dispatch Drew Pearson to be sure contradicts an earlier report on Duggan which he released on December 27, 1948, but to Pearson's credit let it be said that he is now reporting from Europe the chain of evidence that he has subsequently discovered.

No history of our times which deals with American foreign policy, the Korean War, the public personalities of the Roosevelt-Truman era, or the manner in which communism has become an insidious threat to our way of life both at home and abroad would be either accurate, authentic, or complete without an attempt to interpret and analyze the determining parts played in it by Hiss, Duggan, White, Field, Wadleigh, Marzani, Chambers, Bentley, Remington, and others in and out of Government, and in and out of prison, whose strange attachment for the Soviet cause at one time or another induced them to serve its interests rather than those of the land of their birth.

To help complete the record for the archives of history, Mr. President, I therefore place at the conclusion of these remarks the very significant dispatch which Drew Pearson cabled from Frankfort, Germany, and which appears as his syndicated column for the papers published on March 17, 1951.

THE WASHINGTON MERRY-GO-ROUND

(By Drew Pearson)

LINKS TO FIELD MYSTERY CITED

FRANKFORT.—The No. 1 American mystery of Europe continues to be the sudden and unsolved disappearance of four Americans in the Noel Field case after Field was named by Whittaker Chambers as a member of the Communist cell in the United States State Department. This case is now being linked for the first time with another unsolved mystery in the United States—the strange death of Laurence Duggan, found in a snowbank 16 floors below his New York office. Duggan also was named in the State Department investigation, though cleared by the Justice Department.

The amazing thing is that a total of seven people have now died mysteriously or disappeared even more mysteriously following revelations in the Alger Hiss case.

The four people who have disappeared behind the iron curtain with or in the wake of Noel Field are: Field himself, who disappeared in Czechoslovakia May 10, 1949. His brother Herman vanished August 22 that same year while traveling in an airplane between Warsaw and Prague. A few days later Mrs. Noel Field disappeared while trying to find her husband in Prague. Then, 1 year later, Erica Wallachs, a friend of the Fields, went into the Russian zone of Berlin in search of them and never came back. All these disappearances occurred during about the same period of three mysterious deaths in the Hiss case. They were:

Death No. 1: Harry Dexter White, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury who reportedly died of heart failure August 16, 1948, after testifying before the congressional committee at which Elizabeth Bentley had charged White with being a member of the elite Communist group inside the Government. White's death was not announced until 1 day afterward and he was buried hastily. Later it was reported the real cause of his death was an overdose of digitalis, not heart failure.

Death No. 2: Walter Marvin Smith, Justice Department attorney found at the base of the Justice Department staircase where he had fallen or jumped October 20, 1948, shortly after the House Un-American Activities Committee had questioned him on his notarization of the transfer of title of a Ford automobile from Hiss to William Rosen, described in the congressional testimony as a Communist organizer. Hiss, according to Whittaker Chambers, insisted on turning over his car to the Communist organizer. Smith was the only actual witness to the transfer.

Death No. 3, and the most mysterious of all, was that of Laurence Duggan, the former State Department official who, "while putting on his overshoes to go home," fell through a New York skyscraper window. Duggan had been questioned a few days earlier regarding Communist spies in the State Department. Insurance investigators believed it unlikely that a man would commit suicide while putting on his overshoes and paid his widow nonsuicide death benefits.

DUGGAN-FIELD LINK

It now develops there was a personal link between Duggan and Field which may supply one small clue to this international mystery. Duggan and Field not only served in the State Department at the same time but, for one period, they shared the same house together off Judiciary Square in Washington. Duggan informed his superiors during the war that he had once attended Communist meetings in Alexandria, Va., during his early days in the State Department, but he had never joined the party and became unsympathetic with their ideas.

Field, meanwhile, had left the State Department in 1936 and joined the League of Nations secretariat. During the war he served as European director of the Unitarian Service Committee, which took him to Poland and Czechoslovakia, where he established medical centers and children's homes. He had thus become well acquainted with these two countries and, after the war, remained abroad to write a book on Poland and Czechoslovakia.

DISAPPEARANCE UNPLANNED

On May 5, 1949, Field went from Switzerland to Prague and on May 12 he failed to keep an afternoon appointment. He has not been heard of since. Apparently he did not plan to disappear because his room showed no signs of departure. He did not notify the friend with whom he had the appointment nor his wife, Herta, who planned to join him in a few weeks.

Five months later, however, when the Communists tried Hungarian Foreign Minister Laszlo Rajk, the Hungarian press reported that Rajk testified that Field had persuaded him to become "a servant of American imperialism." Later, in the fall of 1950, six East German Communists were charged with dealing with "the American spy, Noel Field."

More recently Czech refugees have reported that Field would testify in the trial of former Czech Foreign Minister Vladimir Clementis, though there has been nothing to substantiate this.

Meanwhile, Field's brother, Herman, in August 1949, decided to go to Prague to find his missing brother. He boarded a plane in Warsaw on August 22. Friends accompanied him to the airport and the American Embassy checking the plane's manifest later, found his name was on it. However, when the plane arrived at Prague, Herman Field was not on it. He has never been heard of since, either, except in one respect.

On February 25, 1950, Vilem Novy, editor of the Czech Communist newspaper, Rude Pravo, was denounced by a member of the Central Communist Commitee for having betrayed state secrets to a western espionage agent when Novy was a refugee in Krakow in 1939. Herman Field, who was then doing refugee work among Czech refugees in Krakow, knew Novy, and was apparently that alleged agent.

THEORIES ON UNSOLVED MYSTERY

Meanwhile, Mrs. Noel Field left Switzerland on August 3 to seek her husband in Prague, but she, too, disappeared from sight on August 17. A year later, with the Fields' whereabouts still unsolved, their friend, Erica Wallachs, wife of a Washington attorney, persuaded her husband to let her go to Switzerland to locate them. Mrs. Wallachs went to Berlin alone, reportedly was met by Leo Bauer, editor of the Soviet-controlled Berlin radio whom she knew. She has never been heard of since.

Several theories are given for these disappearances. One is that Field had been working with the Communists and, when the congressional investigations got too hot, he wanted to be taken into protective Communist custody. Another theory is that the Fields had worked with the Communists in their early days, knew their vital secrets, and became too dangerous for them to have on the loose. Another is that they wanted Noel Field as a witness against key figures, such as Hungarian Foreign Minister Rajk. Field not only worked with refugees during and after the war but also with the OSS in Czechoslovakia and Hungary in an effort to unseat Hitler's puppet governments.

Meanwhile, until Field and his family are heard from direct, his whereabouts remain the No. 1 unsolved mystery of Europe.

The National Fiscal Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on the 20th day of February 1951, the New Jersey Republican State Committee adopted a resolution covering certain aspects of the present national fiscal situation and commenting on the recent budget proposal of the President of the United States.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Gov. Alfred E. Driscoll has submitted to the New Jersey Legislature a budget for the 1951–52 fiscal year which, in its demand for spartan economy at all levels of government, set a pattern for the drastic curtailment of all but the most necessary expenditures; and

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress a budget proposal by the President of the United States for the same period which constitutes an invitation to fiscal disaster for our country and which, unlike our own State budget, utterly fails to recognize the needs of the times: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the New Jersey Republican State Committee does hereby commend the Governor of New Jersey for his practical and realistic approach to the budgetary problems of our State and at the same time condemns the budget proposal of the President of the United States for the following reasons:

1. While purporting to call for expenditures of $71,500,000,000, it actually asks authorization to spend nearly $100,000,000,000.

2. Of this vast amount, the President has seen fit to itemize expenditures totaling only slightly more than $20,000,000,000 and has in effect, asked Congress for a blank check for the remainder.

3. In complete disregard of congressional responsibility, he has refused to state how many billions of dollars will be spent for defense. This committee, while fully aware of the need for high expenditures for the defense of our Nation, nevertheless believes it to be the duty of the President to confide in our elected representatives to the extent that they can make an honest examination of all proposals for defense expenditures before they are called upon to vote vast new taxes on the American people.

4. The President has claimed savings of $5,000,000,000 below last year in nondefense items. Many of these savings are not real. For example, examination shows one of these savings to be the amount expended last year for the 1950 census (a nonrecurring item). He also claims as a saving the more than $500,000,000 which the Congress forced the President to cut from the 1950–51 budget before its adoption. In other words, he is claiming savings below a nonexisting budget.

5. There are but 2 of 130 items submitted by the President in which he has claimed to have effected savings. Examination shows most of them to be based upon transfers which, in many cases, turn out to be increases and not savings.

6. Despite widespread demands for rigid economy in nondefense spending, the President, often under the guise of defense preparation, has continued to foist his Fair Deal, socialistic program on the American people. For example, he has asked:

(a) Three hundred million dollars to equalize education opportunities among the States (as a defense measure, on the grounds that the Armed Forces do not have time to teach draftees how to read and write); plus $106,000,000 for Federal aid to education in certain areas.

(b) A two-hundred-and-seventy-five-million-dollar payroll tax to set up the machinery for socialized medicine.

(c) Direct payments to producers of perishable farm products in lieu of price supports (the Brannan plan).

(d) Seven new waterways projects costing $1,500,000,000, as follows: Hell's Canyon, The Dalles, and Ice Harbor projects in the Columbia Basin; Old Hickory on the Cumberland; a steam plant for TVA; Gavins Point on the Missouri; and $20,000,000 to start the St. Lawrence seaway.

7. Although the President states that his budget totals $71,500,000,000, he has, in fact, asked for contract authorizations and appropriations of $94,500,000,000, plus an additional $4,000,000,000 to pay old bills. Inasmuch as the books of the United States Government are carried on a cash basis, the President's budget should state that he seeks a total of $98,500,000,000—or $27,000,000,000 more than he has admitted; and be it further

Resolved, That the Republican State committee calls on the Republican Members of the Senate and House from New Jersey to continue their efforts to compel the Federal Government to give the American people an honest accounting of their money, and to examine carefully all proposed expenditures, both defense and otherwise, to the end that this Nation may be saved from the fiscal disaster which will surely follow if the Federal Government is permitted to engage in the confused and illogical practices exemplified by the President's budget proposal; and be it further

Resolved, That our Representatives shall bring this resolution to the attention of the Congress in the hope that the Congress shall see fit to follow the pattern established by the Governor of New Jersey in setting an example for prudent management which present circumstances demand at all levels of Government.

The Need for More Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Flu Epidemic Pointed Up Need for More Doctors To Answer House Calls," which appeared in the Buffalo Evening News of March 7, 1951.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FLU EPIDEMIC POINTED UP NEED FOR MORE DOCTORS TO ANSWER HOUSE CALLS

The recent epidemic of influenza, now waning, directed attention to the difficulty of obtaining the services of a physician in any circumstances short of an emergency.

When it comes to turning down telephone calls for assistance there is little to choose between specialists and general practitioners.

In both categories there are physicians who are at the beck and call of the sick and ailing, who work long hours without proper rest to relieve suffering, and who sometimes pay in broken health and shortened lives the price of unstinting service.

But it is also true that in both categories there are physicians whose service is determined by monetary standards, whose desire for personal ease and comfort takes precedence over consideration for those who are ill, and who are more interested in fighting socialized medicine than in healing the sick.

EMERGENCY LIST POSTED

Emergency care is easier to obtain than the normal medical care required in less dangerous cases of illness. The Medical Society of Erie County has established an emergency referral list of doctors who will accept calls day or night. This list is posted in all police and fire stations and in all hospitals.

Physicians and attorneys alike agree that medical jurisprudence has established that a physician who has treated, or has promised to treat, a person who is ill has thereafter an obligation to fulfill his promise or to complete the treatment, as the case may be. Even the telephoned promise to come and see the patient is regarded in legal circles as an oral contract between physician and patient.

However, where no such promise has been made, either orally or de facto by the beginning of treatment, the decision on an appeal for medical assistance is an obligation which rests upon the physician in recognition of his responsibility to society, which permits him to practice medicine. The importance attached to this obligation by the physician will be determined almost entirely by his regard for his responsibilities.

ETHICS CLOSELY WATCHED

The medical society has a board of censors, which keeps watch over the ethics of the society's members, but even physicians admit that there are too many loopholes which permit avoidance of censorship.

A Buffalo physician recently told a friend about the death of one of his patients. He told how the patient had called him at 6 o'clock in the morning and had said that he did not feel well. The physician gave him certain instructions, but the patient telephoned again a short time later and said that he felt no better.

"All right," said the physician, "I'll be over about 8 or 9 o'clock."

"When I got there, he was dead," the doctor said, in recounting his experience.

"Why didn't you go when he called?" his friend asked.

"Because I just don't like night calls," was the reply. "I've got used to sleeping in the early morning."

CALL A DOCTOR

Such a case, an expert in medical jurisprudence explained, constitutes a breach of contract, in that the physician did not take all reasonable steps to insure his patient's recovery or, in this particular case, to prevent his death.

Consider the case of the young mother who telephoned a west side physician during the flu epidemic. The young woman, employed in one of the Buffalo hospitals, told the physician that she had a temperature above 103 and explained what treatment she had been taking.

"It is apparent that you need a doctor," the physician said.

"That's why I called you," she told him, and received this reply:

"I do not take patients during the week end and I am just finishing up my paper work for this week. Then I will have finished. I suggest that you call a doctor in your own neighborhood."

SOME REFUSE HOUSE CALLS

In this case, the experts explain, the doctor was entirely within his rights in refusing the case. The problem arises from the fact that too many doctors are refusing too many cases—at least that's the explanation given by some leading physicians.

Specialists have refused for many years to accept "general" cases. Now, however, many specialists are refusing to make house calls under any circumstances.

"They have many more calls than they want," a well-known physician explained, "and they can handle half a dozen office cases in the time required to make a house call."

Even the family which stints itself to provides the best possible medical care for the new baby may find itself in a desperate situation within a few months after the infant's birth. The pediatrist, or baby specialist, may be one of those who refuse house calls.

CHINESE HAD A SYSTEM

Not having established contact with a general practitioner, or family doctor, the frantic mother and father may be compelled to consult the emergency referral list, though they have already spent many dollars on specialist care for their child.

Some persons who have experienced difficulty in obtaining the ministrations of a physician are beginning to wonder if the Chinese system of medical insurance may not have something to recommend it.

Back in the days before China was liberated by the Communist hordes, a Chinese paid his physician only while his health was satisfactory. If he became ill, payments ceased. Thus, it behooved a shrewd physician to keep his patients in good health.

At worst, under such a system, there would be no truth in the assertion of a leading attorney that "only two classes get the best medical attention today—the very rich and the very poor—the former by paying high for it, the latter through the welfare department."

Federal Aid for Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able article by Sydney J. Harris entitled "What Price Education as Defense?" which appeared in the Chicago Daily News of Tuesday, March 13, 1951. This article, in a few brief paragraphs, points out the significance of the legislation now pending in the Senate to provide Federal aid to the States for education.

I also ask that there be printed in the RECORD following the article just mentioned, a very able column written by Ysabel and Robert Rennie, dealing in some detail with the necessity of this program in the interests of national defense and the welfare of our country.

There being no objection the article and column were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Daily News of March 13, 1951]

WHAT PRICE EDUCATION AS DEFENSE?

(By Sydney J. Harris)

For the third time, Senator MURRAY of Montana has introduced a bill to set up a program for $300,000,000 a year in Federal aid to the States for education.

Twice before the Senate has passed this legislation, and twice before it has died in the House—the same House which has rapidly passed appropriations for many billions for armaments.

Yet, what we need more than anything else in America is basic education. If people don't know what to live for, they can't know what to die for. This is why—as the marine wrote to Secretary Acheson—morale is so low among our young people today.

Three hundred million dollars is an insignificant sum compared with the overwhelming cost of our defense program. But communism cannot be fought with weapons; it is an idea, and to be defeated only by another, and stronger, idea.

Education is the most neglected aspect in our society. The States and cities cannot carry the whole burden, especially in the poorer regions, where help is most needed. Teachers are scandalously underpaid, and students are shamefully undertaught.

DEMOCRACY NOT SIMPLE

The idea of democracy is not a simple one, despite the after-dinner orators. Belief in democracy must follow a knowledge of what such words as "liberty" and "justice" and "security" really mean.

A true and full education examines the meaning of these words. It tries to discover what man is, and what society ought to be like. It attempts to discover the best means of accomplishing the end, which is human happiness.

Our young people leave school today without any such firm idea. They are confused and cynical; the war is a painful riddle they do not comprehend; their loyalty is pierced by doubt and despair.

In war, the great danger is always that you may become the thing you are fighting; that the enemy will conquer you in spirit. Only in knowledge resides the strength to resist this spiritual corrosion. Only through education can we find the reason for living and the motive for dying.

[From the Washington Post, March 18, 1951]

OUR POLITICAL ECONOMY—TEACHERS HARD HIT BY INFLATION

(By Ysabel and Robert Rennie)

Now that we have climbed back aboard the escalator of inflation, certain groups are bound to be hurt. Conspicuous among these are the Nation's schoolteachers, whose incomes are slow to respond to a change in prices.

Numerically—and hence politically—they are not a strong group. They number about a million, or 1.6 percent of our labor force; but in the coming decade they may well be among the most important workers in our economy. By 1955, it is estimated, there will be some 37,000,000 young Americans in the school-age group between 5 and 17. This will be 17 percent above 1950.

Because schoolteachers are not organized, they cannot compete with such potent pressure groups as auto workers or miners. Furthermore, in times of inflation they suffer from the fact that the sources of school revenues are rigid and inflexible.

Public school teachers depend for their salaries on the local property tax, a notably unresponsive form of revenue. Private school and college teachers depend, to a considerable extent, on endowment income, much of it in fixed-interest securities like bonds and mortgages.

The result is that there is a general exodus from the teaching field during inflation. Afterward, teaching salaries tend to catch up again; and in depression the real income of teachers rise very rapidly—when they get paid.

Let us look at the record. We have figures on teachers' salaries which go back to the beginning of the century.

From 1900 to 1949 the average salary of public school teachers rose from $311 to an estimated $2,750 a year. If adjustment is made for changes in the cost of living, real salaries (in 1935–39 dollars) rose from $591 in 1900 to $1,626 in 1949.

The increase, however, was less an upward march than a ride on the roller coaster. Statistics on the salaries of urban teachers show that between 1900 and 1920 real salaries declined by a fourth. Then in just 2 years, from 1920 to 1922, they recovered all the ground they had lost since the beginning of the century and began an upward climb which reached a high mark in 1940.

In terms of purchasing power, teachers' salaries showed a dramatic gain during the early years of the depression. As prices plummeted between 1930 and 1932, real salaries of urban teachers jumped from $1,583 to $1,872.

The trend was exactly reversed by the Second World War. From 1940 to 1944 real salaries for this group declined by nearly 10 percent.

All this tells something of how teachers have been faring in relation to their previous history. But how do they compare with other groups in the economy?

A half century ago the average schoolteacher earned less than half as much as the average factory worker and a third less than even the unskilled laborer of the period.

As late as 1920 he was still making less than half the factory wage. After that, however, he gained ground rapidly. All during the 1930's his average income was higher than that of the factory hand.

The wartime inflation represented a serious setback. Today the schoolteacher again lags well behind the wage earner in the race for a decent living. In June 1950, his disposable income was some 3 percent below that of the average factory hand, more than a sixth lower than the coal miner's or construction worker's and a full quarter below the average earnings in the automobile industry.

Considering the education and training which are expected of a teacher, these figures come as something of a shock. One offsetting factor is that most teachers are single women, with somewhat lighter-than-average family responsibilities. Another is that the school year runs for 9 months; many teachers add to their earnings in the summer

When this has been said, however, the fact remains that teaching is a low-paid profession, and that as living costs rise it is likely to drop even further behind.

The exodus from teaching jobs did not matter so much in the Second World War because school enrollment was actually declining. Today the full flood of war babies is all but overwhelming our school system. Can we continue to toss teachers the crumbs from our economic dinner table and still meet this crisis?

Ours is an increasingly complex civilization. Our teachers must know more than ever before if they are to train our children to cope with it. Yet how good can a profession be which offers fewer rewards than manual labor?

Assignment of Ground Forces To Duty in the European Area

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very interesting editorial entitled "Senate's Gobbledygook," which appeared this morning in the Washington Post.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE'S GOBBLEDYGOOK

The so-called great debate in the Senate has narrowed down to one immediate question—will the Senate say what it means? Unanimous action by the Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees had settled the momentous issue of sending four American divisions to Europe before the exchange of words began on the floor. Every opponent of this bipartisan policy now knows that he is wasting his breath. Aside from giving Senators a chance to get their views on record, the debate from this point on is likely to be useful only if it saves the resolution from becoming a monument to obfuscation.

The worst of the legislative gobbledygook is concentrated in section 6. On Friday Chairman CONNALLY of the Foreign Relations Committee refused to speculate on what it means. He referred questions on that point to Senator H. ALEXANDER SMITH, who wrote this notable specimen of double-talk at the behest of Senators GEORGE and BYRD. Mr. SMITH has promised the Senate an explanation today. But at best he can give only one man's opinion of the resolution's dictum that "congressional approval should be obtained of any policy requiring the assignment of American troops abroad * * * in implementation of article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty"—excepting the four divisions for the Eisenhower army, which the resolution itself approves. Unless the language itself is clarified, the resolution will rise to plague any reasonable administration of a policy that is vital to our national security.

Mr. SMITH has denied that a formal act of Congress would be required under his proviso to permit the dispatch of five divisions, if needed, instead of four. What, then, would Congress have to do? The Senator spoke of setting up a "moral check" on the President. Where does he find any senatorial power to fix moral standards for the President to obey? Senator WILEY realistically pointed out that in no circumstances can the Senate alter the President's constitutional power by passing a resolution. But at the same time he asked the Senate to accept the resolution as it is—thus creating a presumption in the minds of legislators and citizens that the Senate can prevent the President from using his constitutional power by passing a negative resolution and then refusing to pass a positive one.

Aside from its obscurity section 6 is vicious because it gives the impression of interfering with the powers of the Commander in Chief, whether or not that is its purpose. This appearance of unconstitutional meddling will remain so long as the resolution calls for "congressional approval" of further troop movements. What the Senate ought to ask of the President, in our opinion, is merely consultation with its leaders and appropriate committees if the dispatch of further troops abroad is contemplated under the treaty. This would give the Senate an opportunity to advise the President of its own wishes, and, if no meeting of minds could be obtained, the Senate could then initiate legislation making it impossible for the President to carry out his project successfully. Congress always has a ready weapon against such projects—the denial of appropriations.

Such consultation is provided for in section 3 of the resolution. Up to that point no cloud is cast upon the freedom of the Commander in Chief to move troops in accord which his own concept of our national security and our treaty obligations. It is of the utmost importance that this presidential power remain unfettered even by senatorial expressions of opinion. It is not a question of leaving vital decisions as to peace and security in the hands of one man, as Senator WILEY contends. With a pattern of consultations established, Congress would always be able to check unsound executive decisions while keeping within its own constitutional role. Congress would thus be in a position to control basic policy in case of disagreement with the President, but without crippling the Commander in Chief in making strategic decisions.

It is possible that the very ambiguity of section 6 would prevent it from becoming a grave hazard to our security in time of great emergency. But the Senate ought not to take any such chance. The best course would seem to be to eliminate section 6 and give more emphasis to the consultation requirement of section 3, if the Senate is not satisfied with the present language.

Military Manpower

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Moving Toward Strength," published in the New York Times of March 11, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOVING TOWARD STRENGTH

The Senate has taken an important forward step in its approval of the military manpower bill. It is significant that only five votes were cast in opposition on the final balloting. Our senior lawmakers are obviously convinced that we have no alternative but to make ourselves militarily strong, and they have acted accordingly.

This measure as it stands is not, in our judgment, by any means a perfect bill. The 24-month service period actually means about 3 months less than that when time for induction and travel and for authorized leave is deducted. This is short of the most effective period. The universal training features, likewise, remain somewhat indefinite and are placed in the future instead of being incorporated into the existing military program. The concept of universal service has, therefore, been weakened. It is our view that it should be accepted in both the military and civilian spheres as a national necessity.

With these limitations, however, the measure moves some considerable way in the right direction. It makes the required provision for a substantial manpower establishment. More than that, it puts the United States on the record before the world as being in deadly earnest about the defense of its liberties. The overwhelming vote by which it was adopted is a salutary indication that we mean business.

The necessity for this legislation is not of our own choosing. Few persons in this country, if any, like the idea of drafting 18-year-olds, or for that matter of drafting anyone at all. There is nothing pleasant about the idea of sustaining armed forces up to 4,000,000 men. There is no moral satisfaction in the conviction that every young man must undergo a period of training to enable him more skillfully to kill and more securely to avert some of the dangers of sudden and violent death if and when he is placed in the field.

Unhappily, however, we are not living in a world of our own good wishes and pleasant comforts. We have been placed in a situation in which our physical and spiritual survival is dependent upon our ability to make ourselves strong. We face an implacable adversary that knows no respect for honorable intentions unless they are backed up by unquestioned might. Under that condition we have no choice except to take the hard course upon which we have embarked.

We can take that course in honor and in confidence only if we are fully convinced of the permanent worth of the human cause that our liberties represent. We make ourselves physically strong so that we may endure for the sake of something more than physical values. Thus can our actions be justified. Only thus can the grim steps that we are taking, and must continue to take, be made conformable to our individual integrity and our national soul.

The Senate has done the right thing. The House must carry on with that program. But it is all of us, in the end, who must make that program worthy.

Restrictions on American Troop Movements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALLEN J. ELLENDER, SR.
OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial relating to proposed restrictions on American troop movements, published in the Times-Picayune, of New Orleans, on March 15, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEFENSE ON THE DOLE?

The fight in Congress to establish congressional restrictions on American troop movements confuses millions of Americans—including perhaps some Congressmen. Pictured by proponent as a step to restore some fundamental and arbitrary prerogative of the legislative branch, it may win sentimental support by folks who do not take the trouble to think the proposition through to the actual effect of putting our national defense on the dole, by way of speaking.

In a radio address last Sunday, former War Secretary Patterson reminded his hearers that "Congress never has undertaken to say where the military forces should be stationed. In the days of troubles along the Mexican border, Congress did not pass a law that only so many soldiers should be sent to the Rio Grande. In the First World War Congress did not set a ceiling on the number of troops to be sent to France. In the Second World War Congress did not take the responsibility of deciding what divisions should be assigned to Eisenhower, what divisions to MacArthur, what divisions to Mark Clark. Those decisions were left to the military leaders." And Mr. Patterson followed with this forthright statement:

"The setting of a limit by Congress on the number of troops to be furnished to Eisenhower's army would make it impossible for him to accomplish his mission."

When, and if, the showdown were forced by a Communist attack upon Western Europe, Congress presumably would take the Nation's overseas defense off the dole and vote its buildup to requisite strength. Public opinion at home would force that saving action, in all probability. But the time required for congressional debate and action to correct its error might be costly in lives and treasure both. And that would go double if the instinctive but wholly untrained, inexperienced, and uncommissioned admirals, generals, and other military geniuses in Senate and House insisted upon ordering their own defense plans written into the new legislation.

It is fervently to be hoped, for the national interest and safety, that Congress will refuse to "ration" our defense and make any transfer of needed forces subject to its approval or veto before orders can be issued to meet an urgent need or immediate threat. We don't believe the Congress majority really wants that arbitrary authority—or the awesome responsibilities that would go with it.

The Fulbright Exchange of Persons Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT
OF ARKANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I received recently from Prof. J. T. Salter, of the department of political science, University of Wisconsin, at Madison.

Professor Salter, who is one of the leading political scientists in the United States, has written me in detail of his experience in the Philippines as an exchange professor. His story demonstrates the value of the exchange of persons program.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN,
Madison, Wis., February 13, 1951.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FULBRIGHT: I am happy to write to you about my year in the Orient as a Fulbright professor at the University of the Philippines, for I consider it one of the best years I have lived.

I am strongly in favor of the Fulbright program, just as I am in favor of education, world communication, and travel.

This program is a two-faceted process for peace. It inevitably helps destroy ignorance, disease, and poverty. It does this in two ways. The professor that goes to a foreign land brings facts, ideas, opinions, viewpoints, guidance, and inspiration to the students and other people that attend his classes and public meetings. The professor's own mind is enriched by the questions, attitudes, and experiences he meets in the foreign land.

I learned this at the University of the Philippines and in a dozen or more other colleges and universities that I addressed while I was in the Philippines. Everywhere I found two things—that the Filipinos love the Americans and that they are ardent about getting an education. I think that the words America and United States have a glorious sound in Filipino ears because we brought the Filipinos education, democracy in education, and education in democracy.

The United States Army transport Thomas reached Manila in 1901. This ship carried more than 600 school teachers. They were scattered throughout the provinces and boarded in Filipino homes. According to Mr. Pastor Sison and other writers these early teachers made friends, because they brought a new and helpful meaning to the old Spanish concept of education, a concept that was narrowing and stifling, limiting education to the very few.

The American soldier, however, was there even before the Thomasite school teachers, and the soldier was a school teacher, too. He had come to fight the insurrectos and stayed to teach reading and writing and arithmetic. Commonwealth President Sergio Osmeña, in his loyalty-day speech in 1940, said that "the Filipinos will never forget the inspiring spectacle of American soldiers leaving their guns and as emissaries of peace and good will, with book in hand, repairing to public schools to teach the Filipino children the duties of free citizenship."

From that day until this, American school teachers have taught in the Philippines and Filipinos of both high and low degree are aware of it. The want is still great, however, and more teachers are needed, especially vocational, agricultural, health, taxation, administration, and dietary teachers. (I think that there is an urgent need for pertinent teachers in other countries in the Orient, too.)

Although the want for educational help is great it is no greater than the Filipino's capacity for appreciation. This appreciation is a charming thing to find in anyone. In the Philippines it is present in people of all walks of life. I think it is a national characteristic. I will mention an example or two.

I spoke to the students and other Americans at the American school in Manila on Constitution Day. I briefly referred to the Filipinos in the introduction to my talk. Later I gave a mimeographed copy of it to Dr. Gumersindo Garcia, a regent of the University of the Philippines, an outstanding physician and surgeon, and an outstanding Christian gentleman. He wrote to me October 4, 1949. I quote in part: "I wish to take this opportunity of thanking you for your generous spirit of appreciation of us Filipinos. While I may say with humility and sincerity that we do not fully deserve that high commendation because we know our own weaknesses and shortcomings, and yet because of your sincerity in saying these nice things of us, we as a people cannot help but be grateful to you and be more inspired to become fully deserving of your high regard of us.

"But if we have become as you have expressed in a magnificent way in the first page of your address, we can also frankly and truly say that we owe it in a large measure to you, our American friends who for almost half a century have labored with us together and worked out a way of life that is basically Christian and democratic in spirit and practice. For this blessing in life that we now enjoy, we are deeply grateful to you, our friends across the sea and to God who has made America the greatest Nation in the world today—not necessarily in wealth and power but in heart. May God bless America and keep her moral and spiritual leadership ever strong and dynamic in a world that is again being rocked by confusion, chaos, hatred, strifes, and rumors of war.

"With my best personal regards to you and to the other Fulbright professors present at that pleasant fellowship after the meeting of the board of regents last Thursday afternoon."

This letter is characteristic of the Filipino rather than unique. It might stand for several dozen other fine letters that I have received. Near the end of my year in the Philippines the professors in the political science department of my university arranged for a farewell dinner at the Aristocrat Restaurant on Dewey's Boulevard. All of us, there were about 12 in our party, met at the restaurant on time. But when we started to arrange ourselves for a photograph before dinner, we found that the youthful professor, Telesforo Ramos, was absent. We waited for more than half an hour. Ramos had been there, but no one knew where he had gone. Finally he came rushing in with a smile on his face and said that dinner would be served in a few minutes.

Later I was told what had happened. Professor Ramos is my good friend; he knows that I like fish best of all and that the apahap is the fish that I like best. So when Professor Ramos found that our restaurant had no apahap, although they had earlier assured him that they had plenty of them, he set out in search for one. He searched until he found one. It was very excellent.

I mention this simple story because it illustrates the great length to which a person in the Philippines will go to please his friend. There is something charming and wonderful about a people that will pay such a tribute to personal relations. Again this one example can stand for a hundred.

I unexpectedly arrived in Legaspi City in the middle of an afternoon. One of my friends there, Mr. Luis Duka, who is supervisor of vocational education, urged me to stay overnight at his home. The next day I learned that he had slept on the porch in order for me to sleep in his bed.

While I was in Sulu a number of the people in various places and at different times told me about an American teacher and friend who had long lived among them. His name is Edward M. Kuder. He is spoken of in Sulu and in parts of Mindanao as though he were another George Washington. I later met this splendid American in Manila and I found that he feels as kindly toward these people as they do toward him.

Mr. Reyes, an engineer in Luzon at Santa Cruz in Laguna, once told me that I was the innocent ambassador. I believe that every American in a foreign land is an ambassador whether he knows it or not. Mr. Kuder is my idea of the informal or innocent ambassador par excellence.

The Filipinos love music, dancing and dances, ceremony, and good food. Giving an address there has much glory attached to it regardless of the talk itself. There is likely to be a printed program. There may be 10 items listed, music by the orchestra, opening remarks by a member of the faculty, a folk dance or a moro dance by the gifted Santanina Tillah, a song by the glee club or by some other group, the introduction of the guest speaker by Mr. Vijandre, the college president, the speech The Individual and Democracy, then discussion is apt to follow and cause the rest of the program to be modified, because there are apt to be many questions and little time left after the questions have been discussed, or there might be another folk dance, closing remarks by Dean Selina L. Sta. Romana, and finally music.

This is not all. There is most certain to be a banquet with excellent food and more talk. One may think that after having spoken twice during the day, and after having listened to questions and the expressions of a variety of viewpoints, and after having stated his own viewpoints in connection with different questions, he would not be able to talk at the banquet. But when he is at the banquet and he feels the joy and enthusiasm of the people there, and he observes their eagerness to participate in some sort of a roundtable discussion, he finds that he has much to say. He could not remain quiet if he tried.

During the days and weeks that follow the talk there is likely to be one or more interesting letters. Jose Ramirez, the principal of the Albay high school and the editor of a magazine for teachers, the Albay Educator, wrote to me following one of my talks. I quote the first two paragraphs of his communication:

"I thank you very much for your letter of December 11 in which you enclosed Hayden's essay on democracy. I have read the essay three times already and I have learned a lot. I fully subscribe to the ideas embodied therein.

"Your address during the provincial meet will come out in the December issue of the Albay Educator. In this connection I wish to inform you that your address has been the talk of the teachers and the people who heard it. I have told them that it will come out in the magazine. This will give those who have had no chance to get a copy of your address an opportunity to read it in full. I hope more men like you will come to Albay. Your address was very instructive and educational."

I think that the letter is the man and the man is the people. I therefore quote another letter. This one from Mindanao. Its author is Mr. Deogracias L. Cajigas, principal of the Misamis Academy in the city of Ozamiz. It was written to Colonel Meader of the American Education Foundation in Manila, under the date of March 15, 1950. I quote: "With joy I wish to inform you that Prof. John T. Salter visited this school yesterday and at 11 a. m. gave an informative and inspiring talk on education and democracy, in which he stressed the responsibility of every individual to a democratic government. He also expressed his strong belief in the possibility of bringing the whole world into a brotherhood for the common cause.

"The teachers and students of this school were impressed by the speech and by the man. Today the speech is going to be discussed in all classes in history and government in this school. The teachers and students of this school like Prof. Salter for his simplicity, sincerity, and humor."

I had a bad head cold while I was at the University of the Philippines. I called at the office of Dr. Josefina Ayuayo in the student infirmary. This doctor gave me the most effective and satisfactory treatment for a cold that I have ever had anywhere. In fact if I had a cold now, and if I had my choice of doctors in the world, I would call on this Filipina doctor. Dr. Ayuayo would never accept one centavo in payment although she greatly helped me. Other Fulbright professors told me that Dr. Ayuayo would never accept payment from them either.

Dr. Rodriguez is a professor of dentistry in the university dental school. He took care of my teeth for 12 months. He would never send a bill; he would never accept a peso.

These two doctors are straws in the wind; they show something of the gratitude of the Filipinos for the presence of the Fulbright professors in the Philippines.

I have written about the students and faculty at the University of the Philippines in a report I gave to the Fulbright Committee secretary, Dr. Jack Bryan, in Manila. I stated there that everyone at the university from President Gonzales and Dr. Francisco Benitez on down and around, both faculty and students, gave me the happy impression that I was welcome, that their best was never too good for me, and that I was doing necessary work. They are people of imagination; they were willing to have me accept speaking engagements beyond the limits of the university campus.

I felt very much at home in the Philippines, and never more so than when I was in the university classroom.

The university is second to none in the Philippines. It is not large, there are fewer than 6,000 students, but its standards are jealously guarded. The students that are there, a handful out of about 20,000,000 people, are invariably proud of their presence in the University of the Philippines. Those that were enrolled in my classes made me feel that they were happy to be there.

These students were interested in my lectures and discussions. They were attentive, invariably eager and responsive. I taught government and politics; we devoted part of our time to the current scene. The students had questions and they had opinions; they were articulate. More than 90 percent of them spoke English well and many speak it better than do many university students in the United States. I enjoyed nearly every hour with them.

One day I asked my American government class what they thought of Americans. I asked the students not to sign their name. They liked the assignment, wrote freely, and in more than nine-tenths of the cases, in fact, in nearly every instance, the student expressed both liking and admiration for the Americans. One said that he felt toward America as a son feels toward his mother. This simple figure expressed the thought of many students.

The next term I repeated the experiment on the first day that the class met. Again I found almost every student enthusistically in favor of the Americans. In order to give you some concrete idea of these student expressions of opinion, I shall quote a representative one exactly as it was written by the student.

"Whenever I come across the word 'American,' I come to think also of the word 'democracy.' For me, the word 'American' has a big sense of meaning. Just to hear this word, my body trembles with joy and excitement. Wherever this word can be heard, four freedoms always go with it. I have a high regard for this people of the world. I began to think of this people consciously as bearers of freedom and democracy when after the end of the Spanish-American War, President McKinley instructed the American Military Governor in the Philippines with such never dying words. Such words are as follows: We are not messengers of a conquering nation but, the bearer of the blessings of liberty. They are the people who was responsible for the growth of democracy in the world, especially in the Philippines; they are the greatest of all humans."

I must bring this communication to a close. My justification for writing at even this length, if I can have any justification, is the belief that I have written about something that I never see in print. One of the great things about being a Fulbright professor in the Orient is to find out that the Oriental is a human being of charm and dignity. The Filipinos seem like Americans living in a tropical land. They are living in an underdeveloped country, just as the United States was an underdeveloped country in the eighteenth century. Many of the people in the Philippines, however, are the most highly and beautifully developed human beings that exist anywhere on the earth's surface.

Even though this is true you may wonder about the other side of the picture, the publicized side. You may ask, for example, about the Huks and peace and order; the problem of economic development; the education of the farmer and the modernization of agricultural processes, materials and equipment; or the need for more education—vocational, health, dietary, and grade school—in a country where half the people cannot read or write; or you may inquire about the unprotected position of labor; and finally the general feeling of insecurity.

I agree that these subjects are important. The Bell report is one approach to them. This valuable report has great possibilities for the improvement of life and conditions in the Philippines. I hope that these possibilities are realized. The Filipinos are making a courageous fight to maintain self-government in their beloved country. They have the most difficult problem: the problem of an agricultural country that has been occupied by a cruel foe, bombed by both friend and foe, largely destroyed and impoverished, and then a few months after peace with the Japanese was achieved, and because of an earlier agreement with the United States, the Filipinos became politically independent. But, of course, they could not be so quickly independent of the ruins all about them. Their late hero, President Manuel Quezon, said that it would be better to be governed like hell by the Filipinos than run like heaven by the Americans. Yet a number of Filipinos have told me that it was most unfortunate for them to become independent right at the time that all the problems of reconstruction confronted them.

Sometimes at the end of a long discussion I have got the impression that the problems of life and government are more than an individual can bear. Just now Filipinos are faced with an uphill fight. The Fulbright professor that works with these people is going to feel doubly rewarded because their appreciation is as great as their need—and their need is great.

"I shall not try to tell that in a letter, but it is a story—the Philippines' story. The Philippine story has never been told. It has not even been hinted at in American newspapers. It is so easy to write an editorial and a news story about a disaster, but how can one write good news so that it is interesting?

For instance how can one celebrate and extoll the Filipinos for their great human qualities, for the richness of their personalities? As gracious human beings they have a charm that is not often found in this world. They love music, ceremonial, and they dance with rare grace, but they fight and die like heroes in war. They have an outflowing generosity that even now months after I have gone from the Philippines, causes me to ponder on how I can do something to repay them for their many kindnesses to me.

I know that all life is not sunshine; I have been in some unpleasant experiences, but I have had some unpleasant experiences in the United States, too. The thing that impresses me most is that the impressions that live with me are happy ones. They are the ones that most need telling, too. Especially in the case of the Philippines for it is far away. The printed word has done little in presenting a rounded picture of the land and the people.

Mine is not a rounded picture either, but there is much in it that is characteristic. I write of the thing that impressed me most—the rare fascination of a brave people earning their daily bread through hard work, and never failing to look up and smile and offer the American more than half of what they have; and if they have nothing, they are likely to get something and give it away.

I think that the Philippines will in the long future, as well as in the present and immediate future, illustrate the Biblical saying that if you cast your bread on the waters it will return sevenfold unto you. I know after my 1 year in the Philippines I would like to return and work with these people again.

Faithfully yours,

J. T. SALTER.

Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON
OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Opposition Not Quite Unanimous," by Lowell Mellett, published in the Washington Star of last Saturday, March 17. In the article Mr. Mellett comments upon the foreign policy.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPPOSITION NOT QUITE UNANIMOUS—CHAIRMAN GABRIELSON'S ONE DEFINITE FOREIGN POLICY TURNS OUT TO BE MANY MORE THAN ONE

(By Lowell Mellett)

What this country needs today, according to Republican Chairman Guy Gabrielson, is a definite foreign policy and, he says, his party has got it. The chairman doesn't do his party justice. It not only has one definite foreign policy; it has several. The idea seems to be that, if one definite foreign policy is good, several definite foreign policies are better.

Former President Hoover says we should send no divisions to Europe. Former candidates Dewey and Stassen say we should send as many as General Eisenhower requires. Senator SALTONSTALL goes along with that. Senators TAFT, KEM, and WHERRY say we should send no more than six divisions or 20 percent of our total or 10 percent of the European total.

Senator TAFT says the line against communism can be held without the six divisions. Mr. Hoover says it cannot be held even with the six divisions.

Senator DUFF says there should be no political interference with the military judgment. Senator TAFT says the sending of troops without congressional approval would put a dent in the Constitution. Governor Warren says Stalin would be happy to know we wouldn't send any without first debating the matter in Congress.

Senator TAFT finds General Eisenhower's first report hazy and indefinite. Senator SALTONSTALL finds it crystal clear.

Sending four more divisions over would lead to a land war with Russia and the massacre of American boys, Mr. Hoover thinks. Failing to do so (with congressional approval) would be a blow to European morale, in Senator TAFT's opinion.

Senator TAFT says a 3,000,000-man Army is big enough. Should have 100 divisions, says Governor Dewey. That's 6,000,000 men, says Speaker MARTIN.

Name calling has no place in foreign policy debate, says Senator NIXON. The crimson clique in our Government engineered the Communist victory in China and signed the death warrants of every young man who dies in Kore , says Senator MCCARTHY.

Senator TAFT says President Truman is trying to force us into a war with Russia. He also says Mr. Truman is guilty of abject appeasement of Russia. The self-selected successor to Senator VANDENBERG says on one day that he wishes we could pull out of Korea and on the next day that we should capture Pyongyang.

Senator WHERRY argues we should prepare to pulverize Russia from the air without fighting on the ground. Mr. Hoover likes the idea of a western Gibraltar protected by air and sea power. Utmost folly, says Governor Dewey, to depend solely on air and sea power.

Senator KNOWLAND says Western Europe and maybe even Great Britain would have gone Communist had it not been for our economic aid. Senator KEM condemns the Marshall plan, and Senator TAFT would abolish ECA.

We can never subscribe to a backyard defense of our country and our homes, says Senator SALTONSTALL. We can defend the United States more effectively on Cape Cod than in Europe, says Senator TAFT. Cape Cod is right in Senator SALTONSTALL's personal backyard.

So we find the loyal opposition performing its proper function, furnishing sound, constructive criticism of the administration in office and prepared, if called on, to give the country any one of a number of definite foreign policies. President Truman and the country, should be grateful.

Mike Masaoka, Loyal Japanese-American, Lobbies Without Votes, Money

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very fine article about my friend, Mike Masaoka, who is lobbying in Washington for the loyal Japanese-Americans. In this day and age when almost everyone picks on lobbyists, it is refreshing to note one at least who is doing an excellent job for his people, without money.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIKE MASAOKA, LOYAL JAPANESE-AMERICAN, LOBBIES WITHOUT VOTES, MONEY

(By Arthur Edson)

WASHINGTON.—It isn't a headline-making congressional hearing. No mink coats. No deep freezes. No dancing girls. But to energetic, 35-year-old Mike Masaoka, the hearing on changes in our immigration and naturalization laws is of topflight importance. He hasn't missed a meeting of a subcommittee of the Senate and House Judiciary Committees and he doesn't intend to.

I thought you might be interested in Mike because he doesn't fit in the picture that usually is painted of lobbyists. Like many another person working here to influence legislation, Mike has no money to throw around—and he doesn't control enough votes to swing a single congressional election.

All Mike has is his own seemingly boundless energy, a cheerful friendliness, and, he quickly points out, "a cause that is just." That may be enough.

Mike's cause may be better understood by looking first at Mike.

The Masaoka family moved from Fresno to Utah. Mike went to school there, was graduated from the University of Utah. Everything was going along nicely until December 7, 1941.

Japanese were put in detention camps. Japanese-Americans, though citizens, were suspected of treachery. Mike was jailed nine times.

He decided the best way Japanese-Americans could prove their loyalty would be to have a fighting force of their own. The Four Hundred and Forty-second Japanese American Regimental Combat Team was the result.

The first volunteer, Mike Masaoka. The second, third, fourth, and fifth volunteers: Mike's brothers.

The combat team had a terrific record. "We helped rescue the Texans," he says proudly, "and I am now a honorary citizen of Texas."

The Four Hundred and Forty-second won mecals by the bucketfull.

The cost was high. Its casualties ran higher than 300 percent, counting replacements.

The Masaokas won 30 medals. But one brother was killed, another suffered wounds that left him 100 percent disabled, another was 40 percent disabled.

Mike came home to work for the Japanese-American Citizens League and its 10,000 members.

The league has two objectives that are under consideration at the present hearing. In the order of their importance, these are:

Full naturalization rights for Japanese. No Japanese ever has been allowed to become a citizen, although, of course, his children who are born here are citizens. There are around 76,000 Japanese aliens in the United States and Hawaii.

"This means that my mother, who has been here since 1907 and who had five sons in the Army, can't become a citizen," Mike says. "I don't think that's fair."

The league wants the old Oriental Exclusion Act repealed so that Japanese can immigrate. Even if this is done, only 185 would be allowed to come in each year under the quota system.

"It isn't many," Mike says. "But it's the principle that counts. We think this law, which made the Japanese feel inferior, played a part in bringing on the last war."

Mike thinks he had one real break. He was named Masaru Masaoka, but the members of his Boy Scout troop couldn't pronounce it. So they all put names in a hat, and he drew out the one that would be his.

Mike has had the name legalized, and he feels he nailed the right to it down further when he was wounded during the war.

"I'm part Irish now," he says. "I needed a transfusion, and the blood was supplied by an Irishman."

Defense of Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH R. McCARTHY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Diplomats and Legislators at Odds on Allied Lineup," written by Constantine Brown, and published in the Washington Sunday Star yesterday.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DIPLOMATS AND LEGISLATORS AT ODDS ON ALLIED LINEUP—STATE DEPARTMENT WOULD LIMIT DEFENDERS TO PACT NATIONS, BRUSHING OFF OUTSIDERS

(By Constantine Brown)

The conflict between the State Department and Congress over how to defend Europe is likely to be intensified in weeks to come. So long as the cold war continues across the Atlantic, diplomatic considerations will prevail over military realities.

This was brought out sharply during the "great debate," when all military witnesses testified that they wanted badly, if political considerations can be overcome—to have the armies of Spain, Yugoslavia, Greece, and Turkey made a part of the common defense against communism.

General Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, put the idea picturesquely: "In a barroom brawl you want as many chairs at hand as possible."

In spite of public and private advice to the State Department by Members of Congress to do something to increase the defense potential of Europe, these pleas have brought no results. The State Department has given the most sympathetic consideration to this problem, but our foreign policymakers must take into account the feeling and political conditions of our Atlantic Pact allies.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENTS

The position of the executive and legislative branches of the Government can be summed up as follows:

The State Department is intent on keeping the North Atlantic Pact as it is at present. It wants Congress to appropriate billions of dollars for strengthening that organization and pays little attention to the nations which are not members of the exclusive club. And exclusive it is, indeed.

According to the charter of that organization, the acceptance of new members must be voted unanimously. This means that each of the 12 members has a veto. If Iceland, for instance, with no military strength whatever, does not want Turkey with her 20 divisions as a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, its negative vote annuls all the affirmative votes of the other member nations.

Confronted with the testimony of the outstanding military men of the United States, who will have to bear the brunt of the fighting if the cold war becomes a shooting war, the State Department hides behind this provision for unanimity in NATO.

It says to the irate Senators that there is nothing it would like better than to have these Mediterranean nations, with their large organized manpower, on our side. But what can Americans do when Britain and France oppose so sternly the inclusion of Spain and Turkey in the defense setup? What more can the United States do than it has done in the last 3 months for the inclusion of Germany? France has put up a road block against the effective alinement of Western Germany with NATO and it is not customary for our diplomats to use a blackjack on our good allies.

It will take time and infinite patience, our Congressmen are told, to iron out these difficulties which are inherent in the psychological makeup of Europe, where neighbors have been fighting each other for so many centuries. It is a miracle, which shows the persuasive skill of our diplomats, that we have been able to organize even the Western European powers into a bloc. France and Italy, for instance, have been antagonists for many years, but are honeymooning now under our benevolent eye.

But the Senate and House, where more than $7,000,000,000 will have to be voted to organize "solidly" the defense of Western Europe, are not likely to be patient. This was shown strongly recently when the mildly amended Wherry resolution concerning the dispatch of American troops to Europe was approved over the violent protests of the State Department's spokesman in the Senate, Chairman CONNALLY, of the Foreign Relations Committee.

CONGRESS IMPATIENT

The legislators' patience is growing thin. They accept the thesis that America's security will be adversely affected if Western Europe collapses under the blows of the Russian hordes. And for this reason they are willing to put no hurdles in the way of the administration, provided our foreign-policymakers follow a realistic course.

In keeping with what the representatives of the Nation have been told at open and executive sessions, they are convinced that partial defense of Europe cannot be successful. They do not believe that Europe can avoid catastrophe if her defenses are concentrated only in the west.

Moreover, they do not see any indication that the members of the North Atlantic Pact, with the possible exception of Britain, are doing anything positive to increase their defense potential. It is true that there has been a spurt of energy since former President Hoover made his first speech last December and the foreign ambassadors reported that it had been well received by the American people.

Our allies realized then that, unless they activated their military preparations in some tangible way, there was a grave risk of their being cut off from the vast sums the American taxpayer is pouring into their countries. But when assurances came from Washington that, in spite of Mr. Hoover and his henchmen in the Senate and House, the needed appropriations would be rammed through anyway, the enthusiasm to prepare cooled.

Despite all the optimism of our foreign-policy architects in the State Department and other Government agencies about the remarkable changes in western Europe, there is nothing so far to confirm the reports of such changes. Political conditions in France and other continental European countries tend to slow down any quick rearmament move, for the time being at least.

None of these western European governments actually has tapped its manpower for military service. According to factual reports from Paris, the 15 divisions which former Premier Plevin promised to have ready by 1953 will not be ready by then.

LOOPHOLE IN TREATY

Nothing concrete is expected in French armed preparations, except possibly some slow-motion rearmament, before the French elections some time this summer. Short of actual aggression by the U. S. S. R., no French politician will dare put hundreds of thousands of men into uniform until they have seen the results of the election. And when France moves slowly the smaller countries follow her lead.

Under these conditions, and because there is some danger that Moscow may decide to strike sooner than the western European political optimists expect, Congress wishes to marshal for the defense of Europe—and thereby the defense of the United States—some nations which have an organized manpower of more than 1,000,000 men, but which do not have the equipment necessary to make them a truly efficient force.

The legislators admit that the veto power of the members of NATO cannot be changed without scrapping the whole treaty. But there is nothing in that treaty to prevent the United States from extending help to other nonmember nations. There is nothing in the Atlantic Pact to prevent this country from making mutual defense agreements with other nations.

In the past, when we stuck to the idea that this country should not enter into any entangling alliances in peacetime, such mutual-defense pacts were inadmissible. But we broke away from that American tradition when the Senate approved the Atlantic Pact, in which we became full-fledged allies of the 11 Western European countries.

There is no reason, our legislators say, why we should not help and be helped in turn by nations which do not belong to NATO, if such help is necessary to further the security of the free nations. We cannot force the British and French to accept the Spaniards as allies. But neither can our western European friends take offense if we wish to strengthen the walls against a Russian invasion.

The case of Turkey is remarkable. The Turks are receiving some assistance from us under the Truman doctrine.

TURKS SEEK ALLIANCE

According to every official and unofficial American who has visited Turkey, she has not squandered a nickel of the money given her. The Turks have today unquestionably the best army in Europe. They have made repeated requests that they be included in the North Atlantic Pact. This request, mildly supported by our Government, was turned down by the other members.

Recently the Turkish Government has suggested to Washington that a mutual-defense alliance be concluded. This proposal is receiving the usual treatment: Sympathetic consideration.

The situation of Turkey, however, is totally different from that of Spain. Turkey has had for more than a decade a mutual-assistance treaty with the French and British. They want a similar treaty with us, because they believe that in this manner the confidence of their people will be further bolstered.

Since the treaties with Britain and France are in force today, there is no reason why this country should not conclude a similar pact. Yet the State Department is reluctant to do more than give Ankara's plea sympathetic consideration. Our policy makers know that they need not expect any opposition from the Senate, which would welcome such an agreement with pleasure.

This attitude of the State Department is likely to bring a head-on clash with Congress in the near future. Our diplomats are wedded to the idea that we must do nothing to irk our allies. Being perennial optimists they still believe that something might be done to soften the men in the Kremlin, if we avoid doing anything rash. They know that our defense plans in Western Europe, as they stand today, are less irksome to Moscow than if this country entered into definite mutual-defense agreements with countries like Spain and Turkey.

The Senators take a "Missouri approach" to diplomacy. They accept the fact that we are at war with the Communists in one part of the world and almost at war in another section. They believe that only a strong defense, not limited to the atomic bomb but including all the nations which want to preserve their liberties, can be a deterrent to the power-hungry Muscovites. Hence, they say, what is the good of dilly-dallying with diplomatic formulas and approaches which have failed completely in the last 6 years? Let's arm, they say, since this is necessary, but also put our chips in other places where they will bring the best results.

Whether our Western European Allies like it or not, we should provide other nations with the means to fight. A couple of billion dollars spent on the Mediterranean nations conceivably might save us many other billions in cash and tens of thousands of lives in the future.

Reforming RFC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Reforming RFC," from the March 12, 1951, edition of the Tampa Morning Tribune, of Tampa, Fla.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REFORMING RFC

Demands for reorganizing or completely liquidating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation naturally follow the Senate subcommittee's probe of the operation of that far-reaching agency of the Federal Government. The disclosures of the exercise of undue influence, of private profit, of political chicanery, brought out in the committee hearings, has provoked Nation-wide criticism.

First definite move comes from Senator KEM, of Missouri, who introduced a joint resolution for "termination of the powers and succession" of the RFC. He termed the agency "this Royal Fruit Cake," and said that a fundamental principle of American constitutional government is that "control of the Federal purse strings should remain firmly in the hands of the elected representatives of the people in Congress."

President Truman last year proposed to transfer the RFC to the Commerce Department, but the Senate vetoed that plan. At the same time Congress allowed a second Presidential plan, to shift the Federal Mortgage Association away from RFC to the Housing and Home Finance Agency, to go into effect. A new Presidential reorganization proposal, now awaiting action in Congress, would put the RFC under a single administrator.

The lending authority of RFC was extended to June 30, 1954, with two additional years for liquidation, by a bill approved May 25, 1948. Congress at that time placed a top limit of $1,500,000,000 on outstanding RFC loans and investments at any one time.

Under earlier statutes the RFC would have expired June 30, 1947. On that day, President Truman signed a bill giving the agency a 1-year extension of life, but ordering the rapid liquidation of its outstanding loans and security holdings and limiting new business to a total of two billion. The legislation provided also that no new loans could be made to foreign governments, to States, or on real estate.

What was the origin of RFC? It was originally established by Congress in 1932 to meet financial emergencies of that period.

President Hoover was mainly responsible for the birth of the agency. He intended it to function to shore up banks, railroads, other institutions which needed new capital to weather the economic collapse of 1929–33. Even advances to States for relief purposes were made as loans. In 1933 an article in the Washington Post said: "Through pouring funds into the economic organization at any legal available point, it has become a positive inflationary force."

The RFC claims that during the course of its operations 90 percent of its loans have been to small business, loans of less than $100,000, and about 51 percent to companies wanting to borrow less than $25,000. Yet, in the last 6 months of 1950, of the total of $140,987,000 lent to business, only $40,011,000 was in amounts of $100,000 or less.

The record of RFC has been spotted with questionable loans and political manipulations. In reviewing recent transactions a few days ago we contended that Congress ought to abolish it. The more we hear of it the more convinced we become on that point.

Unification of Eire

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following very fine and appropriate article which appeared in the Lynn Telegram-News, Friday, March 16, 1951, by Mr. William James Conlon, of Lynn, Mass.:

LYNN MAN WRITES ON UNIFICATION OF EIRE

(With St. Patrick's Day on Saturday, William James Conlon, of 23 Breed Street, wrote the following letter to the editor of the Telegram-News, which he deemed appropriate to the season. The letter tells of the struggle of Ireland for its unification. Three bills have been filed before the Congress of the United States by sponsors, Congressmen FOGARTY, of Rhode Island; LANE, of Massachusetts, and House Majority Leader JOHN W. MCCORMACK, of Boston.)

End of the World War. France repaid for her aid to the struggling colonies. America's contributions to the Allied cause. What will be England's response? Self-determination by all nations, great and small. The only means by which permanent peace can be secured. Ireland's claims to nationhood and to the gratitude of America.

Now that the terrible struggle in Europe has drawn to a close, and America has triumphantly vindicated the justice of the cause which impelled her to war on German autocracy, it is pertinent to recall the situation at present existing in Ireland. Much has been said and properly said since the outbreak of the war, of the debt of gratitude which we owed to France because of the services rendered by that nation in the struggle for American liberty. America has well disproved the assertion that "republics are ungrateful"; the American people have not forgotten the favors that were done for them by the gallant French Nation; and in this, her hour of strength, America has well repaid the debt at the outset of the Revolution. America appealed to Ireland; and not in vain, for Ireland's sons answered the call with the same cheerful readiness that they have responded to all similar appeals in the wars in which America has been engaged, and the words of Lord Chatham in the House of Commons in 1775, that "the Irish are with the Americans to a man," are just as applicable today.

Irishmen and their descendants in every land under the sun rejoice that the light of liberty is to shine once again for the oppressed nations of Europe, and especially that this happy result has been achieved through America's participation in the war. But what of Ireland itself, one of the small nations of Europe? She contributed more fighting men to the American Revolution than even the gallant French, and America owes more to Ireland for the success of that revolution than to any other European country, for in the day when it was unfashionable and dangerous to speak of American independence the Irish immigrants and their sons were planting the seeds of liberty on this continent. Ireland has waged the longest and most bitter struggle for human liberty and complete freedom and her people still cry out to their American friends. Will the call be heard in America as the call of the Americans was heard in Ireland 163 years ago? There is every reason to hope that it will; that the great-hearted American people will pay the debt their country owes to Ireland for the part played by her sons in the achievement of their liberties and that the American doctrine of human freedom will be consistently applied to all, including the Ireland of Sorrows, and how may that debt be paid? Our great President has solemnly declared that after this war (namely, World War I) "the small nationalities shall have the right to self-determination," and that this conference shall be settled at the peace conference and Ireland has every reason to expect that her inalienable right to self-determination shall not be excluded from this peace conference. A well-known American jurist, a serious student of this question, thus expresses himself on the present relations between England and Ireland, especially as they apply to the forthcoming peace conference, and the timeliness of his views justifies their citation here.

Surely every American and every lover of liberty and humanity throughout the world is anxious that this should be the last great war and that peace and good will among the various races of mankind shall permanently take the place of the rule of force and of the horrors of war. How can this end be attained until and unless all peoples and all nations are permitted to enjoy the right of self-determination and to select for themselves the form of government under which they are to live. We entered World War I to put an end to autocracy and to bring into existence the rule of democracy. That does not merely mean the end of German autocracy, or British autocracy, or Russian autocracy, but of all autocracy. It does not mean to bring freedom to the Poles alone, but to bring freedom to all oppressed peoples and to all downtrodden nations. And what people deserve such consideration at our hands as do the Irish?

What other land has sent us sons, who have been so numerous and so constant in our behalf, in every hour of our existence, and in every battle for our honor and our flag. Not alone were they in great numbers in our Revolutonary Armies. Not alone did they make certain the success of the Revolution, and since then render decisive aid in every war in which we have engaged, but their services in times of peace in every walk of life, in the development of our great country have been well nigh priceless to us.

And this not alone in the material things, the building of our railroads and bridges, and roads and cities, and the clearing of our forests, but even more, in the development of our ideals and of the spiritual side of our nature—that side which made us enter this gigantic war in order to bring to others that liberty which we value above all other riches. Think of their contribution to our national character; their indomitable perserverance; their indestructible optimism, the charm and vivacity of their manner; even in dark hours of gloom and storm; their inexhaustible humor and their brilliant wit; and above all, their belief in the invisible world around us in every great contest among men. We have shown the world that we are not ungrateful to France, that great country whose service to us we have now many times repaid. Can we afford to let history record that it was only to the strong that we were grateful, and that in our hour of victory and triumph, when the whole world acclaimed our power and our strength we turned a deaf ear to the call of the people whose blood has helped us so greatly to make us what we are today, and refuse to pay Ireland the debt so long owed?

Let it not be so, for in that direction, not alone, lies ingratitude—(basest of vices) but danger for the future of all mankind. While Ireland in her present mutiliated and partitioned condition, stands festering like a great cancer in the side of England, there can be no security or peace for England or for Europe.

English statesmen have tried through the centuries, every method suggested by ingenuity or force or craft, to settle this question—except the method of leaving Ireland to the Irish; and the Premier of England was forced to confess recently that the people of Ireland are now as dissatisfied with England and her rule as they were in the days of Cromwell. "It is entirely within the bounds of propriety for America to remind England of the situation as it existed in the spring of 1917 with England with her back to the wall, according to the admissions of her own generals and statesmen found herself beaten and practically at the end of her resources in which crucial moment America entered the war and brought victory and triumph to the allied cause. The former enemies became the cobelligerents of the great World War. The despised and derided colonies became through liberty and opportunity to develop their resources, the saviors in the great hour of fate.

Had Washington failed, who can say that America today would have been much more powerful than Canada or Australia, and under such conditions that would have been the fate of the Allies?

Justice demands that Ireland should have the same right accorded to her as that which is to be given to the other small nations of Europe. Experience, dearly bought by England, suggests the wisdom of turning an age-long enemy into a friendly neighbor. Gratitude and consistency call on America to help Ireland to liberty now that we have it in our power to do so.

The history of mankind and the cry of humanity which calls out for permanent peace to end all wars, both urge that only by self-determination can tyranny and war be banished from the face of the earth. A thousand selfish interests probably will cry out in England, now that her hour of peril has passed, to make no concessions to America on this question. But that extraordinary genius which has watched over England's destinies for the last three centuries and which has made her outlive trials and survive storms that seemed certain to engulf her may raise up among her sons, one who will remind her that it would be well to listen to that great country, but for which she would have gone to inevitable destruction, and to do now in her hour of triumph that act of justice which she has so long deferred.

And that act may result in building up another great and prosperous country near her shores, whose commerce would be with all mankind instead of with her alone, but the portion of state commerce which she would secure would be greater than the whole of that which she now monopolizes. It may result in bringing into existence a government in Ireland which would mean the creation of a hundred ties that would make for friendliness and neighborly kindness and of contributions to mankind in the benefits of which England would necessarily share, that would outweigh many times any losses she would sustain. It may indeed result in loosening her control of the seas, but it would remove the enmity and hostility of England's governing classes that have gone wherever the Irish or their descendants are to be found on earth—and where is it they are not to be found? And such an act will do more to remove the differences that have existed between America and England than all the other things that she can do in that it will satisfy the vast body of Americans of the sincerity of England in talking of self-determination of small nations.

Possibly England may be told by her zealous friends here that America has been won so completely from her old ideas that to all intents and purposes the separation of the two countries is a thing of the past.

But let her make no such a mistake. Never underneath the surface was the spirit of American nationality so vibrant and so strong; never was there so much pride in what our country has been able to do and is determined to do for the cause of liberty and mankind. Never so certain the reaction which will come against any failure, unselfishly to keep promises and professions, made in the hour of danger and distress. America has awakened for the first time to a realization of her wonderful strength. Not merely in resources, but in the moral leadership of the progressiveness of the world which will remain with her so long, and only so long as she is faithful to the eternal truths in that immortal document—in the common language it is well to remember of America and England—the Declaration of Independence, which startled the tyrants of mankind and started the procession of peoples toward liberty which should not and will not end until all governments on earth derive their powers from the consent of those whom they govern.

In that path lie safety and security for mankind, peace and good will among men and freedom from war with its attendant horrors, an end to the colossal armaments and preparations for war which bring in their train the overtaxation which breeds anarchy and hatred of all authority.

The United Nations and the rule of justice of which idealists all over the world are dreaming, and the permanent peace which will secure to England, as to all the rest of the world the exemption which she needs from another test of her strength in arms. May her statesmen have the courage to rise to the occasion and by their devotion to justice and the fulfillment of their pledges, help our great President at this peace conference to heal this cancerous ulcer in the side of England because a just peace will be a blessing to all mankind.

Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM JAMES CONLON.

LYNN, MASS.

Morano a Peace Officer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Bridgeport Post of March 17, 1951:

MORANO A PEACE OFFICER

When any delegation goes to Washington in the future to try to put pressure on Congressman MORANO, of our district, they'd better think twice, especially if that delegation should represent an outfit already branded by the House Un-American Activities Committee and the State Department as subversive, or a Communist-front.

A so-called peace crusade was put on in Washington and a group of these people who seem to have nothing else to do but waste their own time and annoy other people, called on Congressman MORANO. The Daily Worker had previously announced that the delegates were to proceed straight to appointments with their Congressmen.

This gang had no appointment with Mr. MORANO. He wouldn't make one because he said, they are not a legitimate group, and Mr. MORANO does not hold conferences with groups which are—not legitimate.

So when they stormed his office, he promptly ordered the demonstrators out, and when they refused to get out, he called the cops. Great. There is absolutely no sense in trying to reason with these people, or to give them the consideration that legitimate delegations deserve. Congressman MORANO is busy, too busy to be wasting the people's time on malcontents who are devoted to Moscow.

The demonstrators belong to that same gang who circulated the alleged peace appeal which insulted the good name of Stockholm. They say they're not Communists, but we'll take the word of the State Department and a committee of Congress in place of their's any day.

The delegates got a brush-off everywhere they went in Washington. The days when people of such minds could strut around the Nation's Capital as if they were getting ready to take it over are gone. Everyone understands the Moscow interpretation of the word "peace" and this crusade, like all their other attempts to cause trouble in this country, flopped.

Mr. MORANO may not be the biggest man in Washington, physically, but he proved to be big enough to handle a gang that was trying to disturb his peace and his work as a Member of Congress. Good for him.

Farm Bureau Chief Punctures Belief Farmers Getting Rich on Food Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH HARVEY
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article from the Greensburg (Ind.) Daily News of March 14, 1951:

FARM BUREAU CHIEF PUNCTURES BELIEF FARMERS GETTING RICH ON FOOD PRICES

(By Hassil E. Schenck)

Food prices are sensitive during inflationary times, just as are the prices of other items that make up our standard of living. Food comes from the farm. So, when food prices increase and everyone must have food, it is natural for consumers to assume that farmers are getting rich. It is understandable why consumers do not know about farming and farm business and reach such misleading conclusions.

Mr. and Mrs. Average Farmer got a terrific jolt when they closed 1950 accounts and began figuring their Federal income-tax reports. Latest Government figures show that Indiana farmers had a total cash gross income of 10 percent less in 1950 than in 1949, but the prices farmers paid for the many, many farm expense items jumped during the year of 1950 an average of 19 percentage points.

Government computations show that the farmer's total income is derived from only about 52 or 53 cents of the consumer's food dollar. The other 47 to 48 cents go to processors, jobbers, wholesalers, handlers, and retailers—persons operating between the farm and the grocery.

NET INCOME

Here is the way the farm business shaped up for Mr. and Mrs. Forrest M. Alexander, who rent farm land near Indianapolis. Alexander, while preparing his income-tax return not long ago, noted with satisfaction that his gross income in 1950 was $19,381—or nearly $6,000 more than the $13,831 taken in during 1949.

But imagine Alexander's depressed feeling when he learned that his net income or profit, after deducting his 1950 farm expenses, amounted to only $3,866 last year, compared to $5,891.23 in 1949—or a 40-percent reduction in net income.

This happened on a general livestock and dairy farm at the very time when the average city consumer was paying higher food prices and blaming the farmer for the rise.

What about those farm expenses? Well, here is how prices of things farmers buy for food production compared for February of 1951 with February of 1950.

A ton of 3-12-12 fertilizer is now 12.4 percent higher in price than a year ago; a bushel of alfalfa seed, 19 percent higher; a new tractor, 7 to 10 percent higher; motor oil for the tractor 12.8 percent higher; dairy feed, 23 percent higher; aluminum roofing for barns, 8 percent higher; livestock fencing, 11 percent higher; and barbed wire, 13 percent higher; and poultry feed, 18 percent higher.

Few city people know that the net income of farmers has been steadily dropping since 1947 when it was eighteen billions. The figures are $16,500,000,000 in 1948, $14,000,000,000 in 1949, and $13,000,000,000 last year.

Meanwhile, Government figures on corporate profits, after taxes, for the Nation showed: $18,500,000,000 in 1947, $20,900,000,000 in 1948, $17,000,000,000 in 1948, and $21,900,000,000 in 1950. And remember that was after taxes, too.

The national average hourly factory wage rates increased from $1.24 in 1947 to $1.46 in 1950, with the December 1950 average reaching $1.54 per hour.

When you compare or contrast income with the average of 1935 to 1939, we find: Agriculture getting two and one-half times as much as last year, labor receiving three and one-half times as much, and corporate profits amounting to more than six times as much.

Farmers have no control over the price of food. Farmers do not set the price on their farm products. But, if consumers think meat prices are unreasonable, they could correct the situation overnight simply by refusing to buy meat and turning, instead, to cheaper and equally nutritious and palatable proteins which are in abundance, such as eggs.

Consumers always have many alternatives when their favorite foods seem too high in price. That is not so with farm supplies. There is no alternative to tractors, tires for farm tools, fertilizer, and seeds and fencing. If these items appear too high in price, his only alternative as a farmer is not to buy them—and thereby reduce food production.

Forest Conservation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY O. TALLE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. TALLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including the following testimony which I delivered before the Agricultural Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, Friday, March 9, on the subject of forest conservation:

FOREST CONSERVATION

Mr. Chairman, it has been my pleasure and privilege to appear before this distinguished committee a number of times in recent years in support of appropriations for forest conservation. That is my purpose again today.

STATE AND PRIVATE FOREST COOPERATION

In the past two Congresses I have cosponsored legislation that strengthened the cooperative Federal-State forestry programs. Iowa does not boast the extensive forested areas that some of the Southern and Western States enjoy, but we do have more than 2,000,000 acres of productive timberland, largely owned by farmers and other small landholders. And we in Iowa have become increasingly aware that proper management, selective tree planting, forestry education, and fire protection are essential in maintaining the productivity of our woodlands.

We now have five farm foresters employed in my State. I have followed their progress closely, and I may report that they are rendering a real service to the small woodland owners. I urge the committee to give full consideration to the splendid work of the farm foresters. By increasing the flow of forest products, they are making a significant contribution to the defense effort.

Because of the national emergency, Mr. Chairman, the protection of our timber resources against destruction by fire is especially important. The Clarke-McNary Act, as amended, contains a $15,000,000 authorization for the Federal-State cooperative fire program in the next fiscal year. In view of the steadily rising costs of fire-fighting equipment and materials, I believe the committee should give serious consideration to appropriating the full amount of the existing authorization. An adequately financed fire-control program will benefit the Nation as a whole; and certainly the State forestry departments are cooperating wholeheartedly in the program. Last year, for example, the State of Iowa spent $12,000 as compared to a Federal contribution of $9,800 in protecting State-owned and private forest lands against fire.

NATIONAL FOREST FIRE PROTECTION

Of course, fire control is just as important in our national forests as on State and private lands. Consequently, I strongly recommend an adequate appropriation to protect our national forests; and I want to direct the committee's attention to the fact that forest-fire protection is especially important in time of war because of the very serious threat of sabotage. Every time we save an acre of public timber from destruction by fire we are saving a resource that not only contributes to the defense effort but is a source of income to the Federal Treasury.

NATIONAL FOREST TIMBER USE

In this connection, I should like to point out that the Federal Treasury is already benefiting to the extent of some $40,000,000 annually by the sale of timber from our national forests. And bearing in mind the urgent need for a steady flow of forest products in defense industries, it is my considered judgment that timber sales from our national forests should be maintained at the highest possible level consistent with good forest management.

FOREST-DEVELOPMENT ROADS AND TRAILS

As a matter of fact, lumber experts have informed me that the yearly income to the Federal Treasury from sales of public timber could be increased by $20,000,000 if roads were constructed into national-forest areas now inaccessible. The committee would do well to explore the feasibility of providing funds for building such access roads. Money so appropriated would be an investment in America's future, and a profitable investment at that from the standpoint of the taxpayer.

Mr. Chairman, on other occasions I have come before the committee in support of various forestry programs. This year, in particular, I urge special attention to the budget items for farm forestry, fire control, and access roads. These are vital conservation programs in my opinion, and the wise conservation of our natural resources was never of more urgent importance to the welfare of the Nation.

Thank you for this opportunity of appearing before your committee.

Address of Gov. James F. Byrnes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of James F. Byrnes, Governor of South Carolina, to the North Carolina Citizens Association at Raleigh, N. C., on March 14, 1951:

The people of the two Carolinas have somewhat the same ancestry and history. Throughout their history they have shown their devotion to the spirit of independence. It was the love of liberty that inspired them to fight at Kings Mountain and Fort Sumter. It is the love of liberty that today inspires their sons to deeds of heroism in Korea.

Their ancestors, the men and women who came to settle the province of Carolina, came not to establish a government. Their real motive was to escape government. Many of them had suffered from the exercise of concentrated power. In that day power was concentrated in a king. Power centered in a bureaucracy can be equally as despotic as power centered in a king.

As those early settlers increased in number, they realized some government was necessary and with great caution they distilled the experiences of mankind and adopted the Constitution with its Bill of Rights.

North Carolina did not ratify the Constitution until it included that Bill of Rights. They wanted to make certain that the liberty they sought in this New World should not be surrendered to any government.

Those early settlers did not teach their children to seek security; they taught them to look for opportunity.

They believed that liberty must be exercised by all individuals; that men cannot safely transfer their liberties to a few individuals to be held in trust for them.

They were right. In this world of ours men must assume responsibility for their own welfare or they will have only such degree of welfare as may be bestowed upon them by those temporarily in power.

Some people may be impatient with these views. They may regard them as old-fashioned. They may argue that conditions have changed. That is true, but human behavior has not changed in its fundamentals.

The failure of a man to stand on his own feet, to assume the responsibilities of a man, and to discharge the duties of a man, will weaken him now just as it did in the scorned horse and buggy days and in the early days of the Republic.

If the age of our Constitution is to be held against the soundness of its fundamental principles, then what about the age of our religion? If time invalidates truth in one field, will it not do so in other fields?

Carolinians—North and South—have believed in the fundamentals of the Christian religion and have believed, too, in the fundamentals of the Constitution of the United States. Of course, there are people in other sections who scornfully refer to the South as the backward South and the Bible Belt. As long as they couple the two, I do not seriously object, for I do not believe, after all, that a people who read the Bible and humbly try to follow in the footsteps of the Master are such a backward people.

It was only a few years ago that a Commission reported to the President of the United States that the South was economic problem No. 1. Some of the writers and politicians who then bemoaned our economic and politic plight, today are seeking legislation in their States to prevent the removal of industries to the Carolinas and other Southern States.

We have reason to be proud of our progress in the Carolinas. Less than a century ago, because we believed in the preservation of the rights and powers of the States under the Constitution, we were at war with other States of the Union. We suffered disastrous defeat.

At the end of 4 years the soldiers of the Confederacy returned to their homes having lost all save honor and spirit. They had no equipment to operate factories or to cultivate farms. They had no labor. The slaves who had previously worked our farms had been freed.

Unlike the Germans, Italians and Japanese, the defeated South received no Marshall aid. The United States Government, however, did send an occupation army, guarding the right of the carpetbagger and the freed slave to administer government. Our cry of cruelty and corruption was regarded by some in the North as the cry of poor losers, and by the other, as a fate we deserved.

But, as in all history, out of adversity there came strength. By our own efforts, we made progress even in the reconstruction period. And, to the glory of Southern women, be it said, we preserved the racial integrity of the white race.

The history of the Carolinas since the period of reconstruction is the story "From Rags to Riches." It is a Cinderella story. It is a true story.

Years ago North Carolina achieved a balanced economy. You are still progressing in industry and in agriculture. In the last 10 years the number of your manufacturing establishments increased approximately 70 percent. It is amazing to learn that last year your farmers received in cash for their crops the sum of $750,000,000.

Now what of the future? No business man can answer that question because the answer is dependent upon what Government will do. What the Government will do necessarily is dependent in great degree upon what the Soviet Government will do. But it does not depend entirely upon that.

In time of war or of great business depression, it is necessary that unusual powers be granted to the Federal Government. When there is an end to war or depression, if we are to have the form of government under which we have lived and prospered for a century and a half, those powers must be returned to the States and the people.

Experience has proved that is difficult to accomplish. Human beings love power. Seldom will they voluntarily relinquish it. A man can get drunk on alcohol and recover without suffering more than remorse and a headache but the man who gets drunk on power never recovers.

Now because of war in the Pacific and the threat of war, we are conferring extraordinary powers upon the National Government. We must do so. But every such grant should have a specified date for its termination. If at that time the necessity exists for its continuance, the Representatives of the people in the Congress can be relied upon to extend such powers.

If, however, there is no specified date of termination, I care not what political party is in power, legislation, returning such powers to the States is apt to be vetoed and would require a two-thirds vote for enactment.

I heartily favor the administration's program to increase our military power in the air and on land and sea.

In October 1945, at the very first meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers, I learned to my great disappointment, that the Soviets seemed more interested in expansion of their territory and power than in peace on earth.

When I moved to adjourn that meeting in London without accomplishing anything, I stated that no agreement was better than a bad agreement. I realized how my statement would disillusion the peace-loving people of the United States. I realized, too, that demobilization by the point system had already taken from our Army the men of experience so essential to a mechanized army.

From that day to this, I have urged an increase in our appropriations for military purposes and a decrease in our nonmilitary expenditures. However, others equally patriotic, but grossly mistaken, believed in spending more money for nonmilitary purposes and little money for the defense of the Nation. It took Korea to waken us to a true realization of our defenseless position.

As we read the casualty lists, we know we are not engaged in a police action in Korea. We are engaged in a war. We know, too, that we are threatened with war in Europe. We must not refuse to confer with the Soviet Republic with a view to avoiding a world war, but as we confer, we must always remember that peace depends not upon what is written in an agreement but upon what is in the minds and hearts of men. The Soviets will live up to an agreement only so long as it is to their advantage to do so. And it will be to their advantage only so long as the United States is strong militarily and economically.

From my experience with the Soviet representatives at many international conferences, I know they respect only force. Therefore, we must be strong in the air and on land and sea. Our rearmament will not provoke a war but our failure to rearm might well do so.

It is my conviction that the only reason the Soviets have not started a war in Europe is because of our supply of atomic weapons.

On one of my trips to Russia I saw the damage done by German artillery and air power to Russian cities. I saw the effect that destruction had upon the minds of Soviet leaders. They realize the much greater destruction that would be wrought by our atomic weapons. They realize, too, that if we have in Western Europe an army sufficiently strong to hold their foot soldiers in check for a time, we will have available the air bases from which to fly planes that would destroy, not only their supply bases, but their production facilities.

Of course, the Soviets might likewise destroy some of our communities where are located plants producing weapons of war. Fortunately, however, our production is being decentralized. And with the protection afforded us by our air power and our Navy, it will be a long time before the Soviets, with the air bases they presently have, could do any great damage to American production.

It is the productive power of the United States upon which the free nations of the world rely for defense of their liberties. It is our productive power, as well as our atomic power, that will cause the Kremlin to hesitate to start a war in Europe. That is why we must remain economically strong.

We must not allow misguided or selfish people in our midst to do what Stalin cannot do—destroy our productive power. And the people of America must support those officials who are willing to tell the representatives of business and of labor that they cannot use this war situation to promote their selfish interests.

The Congress has freely granted the appropriations recommended in the President's budget for military purposes. I hope that with equal enthusiasm they will reduce the amount requested for nonmilitary programs.

In his budget message the President recommended the enactment of legislation embarking upon new activities such as socialized medicine, the Brannan plan, Federal aid for education, and the civil-rights program, including the FEPC. I hope the Congress will just forget these recommendations.

These proposals will divide the people of the country at a time when unity is essential. Some of them would involve the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. Others threaten local self-government and threaten also the liberties of the individual.

The people of America are willing to sacrifice even life itself to defend our liberties against communistic governments. But while making such sacrifices they do not want to have their government start on the road toward socialism.

I hope, too, that the Congress will forget the administration's point 4, the objective of which is to elevate the standard of living of all the peoples of the world. It is appealing to think of helping all mankind. Our people will always respond to an appeal for help to any pepole in an emergency. But common sense tells us there is a limit to what we can do.

The taxpayers of this Nation cannot adequately provide for the defense of this country, furnish military equipment to all governments that will resist the aggression of the Soviets; discharge our obligations to our veterans, the poor and the aged, and at the same time elevate the standard of living of the peoples of all the rest of the world.

The freedom-loving people of the world must remember that we fight and sacrifice to preserve their freedom as well as ours. They must remember, and we must remember, that if we fall or stumble there is no other government to which we can turn for financial help. There is no Marshall aid for us.

We will be like Coleridge's Ancient Mariner,

"Alone, alone, all, all alone.
Alone on a wide, wide sea!
And never a saint took pity
On my soul in agony."

Our people must remember, too, that government has no money except that which comes from the pockets of the people or is borrowed, if borrowed it must be repaid either by our taxpayers or by their children, who then would be made to suffer for the folly of their fathers.

There is a vast difference between local governments borrowing to invest in schools or other improvements of permanent character and the National Government borrowing to improve the standards of living of the people of the world.

The United States Government now owes approximately $260,000,000,000. During the fiscal year beginning next July first, if we do not have full scale war, our debt will increase an additional $13,000,000,000, unless additional taxes are levied. If we have full scale war, of course, the increase will be greater.

The market price of our bonds has been preserved by the Federal Reserve Board through its control of the issuance of currency. That is inflationary. It presents a terrible problem because if the price of our bonds ever should begin to drop, the holders will start to sell and accelerate depreciation.

Facing this situation, the people who urge that we embark upon new activities costing billions of dollars should be willing to withhold their demands until we have first made secure their liberties.

Because of the Korean War and the defense program, it is essential that the Government enforce wartime controls. Last July when it became apparent that we were engaged in a war in Korea, a ceiling should have been placed on prices and wages. It was not done. Now it is a difficult task.

It was not done at the beginning of World War II. When I became Director of Economic Stabilization, 11 months after we entered the war, I had the same difficult task that today confronts Mr. Wilson and Mr. Johnston. Businessmen and farmers demanded increased prices. Labor demanded increased wages. Each group claimed their demands were necessary because of the increases received by the others. At my request, President Roosevelt signed the order known as the hold-the-line order.

Of course, every group complained. They howled—they threatened. All of the leaders came to see me. I had more acquaintances and fewer friends than I ever had in my life. But then, as now, if we were to halt inflation, there was but one course. That was to hold the line.

Today the Government must say what it means and mean what it says. Exceptions cannot be made. Of course, there will be inequities. Inequities are a part of war. One boy is called to fight and die in Korea while another boy may live at home and make money. In time of war, if the Nation is to endure, there must be a spirit of sacrifice instead of a spirit of selfishness.

The people who are called upon to make sacrifices are not made happy by the disclosure of disloyalty of an employee of the Atomic Energy Commission and by the shocking disclosures before the Senate committee investigating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Worse than the loss of money is the loss of confidence in the honesty of men who have occupied responsible positions in Government.

There is no excuse for the existence of the organization. Why should your Government lend public funds to manufacture automobiles and fabricated houses to build tourist hotels in Florida?

A man can borrow money from the banks and private investors provided he has character and collateral. If he does not possess them, he should not be loaned your money.

In March 1945 I expressed this view to President Roosevelt. In his administration the RFC had been wisely administered by Jesse Jones. But President Roosevelt realized the danger. He said it had served its purpose and when peace was restored it should be liquidated. He did not live to liquidate it.

Because of the war situation, it may be necessary to make loans to a few manufacturers producing weapons of war. But these can be made by Charles E. Wilson, defense mobilizer, who has the confidence of the people. The Congress should promptly enact legislation to liquidate the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I want to make clear that while I disagree with the administration about some domestic policies, I am not criticizing its foreign policies. I heartily favor the defense programs. I heartily favor the administration's policy of sending troops to Europe. I think we should accept the judgment of General Eisenhower as to the number of troops we should contribute to the army of freedom. I am willing also to accept his judgment that the governments of Western Europe are showing a willingness to fight for their freedom.

I would make even further overtures to Yugoslavia and to Spain. They have armies on the field, not merely on paper. I would also accept in that army of freedom troops from Western Germany. If Stalin should determine to make war on Western Europe, that great industrial people could not remain neutral even if they wished to do so. Western Germany will be with us or with the Soviets. I want them with us.

Upon the cessation of hostilities we promptly returned the German prisoners of war. Later France and Britain returned theirs. The Soviets failed to return approximately a million German prisoners of war to their homes. Those German soldiers are working as slaves in Russia or have died while working as slaves. They constitute a million reasons why the Germans would prefer to serve in Eisenhower's army of freedom.

We must say to our friends in Western Europe that if American boys are going to risk their lives in defense of Western Europe, we want them to have the help of every soldier who is willing to fight against the Godless Communists of Russia.

I do not believe that a world war is inevitable. On the contrary, if we remain strong, militarily and economically, I believe there will be no war, certainly not for a long time to come.

We must remain strong, not only militarily and economically, but spiritually. "In God we trust" must be engraved in our hearts as well as on our coins. We must pray that the war in Korea shall come to an end. We must pray that we shall never have another world war. But, if notwithstanding our prayers and our efforts, that misfortune should come to the world, the people of the Carolinas will be found sacrificing, fighting and dying for America, the land we love.

Rewards of Good Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, February 20, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, there was brought to my attention the following folder; it clearly brings out the close attention paid by our local officials to the needs of the American public. Alderman Thomas J. Corcoran was elected in 1947 receiving a vote of 2 to 1 over his opponent. Here in 1951 after attention to the duties of his office he has been returned with the same plurality.

Mr. Corcoran represents the finest type of public servant. It is by attracting men of this caliber to public office that the great strides are made in urban development and administration. His record is a standard of performance which is recognized by his community. His devotion to duty is indicative also of good work being done by so many of our local officials. Public notice should be taken in order to encourage them as well as the public.

The above-mentioned follows:

CIVIC COUNCIL OF THE EIGHTEENTH WARD

Shortly after being elected in 1948, I organized what is known as the Civic Council of the Eighteenth Ward, a representative group of practically all the improvement associations throughout the eighteenth ward. We meet at intervals once a month and take up matters most pertinent to the interest of our community. This organization has been most cooperative and has been of fine assistance to me.

The members of the civic council are as follows: Highland Improvement Association, Englefield Improvement Association, Ashburn Civic Association, Auburn Park Improvement Association, Eighty-third and Campbell Improvement Association, Foster Park Council, North Beverly Improvement Association, Park View Civic Association, West Hamilton Park Improvement Association, Wrightwood Improvement Association; also, Highland Businessmen's Association, Gresham Businessmen's Association, Auburn Park Chamber of Commerce.

Listed below are a number of services and improvements that have taken place during my term of office:

TRANSPORTATION

Bus service extension on Eighty-seventh Street, from Western to Hamlin Avenues, to take care of the fast-developing residential district in that area.

SEVENTY-NINTH STREET

After several conferences with members of the Chicago Transit Authority and their staff, I have been promised that by July 1, 1951, the one-man streetcars on Seventy-ninth Street will be replaced by propane motorbusses. The one-man cars have been a hazard and have slowed up and delayed transportation on this busy thoroughfare. It is the tendency of the riders to stay close to the front entrance on the one-man streetcars, which is also the exit. This will be eliminated, as the new motorbusses have an entrance in front and an exit either at the center or the rear of the bus.

STREET LIGHTS

Removal of 56 gas and gasoline lamps, or lights, and have been installed 486 new street lights. This is in the area west of Western Avenue where single-family dwellings are rapidly being constructed by numerous private contractors.

TRAFFIC-CONTROL LIGHTS

To eliminate traffic hazards we have installed traffic-control lights at eight dangerous intersections, viz: Sixty-sixth and Halsted, Seventy-eighth and Halsted, Sixty-fourth and Morgan, Eighty-seventh and Racine, Seventy-sixth and Loomis, Seventy-sixth and Damen, and Seventy-ninth and Damen.

Approval also has been made to install traffic-control lights at Eighty-first Street and South Halsted Street.

SEWERS

The completion of the Wood Street sewer eliminated the flooding condition in a large area west of Ashland Avenue.

The present main sewers in the entire area south of Sixty-third Street and east of Ashland Avenue will be tied into the sanitary sewer now completed in Sangamon Street and Seventy-second Street, and numerous laterals are to be constructed which will also empty into this sanitary sewer. I have been informed by the city sewer department this work is to begin early this year and to be completed within a reasonable time.

EIGHTY-SEVENTH STREET

The construction of a median strip and new lighting system on Eighty-seventh Street from Vincennes Avenue to Damen Avenue is now nearing completion.

FOSTER PARK FIELD HOUSE

Through constant contact with the Chicago Park District construction was started some 6 months back on a field house for Foster Park, which, when completed, will service some 40,000 residents of the area, and will cost $527,245. Work is approximately 50 percent completed.

A small field house and shelter has also been erected in O'Hallaren Park at Eighty-third Street and South Wood Street.

SAFETY GATES

There have been installed within the past few months safety gates at the grade crossings of both the Grand Trunk Railroad and the Wabash Railroad west of Central Park Avenue and east of the Southwest Highway on Eighty-third Place.

SCHOOL BUILDINGS

In the newly developed area west of Western Avenue I have been successful in having erected two new-type portable school buildings at Eightieth and South Talman Avenue, which services children from sixth grade down, who prior to that time had to travel a great distance and cross two main arterial streets to attend Clara Barton School at Seventy-seventh Street and South Wolcott Avenue.

PUBLIC HOUSING

Over a period of the past 2 years I have successfully opposed several tentative public-housing projects which were to be located in the eighteenth ward. In my opinion, public housing is an added burden on the taxpayers, because this type of building does not pay real-estate taxes, but the occupants receive all the services rendered by the city government.

I will continue to oppose this type of tax-free housing, not only in the eighteenth ward, but in the entire city.

REFUSE AND GARBAGE DISPOSAL

Refuse and garbage disposal as well as street maintenance has received very close attention from our ward superintendent, and he has assured me of his continued cooperation along these lines.

Trans-Isthmian Canal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. ALLEN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. ALLEN of California. Mr. Speaker, in the February issue of Marine Progress an article on the Trans-Isthmian Canal appeared which was called to my attention by a former colleague, the Honorable Willis W. Bradley, of California. The subject is one which it is appropriate to keep alive particularly when we have in mind that the carrier recently proposed to be built by the Navy would not be able to traverse the Panama Canal and that larger ships of every category seem to be in prospect in the immediate future.

The article to which I refer reads as follows:

The reorganization of the Panama Canal Zone Government, providing for the separation of certain functions and also the establishment of a new base for computing tolls, has served to drop from the current shipping picture the still present problem of adequacy of the waterway in the light of future defense and economic developments.

It has been estimated that at a time no more distant than 20 years, the present Panama Canal will not be adequate, in its present form, to accommodate the shipping that is expected to use it. There need only be a brief survey of the ships that have been built since the end of the war to realize that the trend, in both tankers and dry-cargo ships is toward larger and deeper vessels, as well as ships with considerably more power and speed than has heretofore graced our merchant marine.

The new supertankers will draw up to 34 feet of water and the new 20-knot cargo ships, on which bids have just been taken, will also be deep draft vessels. These ships while providing transportation for larger amounts of cargo at higher speeds also offer their own navigational problems, particularly in narrow channels. Those that will transit the Panama Canal will have in addition, other hazards inherent in the present canal structure that will make the transiting of these large, powerful vessels a task where the closest attention to navigation must be paid. There is, of course, the dangers that the navigator finds in the relatively narrow channel of the Gaillard Cut, aggravated by the prevalence of lock surges from the Pedro Miguel Locks that sweep back through the Canal until they are dissipated in Gatun Lake. There will also be the hazards of holding these vessels in anchorage or mooring areas in case of fog and with their greater length the number of ships so moored or berthed will be less than at present, all leading to delay, if not confusion.

CONGRESSIONAL STUDIES

During the session of the Eighty-first Congress a House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee subgroup was charged with looking into the adequacy of the present canal, to determine the feasibility of changing its level and its axis to increase its capacity or whether it would be better to construct a canal at some other Isthmian location.

This subcommittee spent some time in the Canal Zone meeting with Canal officials and making a study of the actual operation of the waterway. The subcommittee, after its Canal Zone work was completed and the data evaluated, reported to the chairman of the whole committee who said:

"An evaluation of the information reported by the subcommittee makes it apparent that authorities familiar with the Panama Canal are of the opinion that the existing operation will be unable to accommodate commercial traffic by 1970. At this point it should be borne in mind that the above estimate is for normal peacetime flow. Some of our biggest naval and commercial vessels cannot now transit the Canal. The Canal at this time would be most difficult to defend against a concerted attack of enemy aircraft using the conventional type bombs. A dislocation of the lock system could render the Canal unusable for 2 years."

The committee chairman did not consider the defense of the Canal because this was not his responsibility, but his subcommittee did consider the adequacy of the waterway from a commercial viewpoint, and from its studies Chairman EDWARD J. HART made these remarks in his report, "It is granted that any Canal facility must perform the requirements of peacetime commerce in order to meet its responsibility as an important adjunct to our national defense. Because of this fact, it is the sense of the committee that the Congress, with the assistance of appropriate agencies of the Government, should give thorough consideration to our national need for a transisthmian canal and should take such steps as are prerequisite to that end. The committee further believes that the Congress should appropriate a sufficient sum which would provide for the appointment of some of the best engineering minds of our country to a committee for the purpose of studying this situation."

The question under consideration requires the minds of highly trained specialists in the engineering field if the proper answer is to be given. The committee can only approach the problem with the minds of laymen, and we feel that our duty to the Nation and to posterity necessitates the recommendation that the study be undertaken by those with greater knowledge, skill, and training than the committee possesses. The committee further desires to impress upon the Congress the extreme value of the Canal to the defense of our country and to remind the Congress at the same time that if steps are to be taken to either build a companion waterway in the Canal Zone or to construct a new waterway in some other spot that it will be a long, tortuous process. We believe this to be one of the most important questions confronting the American people, and hope that speedy action will be taken to formulate a definite program.

With a full appreciation for the effort in formulating a program necessary for such achievement, and the knowledge that legislation authorizing any further study or construction must be followed by a minimum 3 years' work to build new locks at the present site, and a maximum of 10 years to build a sea-level route, it is strongly urged that action be taken on this question without delay.

THE POSSIBLE ROUTES

Aside from the Panama route there are two major locations where a canal could be dug. One is across Nicaragua, utilizing Lake Nicaragua for a considerable portion of the distance, and the other is at Tehuantepec, Mexico, where a break in the range of mountains provides a site for a canal.

The House subcommittee reported that after concluding its studies at the Tehuantepec site and its discussions with Mexican officials it was of the opinion that it would be difficult at this time to get permission to construct the waterway at that location.

The situation in Nicaragua is far different, however. The subcommittee was assured that there is great willingness on the part of the President of Nicaragua to grant the United States whatever is necessary to make the canal possible. The committee members made an extensive exploration of the proposed route by foot, motor, and air. They were told that such a canal would save from 1½ to 2 days on the intercoastal voyage over the Panama route.

The Nicaragua route has been an active idea for some hundreds of years. The diplomatic overtures and negotiations that have transpired since the idea was first broached have been extensive. Capt. Miles DuVal, USN, retired, has covered these thoroughly in his books on the Panama Canal, from Cadiz to Cathay and also the second volume, And the Mountains Will Move. In these works he shows the strong efforts that have been made to bring about a Nicaraguan canal and how the decisions on the ultimate location of the transisthmian waterway wavered between Panama and Nicaragua and finally settled on the present location.

In respect to current opinion on the waterway across the isthmus there is a two-faction camp in existence, inhabited by proponents of a sea-level waterway in the Canal Zone and by the proponents of the terminal lake plan which has received so much attention in recent years. This last plan is the work of Captain DuVal who proposes that a terminal lake be created between the Miraflores Locks and the entrance to Gaillard Cut and the elimination of the bottle-necking Pedro Miguel Locks as part of the plan.

This plan is seen as having distinct marine benefits since it would eliminate a number of conditions affecting the transit of ships that have been set up through the location of the locks at Pedro Miguel.

The studies made by the House Merchant Marine Subcommittee have served to keep alive the question of an adequate waterway from ocean to ocean and the recommendation that a group of experts make a full study of the problem is one that will meet with the approval of the users of the canal. What they will probably look for is adequate representation on any such commission so that the merchant marine requirements of the canal can be discussed with the engineering talent to the end that a practical waterway be built to handle the waterborne commerce which, after all is said and done, will be the major users of the canal.

The Delivered Pricing Fog

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, for half a century it has been the practice of heavy industry in America—cement, steel, building materials, lumber, newsprint—to quote delivered prices to the buyers of their products. When the Federal Trade Commission issued an order forbidding this practice, and the Supreme Court in the well-known Cement case partially sustained the Commission's order, the result was chaos and uncertainty in all lines of American heavy industry. It threatens to dislocate and wreck our economic system.

Mr. Speaker, the Federal Trade Commission has been crusading for many years against these long-established pricing practices, practices in which the producer absorbs the freight. The Commission proposes to substitute f. o. b. plant prices for the delivered prices. Twice the Commission has attempted to persuade Congress to pass legislation to bring about this change, but Congress has refused to do so because the Commission has failed to prove that such a change in pricing practices would be an over-all benefit to the American people.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that Congress will act promptly to clear away the fog that the Federal Trade Commission edict and the court ruling have thrown around the clear intent of Congress concerning the delivered pricing system. Congress should at least make clear its policy concerning this long-established method of selling.

The following factual and logical discussion of this subject taken from the 1950 annual report of the Marquette Cement Manufacturing Co. is so concise and clear that I include it as a part of my remarks for the enlightenment of my colleagues:

THE QUESTION OF HOW TO PRICE

Current world events have tended to obscure the fact that an important piece of work in the economic field on the home front remains to be done. This job is to require the Federal Trade Commission to administer the laws as written and as clearly intended by Congress.

Under present laws anyone has the right to sell at delivered prices and to meet lower prices of competitors wherever or whenever he considers it good business to do so. But this does not accord with the economic ideas of the Federal Trade Commission; so it has set about to change the laws—not by seeking amendments, but by administrative circumvention. To make matters worse, some courts have given their approval to such conduct, and, as a consequence, the meaning and intent of the basic laws have been lost sight of by the public.

There is no consistency in the rulings of the Federal Trade Commission. In one breath it condemns the lowering of a price to secure business as unfair competition. In another breath it charges that any meeting of competitive prices establishes a conspiracy in restraint of trade. Then it indulges in meaningless press releases to the effect that not every meeting of a competitive price is unlawful, but never specifying when that condition exists.

Under such circumstances it is easy for the average businessman to lose track of the basic laws and his rights thereunder, and to follow, sheeplike, whatever seems to be least frowned upon at the moment by the FTC.

But such procedure often produces harmful effects upon the public. That is precisely what happened when a large segment of the heavy-goods industries adopted f. o. b. plant pricing following the Supreme Court opinion in the Cement case. Statistics on file with the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee show that the f. o. b. plant pricing induced by this attitude has cost the public many millions of dollars.

It should be obvious in view of all this that Congress must clarify existing laws, if for no other reason than to encourage a return to competitive pricing and thus a reduction in the cost of goods to buyers. The right to meet competitive prices has been recently reaffirmed by the Supreme Court, but there is no reason to believe that the Federal Trade Commission will respect this decision any more than it has respected the laws as written. The only way to insure correct administration is to enact new legislation making the intent of Congress so manifest that even the Trade Commission will not dare to circumvent it.

For our own part we continue to price on a delivered basis, believing that the lawfulness of independent, competitive delivered pricing has never been in doubt. By lowering our price to meet a price of a competitor in a particular market, our customer in that market is assured that he has no cost disadvantage to overcome in his competitive efforts. Thus our policies tend to benefit the ultimate consumer.

Harry Goes Fishing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. R. GROSS
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, not very many of our country editors in Iowa are being fooled by the Truman administration's insipid policies at home and abroad.

Illustrative of that is the following bit of poetry written by Charlie Gebhard for his column Nowadaze and printed in last week's issue of the Bremer County Independent, published at Waverly, Iowa.

It is a pleasure to reproduce it herewith:

The atom race is really hot;
The Commies worry us a lot;
We've lost the peace for which we fought;
In foreign intrigue we've been caught;
But Harry just goes fishing!

Inflation's storming through the door,
As billion's down the drain we pour;
Our dollars just can't shrink much more,
While taxes jump and prices soar;
But Harry just goes fishing!

The RFC is in a stew,
As graft disclosures come anew;
A mink coat brought an I O U
And many more the same way too;
But Harry just goes fishing!

The State Department's full of pinks,
Who crossed us up on Mao's Chinks,
While Dean was taking 40 winks;
We need a change there too, methinks;
But Harry just goes fishing!

The cost of beef for us each noon,
Proves that the cow jumped o'er the moon;
Our whole price structure's out of tune;
We need some roll-backs mighty soon;
But Harry just goes fishing!

In Waverly we hope and pray,
We'll get a change election day;
But that's still two full years away;
There's so much to be done today;
But Harry just goes fishing!

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article from the Boston Sunday Post, Boston, Mass., Sunday, March 18, 1951:

ACCEPTANCE OF UMT WILL INDICATE WE ARE WILLING TO BREAK DOWN OUR SYSTEM—IT WOULD BE MOST RADICAL DEPARTURE FROM OUR WAY OF LIFE SINCE THE BEGINNING OF THE REPUBLIC

(By John Griffin)

Nobody knows what the next few years will bring, but apparently the advocates of compulsory military training, or universal military training, as they now call it, don't want to take any chances of universal military training being considered on its own merits, if any. They want to rush it through now, to take effect some years in the future.

And it looks very much as if they are going to succeed. The Armed Services Committees in both House and Senate have approved a bill which ties universal military training up with the draft and other matters, although they insist no actual move be made under universal military training for several years.

Why are they so anxious to rush universal military training through now when it won't become effective for several years? Obviously, they are afraid that under more normal conditions and a substantial peace situation, they wouldn't be able to put it over on an American people who have always loathed the idea.

Universal military training is the most radical departure from our way of life since the start of the Republic. It will disrupt the education of millions of American youths. It will put them under the Army training and the philosophy of the top sergeant during some of the most important years of their lives, years when the formation of character and the basis of a career are most effectively achieved.

WEIRDEST EXCUSES OFFERED

It is a system that was responsible for the emigration to America of some of the best European peoples. A good many ancestors of present Americans came to this country to avoid compulsory service.

Some of the weirdest excuses ever devised have been offered in favor of universal military training. It has been said by some people of important standing that universal military training would be good for American boys because of its educational, moral, and spiritual values in addition to the physical training it would afford.

No person devoted to the American concept and the traditional American way of life would pay any attention to such arguments if he stopped to think for a minute. The idea of turning boys over to the military for such training is abhorrent to the American idea. It always has been.

Some of the organizations that have been consistently plugging the cause of universal military training have apparently forgotten that it is a system used by European monarchies and other governments that were designed to hold the people in subjection in both body and mind.

Some of these organizations might have served the country better if they had devoted their efforts to cleaning up politics. Then the morals of the politicians would be a credit to democracy instead of a public scandal.

PROVED SOUND CITIZENSHIP

For several years, during and after World War II, some leading American figures were insisting upon universal military training for its citizenship values. One of these was Mrs. Roosevelt, whose public statements were in reality an insult to the veterans of World War II. She insisted that the youth of America needed training in civic responsibilities and the requirements of citizenship.

While she was sounding off on that subject, she was also using her influence to see that the notorious Communist, Gerhard Eisler, was admitted to this country. She was also entertaining puerile pinks at the White House.

The youth of America had just demonstrated, at the cost of several hundred thousand lives and millions of wounds, that their idea of citizenship was sounder than hers. Yet she kept right on with the proposal of UMT for citizenship training, and even went so far as to favor similar training for girls.

The worst argument of all for UMT was served up by those who insisted upon pointing to Switzerland and Sweden as examples of countries which, through UMT, had avoided war. The inference was that other nations were afraid to attack them because of their use of the UMT system.

Some people have accepted that argument without stopping to think of the absurdity involved in the suggestion that Germany, for example, was afraid of Switzerland. The facts, as far as Sweden is concerned, are that the Germans could have taken it any time they wanted, but didn't need it so long as they could use it for their own purposes.

The bulk of the iron ore that was necessary for the Hitler war machine came from Sweden, and it was to Germany's advantage to keep Sweden out of the war. It wasn't fear of the Swedish system of universal military training.

ONLY POSSIBLE REASON

A noted educator, President Charles F. Phillips, of Bates College, said the other day that if a universal military training bill is passed, it should have a definite time limit to its existence. His suggestion was 5 or 7 years, after which if the situation has improved, it could be allowed to lapse.

It is a good suggestion, but a better one is to continue the draft for a year or two and see what the situation is then. Perhaps at that time UMT would not be permitted by the people through Congress because of its breakdown of the American way of life.

The only possible excuse for UMT in a democracy is military urgency. All other arguments, the stuff about moral and spiritual and education values, about citizenship responsibilities is the bunk. And there is no military necessity for it now, and there won't be under present conditions.

The manner in which proposals that violently clash with the American way are calmly accepted nowadays makes one wonder whether the system of government and the system of living that we know, aren't being imperiled. The acceptance of UMT will indicate that we are willing to break down our own system.

The Overton Waterway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 1, 1951

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, Americans must not become entirely dependent upon colonies and other countries for their existence. A kind Providence has bestowed upon us bountiful natural wealth, which, under proper stewardship, should assure us a strong place among the great powers of the world for centuries to come. If we fail in the careful handling of these natural resources, this Nation may sink into a second or third place among the peoples of the earth, as have other nations which have risen and later fallen into obscurity. We must, therefore, so handle these resources which a benevolent Providence has placed at our disposal that they may sustain and support the economy of this Nation for many years to come.

It so happens that we now find ourselves in the wake of the most terrible military conflict of history, and we are at this hour grappling with problems which may usher in another world war. With this in mind, we must so handle the assets of our Nation that they will strengthen and renew the institutions that we may be in a proper economic and military posture when the great crisis should come.

One of the critical materials which is giving great concern at the present time is steel. Upon survey, we find that more and more our steel industry is being forced to look further and further for iron ore from which to fashion steel for use in this steel age. Since almost the birth of this Republic our heavy industry has depended upon iron ore from the Mesabi Range of mountains; but now, under the tremendous withdrawal from this area, we find that our supply of high-grade iron ore is being rapidly depleted. Industry is looking southward to South America—Brazil, Colombia, and Venezuela—for rich ore; and this must be brought into the United States from remote areas. The proposal now comes to us that we open up the St. Lawrence River from the Great Lakes to the ocean, at a tremendous public expense, so that rich ore may be brought into this country from Labrador and Newfoundland to our smelting plants in the Pittsburgh area of this country. This proposal seems to be gaining some favor, in spite of the fact that to accomplish this gigantic development we must industrially invade our neighbor on the north—the Dominion of Canada—and there construct great locks and dams so as to make navigation possible along the St. Lawrence River to the ocean. Such a program will provide water transportation by which this heavy ore may be slowly moved to the mills and factories for processing.

While the Nation is looking abroad for accessible deposits of iron ore for use in our manufacturing we are overlooking great possibilities within our own midst. In east Texas, adjacent to my own congressional district of Louisiana, are located vast quantities of rich iron ore. Already careful surveys have indicated that at least 200,000,000 tons of high-grade brown ore have been located in northeast Texas suitable for manufacturing purposes. This ore has been surveyed and tested and found available and suitable to our use. Our country badly needs this supply of iron ore, and we naturally exclaim in pleasure over the new find in east Texas. Why then is it not being used as a means of supplying our furnaces in the Pittsburgh and the Birmingham areas?

The answer is the same here as it is in the case of the Labrador and Newfoundland areas—transportation. The Texas ore is located miles from water transportation. It is about 15 miles west of Jefferson, Tex., and close to Shreveport, La. There is rail, but no water, transportation to the ore fields.

During the course of the thirties the Army engineers made surveys of this area for navigation purposes. They came up with the recommendation that a canal be built on the west side of the Red River, beginning about 5 miles south of Shreveport and roughly paralleling the Red River to its mouth far below Alexandria, La. This canal would follow Bayou Pierre from Shreveport southeasterly; then Cane River and other available streams until it opens into Red River some 30 miles above its mouth. Such a canal, they stated at that time, could be built for the sum of $42,000,000. It would, I am sure, in these inflation times cost considerably more.

Such a canal, to be called the Overton waterway, will provide canal navigation by means of a system of locks and dams. It will provide a slack water route from the region of the east Texas iron ore to the inland water routes of the Nation. Iron ore produced within a few miles of this canal would be trucked to the turnaround basin south of Shreveport, loaded upon barges, and moved to points throughout the country where needed. The Mississippi River, the Intercoastal Canal, the Tennessee, Cumberland, Ohio, Missouri, and, in fact, all of the mid-continent navigable streams will do their part in moving Texas iron ore to the markets.

Some persons there may be who may label this statement to be a "pipe dream" and nonrealistic. Such a charge should be immediately dismissed as untrue and incorrect. Already at least one large steel mill is operating in this area at the present time and is doing an excellent job. Other mills may soon become available. But real progress in the development of the ore field will occur when the Overton waterway is built. Low-priced water transportation will give the incentive to make this whole area blossom into activity, and the peoples of this country will benefit from the heavy movement of iron ore to the mills and the furnaces.

Of course, we want to utilize foreign ore within limits when it is available and thereby save our own resources for the day of real trouble when we will not be able to bring outside metals in huge quantities into this country for use in mobilizing to fight the enemy. The day may come when our merchant marine will not be able to move South American ore across the long sea lane and to our factories in the steel sections of the United States. Enemy submarines may be on the prowl and the cost in loss of tonnage and manpower may make such an operation prohibitive.

When such conditions arise, we must have readily available ore which can be moved to the steel mills along waterways far removed from the sharp swish of the enemy torpedo and along the sheltered routes which belong exclusively to our own people. Inland water development is certainly a wise and far-sighted policy for our young and vigorous Nation to pursue.

I saw some of the submarine warfare of the last war. I saw ships sunk along the Florida coast by hostile submarines—ships afire, crews jumping into the water to save their lives, and cargoes jettisoned to salvage the ship, if possible. Such scenes are not pleasant. They represent loss and waste—waste of material and of manpower. They represent waste at a time when waste could least be afforded.

A very few of such losses will more than pay the entire cost of the construction of the Overton Canal, and then, for all time, we will have an inland slack-water canal route from the rich iron-ore fields of east Texas to all parts of the Nation. Then will our people rejoice in the further development of our Nation and feel confidence in the knowledge that we are building, not only for development of the domestic front but also for the safety and security of the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the construction of the Overton waterway will become a matter for the immediate attention of our Army engineers and the Budget Bureau, and before another great war shall claim our energies and efforts we may have it available for our use and our security.

American Selling Price Principle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to include a letter received with reference to H. R. 1535 on which no action has been taken by the Ways and Means Committee. This committee is presently considering a tax revenue raising measure pending the receipt of further reports on H. R. 1535 from interested departments. The letter, dated March 13, 1951, follows:

UNITED STATES RUBBER CO.,
Naugatuck, Conn., March 13, 1951.

Hon. ANTONI N. SADLAK,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SADLAK: Both labor and management involved in the manufacture and distribution of rubber footwear devoted much study last year to H. R. 8304 (81st Cong., 2d sess.), the proposed Customs Simplification Act of 1950. It was our feeling the bill proposed in general many constructive and long overdue changes in customs procedure.

We did, however, take vigorous exception to one provision in the measure. That was section 14 which, if it had been enacted, would have jettisoned the American selling price principle as a basis for computing import duties on rubber and canvas footwear. The bill would have substituted a foreign export value as the basis for computing duty. It was our contention that this involved a substantive change in the law and was not for that reason germane to a measure pointed otherwise at streamlining customs procedure.

This bill has now been reintroduced in the Eighty-second Congress, H. R. 1535. It contains the same objectionable provision (sec. 14) eliminating the American selling price principle. This section of the bill provides that the Tariff Commission shall certify to the President a rate of duty for each classification of articles "which the Commission estimates to be reasonably equivalent."

It is our contention that even if the authors of the bill sincerely intended to provide the same level of relief under the proposed revisions, they could not make good. Experts in customs matters support us in this view. The proposed bill does not outline a detailed procedure for converting the tariff protection to the same level under the proposed revision. The Tariff Commission, as far as we can learn, has not agreed on a procedure of any kind to meet the new proposed provisions, much less one that will guarantee our industry the same protection as it now has under the American selling price. We have had no information from Tariff Commission or State Department to persuade us from our opinion that no workable scheme can be devised under the new law to give us this same protection.

If we are to have the same protection as under American selling price, how would the Tariff Commission set up a schedule of tariffs which would take account of the fluctuations in the price of imported goods and the price of like or similar American goods?

When it is realized that there are hundreds of different rubber footwear items, each with its own price level, it becomes clear that there is no workable substitute for the American selling price method which will give the industry the same level of protection.

Some of the letters last year from the State Department indicated a misunderstanding of the American selling price principle and the conditions under which it was enacted into law by Congress about 25 years ago. It was implied that the United States Government, apparently upon the urging of American industry, adopted the American selling price as a "device to conceal the real amount of protection actually enjoyed by this and the other industries concerned."

Congress set the American selling price as a basis for duty valuation because other methods of valuation were not adequate; and one of the inadequacies was the inability of American officials to obtain accurate information on foreign costs. This was particularly true with reference to rubber footwear. In this respect the situation is even worse today.

The American rubber footwear industry's most serious competitor for the domestic market is Czechoslovakia. Can the Tariff Commission or the State Department get trustworthy data on costs of production in Czechoslovakia today? Does any one in our Government have accurate figures on the labor and material costs represented in a pair of rubber gaiters from a Czech factory landed in New York today?

Instead of concealing the facts about the amount of duty, the American selling price makes it easy for a foreign competitor to determine the amount of duty he has to pay in relation to his costs of production.

From whom are the facts as to the real amount of protection concealed? Not from the Czech manufacturer. Under the American selling price he is the only person who knows the actual rate of duty based on his export value or any other value. And under the American selling price usually he can determine what his duty will be even before he begins to manufacture. The only thing that would change his estimate would be a change in the selling price of the American article like or similar to the one he is producing, and the adjustment in any event would be negligible.

The American rubber footwear industry can stand no further cuts. In fact competitive footwear made in low-wage countries abroad is seriously threatening the industry under the existing duties. Labor constitutes approximately 47 percent of the factory cost of canvas and waterproof rubber footwear. This is the labor of American workmen and wages paid in this industry in this country are far higher than those in any other country. The materials used by American manufacturers of canvas and waterproof rubber footwear are, with the exception of natural rubber, American made and here again this industry is at a disadvantage as against the use of materials produced in foreign low-labor-cost countries.

The manufacture of rubber footwear is an essential part of our national economy. It is vital to our national defense. During the last war this industry furnished our Armed Forces with more than 45,000,000 pairs of rubber footwear. In the same facilities, it also made life rafts, fuel cells, raincoats, life vests and other similar war products. Without a going rubber footwear industry our national defense program would be seriously impaired.

Thirteen companies are engaged in the manufacture of rubber and canvas footwear and employ more than 20,000 men and women with sales of approximately $100,000,000.

It is one of the truly American industries—foreign manufacturers having copied its styles and methods. The low-labor rates and cheaper materials costs of foreign manufacturers, particularly Czechoslovakian and Japanese, combined with lower tariffs, would mean the loss of jobs to thousands not alone in this industry but in the factories of its suppliers and in the stores and shops in the communities which serve its workers.

It is clear that the elimination of the American selling price, through H. R. 1535 or any other measure would adversely affect the American rubber footwear industry, its stockholders, and its employees, and eventually the American public who look to this industry to supply it with essential waterproof rubber and rubber-soled canvas shoes.

We earnestly solicit your support for the elimination of this Section 14 from the bill which is now under consideration in the House Ways and Means Committee.

Very truly yours,

T. R. BEHRMAN,
Industrial Relations Manager, Naugatuck Footwear Plant.

GEORGE T. FROEHLICH,
President, Local 45, United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum, Plastic Workers of America, CIO.

Relief for Our Manpower Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OMAR BURLESON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, a suggestion has been made by an outstanding and able member of the Texas Prison Board, Mr. French Robertson, of Abilene, which might give considerable relief to our manpower shortage.

Mr. Robertson states that there are at least 1,500 able-bodied young men in Texas prisons, convicted of minor offenses, who would make good soldiers if a national clemency policy was set up permitting them to join the Army.

As he points out, if there are 1,500 such prisons in Texas, then there must be 30,000 to 40,000 prisoners in the country who are potential soldier material.

In an interview with Elizabeth Carpenter, Washington correspondent for a number of papers in the Southwest, Mr. Robertson elaborates on this idea which he has since carried to top officials at the Pentagon and I understand they are now fully exploring its possibilities.

I call to the attention of Congress this interview with French Robertson which appears in the Abilene Reporter-News of March 9, and ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD:

WASHINGTON, March 9.—Behind Texas prison walls, there are 1,500 able-bodied young men, convicted of minor offenses, who, in the opinion of a member of the Texas Prison Board, would make good soldiers.

Not content with the "no" which he has already received from the Fourth Army Headquarters, French M. Robertson, of Abilene, a member of the board, will take his suggestion to the Pentagon Building and to Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON, of Texas, whose preparedness subcommittee has been seeking answers to the big manpower shortage.

"A world of these boys should never have been sent to prison in the first place," said Robertson, who, as a former Air Force lieutenant colonel in World War II, adds: "I think they could serve their country well and rehabilitate themselves in uniform."

Robertson will point out to officials here if, using rough mathematics, there are 1,500 such possible draftees in Texas prisons, there must be some 30,000 throughout the United States. He will have no difficulty impressing his listeners on Capitol Hill with the significance of 30,000 more men. The past few weeks has kept more than one congressional committee busily seeking new manpower resources which might have been overlooked in the past.

The prison manpower which Robertson believes could be put to use first came to his attention last July when the Korean situation created patriotic fervor among some of the inmates. They swamped him with applications for clemency, saying they would be of much more use to their country on the front line in Korea than locked up in Huntsville.

Robertson and Prison Manager O. B. Ellis looked over the prison population of Texas—which has swelled from 3,600 in 1946 to nearly 7,000 this year—and found that there are some 1,500 young men whom they would consider good material for the Army.

Robertson called on Gov. Allan Shivers who encouraged him to take it up with the Army. But Army officers at Fort Sam Houston informed him that military regulations prevent anyone convicted of a felony from joining the Armed Forces.

Army regulations are, of course, subject to change to meet new emergencies and it is Robertson's thought that the manpower crisis might warrant exploration of prison material by the military.

By careful screening of the men permitted to join the Army, Robertson sees no difficulty in letting convicts take up a gun for Uncle Sam.

"We would set up a screening committee to check the history and record of the prisoner who was released to the Army," Robertson explained, "There would be many applicants, of course, that we would not release."

It is Robertson's belief that the young men whom he considers good soldier material could best fit into the "service end" of the Army—driving trucks, cooking, or doing the day labor in the Ordnance and Quartermaster Corps.

"Most of the 1,500 boys in Texas got into trouble because of their environment," Robertson explained, "They really never had a chance. They'd see Willie Jones taking his girl out on a date with a new suit of clothes and they'd want one. So, they'd forge a check."

Texas laws are much too strict on many offenses, according to Robertson who recalls one case he handled as a young attorney in which a 17-year-old boy was sent to prison for 3 years for forging a check for $5.

"The kid was selling magazines and he needed some money so he forged a check for $5 using the name of someone who had taken out a magazine subscription," Robertson said, "It was a forgery so the court sent him to the pen for 3 years."

It is this type of offender which Robertson believes could safely be rehabilitated into the Army and finally become a decent, useful citizen in civilian life.

"Being in the Army would restore self-confidence and self-respect," Robertson says, "the two big factors in setting a man back on the right path."

1951 Budget Made Understandable for Public

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, in the New Brunswick (N. J.) Sunday Times of February 18, 1951, there appeared an article reporting on a brief analysis by Dr. Audley H. F. Stephan, chairman of the department of economics of Rutgers University, of the President's Federal Budget. The article is entitled "1951 Budget of Billions of Dollars Made Understandable for Public." I ask unanimous consent that Dr. Stephan's article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NINETEEN HUNDRED AND FIFTY-ONE BUDGET OF BILLIONS OF DOLLARS MADE UNDERSTANDABLE FOR PUBLIC

The President's demand for a new Federal budget of $71,600,000,000 to keep the United States in business in 1951 probably gives most citizens no more than a baffling headache. Even his request to Congress for $16,500,000,000 in new 1951 taxes probably staggers more than it penetrates the minds of most people.

For billion-dollar amounts are totally beyond the comprehension of most ordinary citizens.

This $71,600,000,000 is to be spent on a business which belongs to each and every citizen in the United States, and they are going to be asked to pay the $16,500,000,000 in anticipated new taxes, reminds Dr. Audley H. F. Stephan, budget expert at Rutgers University. He believes, therefore, that average citizens should be offered the opportunity to understand their Federal budget.

MADE UNDERSTANDABLE

Dr. Stephan, who is chairman of the finance and economics department of Rutgers University College and former New Jersey budget commissioner, has translated this staggering Federal budget into layman's language as a service to his fellow citizens.

Here is his popularized presentation of the national budget, the only changes being the removal of a few ciphers to make the sums more understandable and a more simply worded explanation of the reasons for the expenditures. Characters of this dialogue are the bank loan officer, representing Congress as the representatives of the American public, and the bank customer, representing the President as the Nation's chief executive officer.

A bank customer, already owing the bank $25,700 (the national debt) on prior borrowings, goes in to the bank's loan officer and asks to borrow $1,650 (requested 1951 additional taxes). The following conversation ensues:

Loan officer: "What is the amount of your present income?"

Customer: "I was granted a substantial increase in pay 3 months ago, so my take-home pay is now $5,510 a year (anticipated receipts or earnings of United States in 1951 Federal budget)."

Loan officer: "Fine, how much of your salary do you think you can save this year?"

WON'T SAVE THIS YEAR

Customer: "Oh, I won't save any this year. You see my necessary living expenses this year will amount to $7,160 (Federal budget estimate of total operating costs of United States in 1951)."

Loan officer (amazed and gasping for breath): "Do you mean that already owing the bank about five times your new salary, you still want to spend more than you earn?"

Customer: "Oh, yes. But I'll gladly tell you what I must spend."

"First, you see I have been named defendant in a law suit which I must fight or lose everything, and the court costs and lawyers' fees will cost me $4,142. Then, since this is not my first law case, I am still paying $491 a year on past cases.

"Next, I have some neighbors who have been rather hard hit in the past to make ends meet, and they find it difficult to reduce their standard of living. So I must help them to get along and this will cost me $746 during the year.

"While I hate to mention it, the interest alone on my present debt, without any reduction of the principal, will cost me $590 this year.

"Fourth, I have a number of poor relations and old folks that I'd like to help, and so must give them $263 because they don't earn enough themselves."

RELATIONS AND FARMERS

"Also, some of my relatives are farmers and I don't think the prices they receive for their potatoes and other crops are fair. So, I'm going to give them $143 additional.

"Then, I have some ideas on brand new contraptions that, if they succeed, will be helpful to everybody and they will cost me $250 to develop.

"Upkeep of my car will amount to $169 and other living expenses, including hiring a bookkeeper to keep my accounts straight, will be $142.

"Oh, yes, I forgot I have some friends I'd like to set up in business and some others that need some financial help to keep out of the red, which will cost me $152.

"Finally, some of my children are still in school and I give them $4 a month allowance which costs me $48, and some of my working children get out of work at times and I give them $22.

"That's my story. Do I get a loan?"

The answer to the question is to be decided by the Congress in passing the appropriation bill or bills. Should Congress decide not to permit the Federal Government to go further into debt, it will be necessary to raise taxes. The taxing side of the budget might be presented in the form of an employee (the President) going in to his employer (the people of the United States represented by the Congress) and asking for a raise in his pay (sufficient to meet his added expenses).

In this case the employee's situation is that prior to World War I he made less than $100 a year (total taxes collected by the Federal Government prior to the First World War). During World War I his pay was raised to $330 a year, and following that war during the 1920's his pay went to $440 a year. The depression of the 1930's reduced his pay somewhat to $400 a year. The Second World War provided the spurt which raised his take-home pay to $2,850 a year. During the first four postwar years another increase raised his pay to $3,940 a year. Late in 1950 his employer increased his pay by 40 percent to $5,510 and now if his pay is to meet his expense he must be given a further 42-percent raise to $7,160, or in other words a total of 82 percent in take-home pay in less than a year.

The alternatives facing Congress is whether as loan officer it will grant an additional loan, or as an employer, can it give another raise. The Congress might solve its problem partly by a loan and partly by a raise in pay, but the pay-as-you-go policy will permit of no loan at all. If the raise in pay is too great, somewhere the proposed expense must be reduced.

Dr. Stephan concludes, "The little story above is not fiction. If each figure used is multiplied by 10,000,000 the result will be the federal fiscal policy for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1951, as set forth in the Federal budget.

It Is About Time Millions of Americans Wake Up to Communist Actions and Objectives in Asia

---

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, during the postwar years when the Communists in China were seeking to undermine and discredit its government and seize control themselves, they were portrayed by the leftists, and most liberals in our country as spontaneous democratic uprising which was endeavoring to give China true freedom, and its people wider civil rights and genuine self-government.

At the same time Chiang Kai-shek and the legitimate government were denounced as Fascist aggressors, even butchers, because they apprehended some professors, students, and a few labor leaders who it has since been demonstrated were in almost every case Communist traitors seeking to overthrow the government by violence and make China a colony of the Soviet Union.

Events have proved that Chiang's error was in not being strict enough rather than in being too harsh against enemies of the state. Now the latter are in control. Their record of ruthless oppression and cruel tyranny makes any recent previous regime in China seem mild by comparison.

The American Federation of Labor is to be commended for its forthright reporting of the facts about what was to be such a benevolent Utopia in China. One can hardly blame many Chinese for being taken in by the glowing promises of the Reds. But there never was any excuse for Americans to be fooled—especially so-called intellectuals. It is a sad commentary on where the greater realism resides in America to note that many labor leaders were among the first and most courageous exposers of the Communist lies, while thousands of professors, ministers, scientists, artists, and—least excusably of all—columnists, commentators, and editors were vigorously promoting the Communist line, in most cases not knowing what they were doing.

The record needs to be compiled, because the reeducation of many is still far from finished. Under leave to extend my remarks I include two articles from the American Federationist for February 1951—one by Richard Deverall, A. F. of L. representative in Asia, and the other by Victor Riesel, well-known columnist specializing in labor matters.

THE MOSCOW-PEIPING PLOT AGAINST ASIA'S FREEDOM

(By Richard Deverall, A. F. of L. representative in Asia)

Many of us remember well the raving pages of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf, with its blueprint for the conquest of the West. Some of us found in Mein Kampf a clear warning of Nazi intentions. Others regarded it as the work of a madman, a wild dog, a screwball. But, as we know today, Mein Kampf was a document that clearly outlined the tactics and strategy of the Nazis.

So, too, today many who have read the Collected Works of V. I. Lenin and such books as Joseph Stalin's Problems of Leninism have been plainly forewarned by the Soviet slavemasters that their objective is world domination and nothing less, that they plan to achieve conquest of the world by first conquering Asia and then using the men and raw materials of Asia to destroy the remaining portions of the free world.

Thus in one of the last articles penned by Lenin, found on page 854 of volume II of his Selected Works (Moscow, 1947), we read:

"In the last analysis, the upshot of the struggle will be determined by the fact that Russia, India, China, and so forth, account for the overwhelming majority of the population of the globe. And it is precisely this majority that, during the past few years, has been drawn into the struggle for emancipation with extraordinary rapidity, so that in this respect there cannot be the slightest shadow of doubt what the final outcome of the world struggle will be. In this sense, the complete victory of socialism (Stalinism) is fully and absolutely assured."

There is no secret in all this. It is not Anglo-American or anti-Soviet propaganda.

Following Lenin, Stalin has himself written on countless occasions of the intentions of the Soviet geopoliticians to conquer China first, then through China conquer Asia and, with control of the land mass of Eurasia, complete the conquest of the entire world. This follows the classic formulation of Lenin:

"The road to Paris is through Peiping."

Some persons profess to see in the Communist drive a glorious and epic crusade to free the world from imperialism and colonialism. They view the literacy, electric power, and collective-farming schemes of Communist Russia as achievements of the Soviet regime. Such persons overlook the tens of millions of Soviet citizens who languish in slave-labor camps because they dare to assert their God-given humanity and their human rights. Such naive persons overlook a Yugoslavia which, if it is Communist, is not under the heel of Stalin and which therefore, in Stalin's view, must be destroyed by a Communist Russia whose concept of democracy is utter surrender to the will of the Kremlin.

The Communist geopoliticians at Yalta in 1945 wrung from President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill amazing concessions which made straight the path for the advance of Soviet imperialism in Asia. Yalta guaranteed Russian control of Manchuria, guaranteed the encirclement of a disarmed and defeated Japan by Soviet military and naval power, and guaranteed the fall of democratic Korea under the weight of Soviet pressure.

When the war ended, the honest attempt made by the West to find the road to world peace was terminated, as ever, by the Soviet butchers. They created the Cominform, pushed guerrilla activities through stooge Asian Communist parties, and most cynically used Japanese arms and the vacuum created by Japan's defeat to launch full-scale guerrilla warfare in China, in Indochina, and other Asian areas.

It must never be forgotten that so-called British imperialism has drastically retreated in Asia. British power has left India, Pakistan, Burma, Ceylon, and other areas. The Dutch have been forced to relinquish political control of rich Indonesia. Throughout Asia the greatest phenomenon of the postwar era is the end of European power in Asia.

And in the Asian countries which have found freedom and national independence, indigenous regimes have struggled with the terrible social and economic problems which resulted from the brutal and wasteful occupations of the Japanese Army. These new regimes have struggled to emancipate their people and to resurrect and refurbish their century-old cultures and century-old civilizations. Yet Moscow has attacked each and every national regime in Asia—except those subservient to Moscow—as bourgeois, antinational, rotten regimes.

In essence the Soviet aim in Asia since the end of the Pacific war has been to wreck the new-found national independence of Pakistan, India, Ceylon, Indochina, Indonesia, Burma, Korea, and the Philippines. Stalin's actions clearly warn that Red China is the Asian base which the Kremlin is using to extend Communist domination across the map of ancient Asia. Where the British and Dutch and French have withdrawn, Moscow and its Asian stooges plan to march in. Nothing less than complete domination of Asia is the objective of the Kremlin and its Chinese Communist colony.

The Stalinist butchers use two tactics in the achievement of their aggressive strategy and warmongering.

One is the exploitation of overseas Chinese minorities in the Philippines, Indochina, Thailand, Malaya, Indonesia, and Burma to aid in the financing of Chinese Communist propaganda, penetration, and espionage. Anyone who listens to Radio Peiping broadcasts made daily to the overseas Chinese knows that the Chinese Communists are banking on use of overseas Chinese as a fifth column in free Asia.

The second tactic is use of the so-called World Federation of Trade Unions and its stooge unions to foment civil disorder, violence, sabotage, and juncture with Communist guerrillas in the final all-out push to liquidate the Governments of Indochina, Pakistan, India, Indonesia, Malaya, Burma, Thailand, and the Philippines.

All this is a matter of the Communist record.

Early in September of 1949, Asian and Australasian Communist leaders and WFTU affiliates received invitations to attend a conference to be held in Peiping, capital of Communist China. The invitation requested "complete reports on the situation in your respective countries, progress of your organizations, your problems and the means of solving them, and the assistance you wish to obtain from the WFTU." The WFTU conference met in Peiping on the 13th of November 1949, with some 177 delegates on hand, representing 13 countries, including Communist Russia, Communist China, Communist Mongolia, North Korea, Indochina, India, Burma, Thailand, Indonesia, Ceylon, Malaya, Iran, and the Philippines.

The conference was formally opened by Liu Shao-chi, a vice president of the WFTU, trusted adviser to Mao Tse-tung and honorary president of the All-China Federation of Labor. With the geopolitical ambitions of world communism well in mind, Lui told the assembled delegates that over one-half of the world's population lives in the vast territories of Asia and Australasia; these territories have rich resources, industrious working peoples.

As even a blind man can see by reading Liu's speech, this was no conference of bonafide trade-union leaders promoting free trade-unionism but rather a top policy conference of military men, guerrilla tacticians and quasi-trade unionists plotting the military destruction of the hemisphere of Asia not yet under Soviet domination. Thus Liu said:

"The path which led the Chinese people [i. e., the Communists—Ed.] to victory is expressed in the following formula:

"1. The working class must unite to form a broad, nation-wide united front.

"2. This nation-wide united front must be led by the Communist Party.

"3. It is necessary to build up through patient struggle a Communist Party equipped with the theory of Marxism-Leninism.

"4. It is necessary to set up wherever and whenever possible a People's Liberation Army led by the Communist Party, an army which is powerful and skillful in fighting enemies, as well as strong points for the operations of these armies, and also to coordinate the mass struggles in the enemy-controlled areas with the armed struggle. Morever, armed struggle is the main form of struggle in the national liberation struggle in many colonies and semicolonies."

And in case anyone doubted the intent of Liu, he added:

"This is the main path followed in China by the Chinese people—i. e., the Communists—in winning their victory. This path is the path of Mao Tse-tung. It can also become the main path of the peoples of other colonial and semicolonial countries for winning emancipation where similar conditions prevail."

On November 16 the executive board members of the WFTU were tendered a banquet by Chou En-lai, premier of the Chinese Communist regime. With Chou En-lai were Gen. Chu Teh, commander in chief of the Chinese Soviet Red Army, and other top Chinese Communists and military officials. On November 21, Mao gave a huge banquet honoring the WFTU delegates.

And, as reported by the Indian Communist weekly, Crossroads:

"The delegates repeatedly toasted to the health of Stalin, leader of world working people, and Mao Tse-tung, the leader of the Chinese working people."

As the smokescreen of public meetings, huge rallies and banquets proceeded, supersecret military sessions were held by the top leaders with well-known Russian agents. These secret sessions pointed up the essentially military nature of the WFTU's Peiping conference. The Russian Communist warmongers, L. Soloviev and S. Rostovsky, were present at the secret meetings. The participants in the top-level meetings discussed the 1950–51 strategy of world communism, including the planned tactical struggle in Korea to secure that geopolitical bastion for the Kremlin.

The report of Louis Saillant, general secretary of the WFTU, clearly outlined the key role of the WFTU in undermining the freedom and national independence of the Asian nations. Comrade Saillant listed the several Cominform stooge organizations which would work with the WFTU in overthrowing popular governments throughout Asia—the World Federation of Democratic Youth, the Women's International Democratic Federation, and the International Committee of Intellectuals. Saillant proclaimed the world aims of the Communist imperialist warmongers when he declared:

"We are forming the grand new coalition of peoples fighting for a new world, living in peace, making socialism a living reality and laying the foundations of a new civilization on a world-wide scale."

Following Saillant, Comrade Soloviev of Russia warmly supported the recommendation of Saillant that an oriental bureau of the WFTU be set up in Peiping. He outlined the antinational and espionage role of this agency when he said it would be "responsible for the consolidation of contacts between the countries of Asia and the WFTU for the provision of mutual exchange of information, implementation of the decisions of the leading bodies of the WFTU for rendering assistance to national trade union centers of countries of Asia."

And, as Saillant noted in his closing speech, the WFTU described a three-tiered category of Asian countries:

Tier 1. China, Mongolia, and North Korea.

Tier 2. South Korea, Indochina, Indonesia, Thailand, Malaya, and the Philippines.

Tier 3. India, Burma, Ceylon, Pakistan, Iran, and Japan.

Obviously the tier 1 countries are those dominated by the Soviets and presently behind the Kremlin's oriental iron curtain. And if the Peiping conference considered the tier 3 countries as still difficult, the implication is clear that Moscow's plan of aggression in Asia comprehends guerrilla warfare and the overthrow of democratic regimes in the tier 2 countries—South Korea, Indochina, Indonesia, Thailand, Malaya, and the Philippines.

Another proof of the tactics and strategy can be found in the speech of Li Li-san. He pointed out that the Chinese Communists had learned that they had to stir up agrarian unrest and promote revolutionary land reform programs, that they had to unite with the bourgeoisie in the urban areas and thus build a united front. Second, Li La-san said, guerrilla struggles, over a period of years would form the base for the people's liberation armies. Third and most fundamental, the Chinese Communist movement has always been under the leadership of the Communist Party of China, which has always accepted the theoretical guidance of of Marxism-Leninism.

Clearly Li Li-san was hammering home the warmongering, death-to-liberty theme expounded at the confernce by Comrade Liu.

Significantly, Ban Se-yang of South Korea led off in presenting reports. He noted that since October of 1946 the WFTU forces had led mounting guerrilla warfare against the Republic of Korea (South Korea). He called upon other Asian nations to boycott the United Nations. And after him came Choi Ho-min, of North Korea, who demanded that UN advisers in Korea and American troops in Japan leave at once. Each speaker underlined the activities needed to pave the way for the coming Communist aggression against South Korea.

As Indochina is the next on Stalin's timetable in Asia, it was not surprising to find that Luu Doc Pho reported in turn. Representing the Vietnam trade union movement, he emphasized guerrilla struggles and the war for emancipation. Luu Doc Pho said that such emancipation would be brought to a successful issue only if the working class of every country follows the example of China.

Next came the report of Vas Sunderachamara of Thailand who reported on the progress of the labor movement in that country. After describing the wartime role of the Anti-Japanese Volunteer Corps (the Communist wartime front) and their struggle against Japanese militarism and the Phibul Songgram clique, this Communist then told of the emergence of the Bangkok Federation of Labor and pointed out how the wartime struggle brought unification of Siamese, Chinese and workers of other nationalities. After attacking the government of Thailand, Vas ended thus:

"Long live the new democratic republic of China. Long live Mao Tse-tung. Long live Stalin."

The report of Lu Cheng of Malaya emphasized the role of the Communists in building guerrilla forces under the Japanese occupation. He told how after the war the Communists formed the Pan-Malayan Federation of Labor to launch revolutionary general strikes. Then he told the story of how after June of 1948 the Communists and their trade union allies went underground to mount the present civil war in British Malaya.

Comrade Ali Marjono reported for Indonesia. He told how the Communists formed the SOBSI in November of 1946, attacked Hatta as an "imperialist tool" and described Premier Nehru of India as leader of the "reactionaries" in southeast Asia. This Indonesian Communist let the cat out of the bag when he declared:

"The great victory of the Chinese people and its working class, guided by the Chinese Communist Party and the leader, Comrade Mao Tse-tung, is a victory for our people."

Comrade Aun-Win reported for Burma. This Communist denounced the Thakin Nu government. The Communist-led unions of Burma, he said, would fight for "complete destruction of the fascist system of the Thakin Nu government."

The report from India was unsigned, but it was given in the name of the Communist-led All-India Trade Union Congress. It denounced the "bourgeois Congress government." It denounced Prime Minister Nehru. It denounced both the Hind Mazdoor Sabha and the Indian National Trade Union Congress. It also denounced the American Federation of Labor "who have spent many months (and dollars) in India training up their Indian prototypes." But for Stalin, Mao, and the WFTU it had sweet words. Them it hailed as "saviors" of Gandhi's India.

The program of the so-called World Federation of Trade Unions and its Russian and Chinese Communist backers is crystal clear. The record speaks plainly. There can be no doubt that the criminal Communist aggression against South Korea is but the first move in the conquest of the Tier 2 countries—Indochina, Indonesia, Thailand, Malaya, and the Philippines. And once they are conquered and transformed into Kremlin colonies, then will come India's turn and the turns of Burma, Ceylon, Pakistan, Iran, and Japan.

No sane person can talk of "neutrality" in the face of this clear Communist-WFTU blueprint for the conquest of Asia, which has already given evidence of its authenticity through the brutal Communist aggression against Korea.

As the Communist record shows, the Communist Party in every country mentioned is committed to the service of Stalin in the subversion of the now independent and free nations of Asia.

And in Korea, Indochina, Indonesia, Thailand, Malaya, the Philippines, India, Burma, Ceylon, Pakistan, Iran and Japan the WFTU-affiliated unions, by their own pronouncement, are traitorous, subversive agencies seeking to used armed guerrilla forces, pledged to serve as espionage agents for their Kremlin-Peiping masters and acting as the running dogs of world Communist imperialism—the highest stage of international Stalinist communism.

In these countries the Communist Party is not a political party but the advance military base of Soviet imperialism and the coordinator of armed terror, arson, bloodshed and unremitting guerrilla warfare. The Communist Party in every country is not a political party but, by its own frank admissions, an armed military group. So, too, the agents of the WFTU and their affiliated members throughout the world are not trade unionists but the running dogs of the Kremlin, the espionage agents for Soviet Russian imperialism, the paid puppet fomentors of bloody revolution, the precursors of totalitarian coups d'état aimed at throwing into the ashcan of history the hard-won freedom and independence of the Asian countries which have struggled, in the face of all difficulties, to extend freedom and raise living standards throughout Asia.

The blueprint for Communist aggression against all Asia outlined at the Peiping conference of November-December, 1949, is proof positive of the vast plot now unfolding throughout Asia. Asia has been warned. Let him who has ears hear.

Asia has indeed been warned. Courageous action today may secure freedom, peace and national independence tomorrow.

But action tomorrow or the day after tomorrow may be too late.

MAO, LIKE STALIN, MURDERS HONEST TRADE-UNIONISTS

(By Victor Riesel)

A nonconformist labor chief in the land where the spirit of Sun Yat-sen has sunk disappears fast. Then comes the bullet. This has happened to 800 since the Soviet took over China. I have their names, where they were killed and why.

On the night of April 30, 1950, the lights went up in the Kumsin theater, largest movie house in West Canton. Leaflets were spread calling for the celebration of a non-Communist May Day. The throwaways were found in every street, even in the mansion of Mayor Yeh Chien-yin.

Communist Kanpoo arrested 400 labor men. They were never seen again.

Yo Cheng-chi, a labor man, was killed by the secret police in Tzepo, Shantung, in February 1949; Wu Cho-ting was murdered in Tsinan, Shantung, the same day.

Hwang Ta-chung and 22 of his colleagues, men and women, were assassinated in Shanghai in July 1949. Ching Kwang-shi and 50 of his union people were slain at the Sungsin cotton mill because they stood on their human rights and in August 1949, refused to move factory machinery to go to the Soviet Union. Late in 1950, 400 were shot in Tsingtao on sabotage charges.

Wei Yung-lai, Mao Teh-kang and Shuntao were killed for calling a strike in the Wing-on cotton mill, No. 2 factory. One thousand key unionists were arrested in Shanghai, 600 in Canton, 300 in Chungking, and 200 in Hankow recently. Loh Kwan was wounded in Portuguese Macao by Red agents after escaping from glorious new China.

The August 19, 1949, labor regulations, just made available in this country by the anti-Communist underground, say that during a labor-management dispute:

"* * * employees shall not strike or engage in other activities tending to obstruct production or produce deterioration in labor discipline. Even after an arbitration decision has been made by the Bureau (of Social Affairs) * * * the right of interpretation and revision of these regulations rests with the Military Control Commission."

A let's-be-frank meeting was run by the Chinese military in every factory in every city they hold on the mainland. The workers were told: Tell your grievances.

The workers talked. The secret police took notes.

Those workers talk no more.

Small Business in the Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, March 19 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject Small Business in the Defense Program by former Senator James M. Mead, now Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, which was broadcast from radio station WBNY, Buffalo, N. Y., on March 13, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In this grave international crisis with our liberties at stake, Americans are united in accepting a few basic ideas: First, that our essential freedoms, spiritual, political, and economic, are in jeopardy; second, that the preservation of these freedoms will demand the utmost use of our national skills and resources; and, third, that personal and group interests must be temporarily passed over wherever such interests are inconsistent with our maximum national effort.

As one who shares this common ground with you, I want to talk to you about the substantial contribution which small and independent business can make to the Nation's industrial mobilization program and about the danger—the avoidable danger—that small business may not be given the fullest opportunity to make this substantial contribution.

My experience in the Senate with the War Investigating and Small Business Committees tells me that our industrial mobilization for military purposes has a strong tendency to rely upon big companies more than upon small companies.

The situation does not spring from anyone's plan to bring about such results. It is the cumulative effect of many detailed decisions born from hurry and haste, and sometimes from the ill-considered self-interest shown by strategically placed large enterprises. It shows itself in a tendency toward greater concentration of economic power, in the accelerated growth of the Nation's largest corporations.

Industrial concentration is often promoted by the scarcities that accompany mobilization. Sellers are likely to serve their own larger customers first. Vertically integrated concerns are likely to serve themselves and their subsidiaries before serving their independent customers.

Such concentration may likewise be promoted by the Government's emergency procurement because some Government officials turn readily to large enterprises with established reputations, and because such large enterprises are much more familiar with Government specifications and with the procedures for awarding Government contracts.

It is again promoted by the need for secrecy in handling strategic knowledge, since secrecy is easiest to maintain if the knowledge is available only to a few persons in a few large key enterprises.

It is further promoted by the channeling of Government funds for research purposes into a few large research organizations.

It is finally promoted by the channeling of Government loans to a few large producers who can get materials and who have Government contracts.

I should also like it to be clearly understood that I am not criticizing large companies, nor their executives, for putting themselves at the service of the Government during an emergency. Their facilities and their know-how are indispensable. I am saying that because they are important, and because they are well-known and because the use of them offers obvious advantages to a Government that is necessarily in a hurry and does not want to take unnecessary risks, they tend to be used disproportionately. This disproportionate use ultimately weakens the country during the progress of emergency and creates a concentration which weakens the country's institutions after the emergency is over.

The other side of the picture is that small business tends to be underused. Such small business concerns are likely to be cut off first when goods are scarce. They are least likely to be able to accumulate inventories in anticipation of a shortage or to find alternative sources of supply. They experience unusual difficulty in adapting their operations to the use of substitute materials, since their research facilities are typically limited. Their financial resources are often unequal to the risk of rapidly expanding their capacity, and finally they find it hard to attract new investment capital or to secure adequate credit, either private or governmental. Unable to keep close watch over the development of defense orders and unable to bid on the larger contracts, they are handicapped in obtaining Government business. They find it difficult to obtain subcontracts because they cannot offer reciprocal subcontracts. In selling to the civilian market, they encounter difficulties when goods are scarce and consumer incomes are high. Buyers who are uncertain if they can get replacements are likely to prefer known brands of large concerns to the unknown brands of small concerns. Price controls are likely to eliminate the price differentials which have offset the relative lack of prestige of the small company's products. The drafting of personnel for military service is an inconvenience to the large company, it may be a disaster to the small one.

All of us have a common interest in counteracting these tendencies. Even the large business enterprise which, at first glance, obtains a differential advantage from its size has such a common interest. When small business is not adequately utilized, a large proportion of the country's total productive capacity is prevented from contributing to the country's economic strength. This was true in the last war. In 1943, for example, a survey of unused capacity among small plants was made by the Department of Commerce. It concluded that only 13 percent of the concerns studied were using their existing facilities fully; that half of the companies could increase their output if they obtained men and materials to do so; and that a third of them could increase their output even without additional men and materials.

This underuse of the small establishment was a corollary of an excessive concentration of Government contracts. From June 1940 to September 1944 51 percent of the prime contracts went to 33 corporations and more than 67 percent to 100 corporations. Even subcontracts went mostly to the larger concerns. A study of 252 of the Nation's largest corporations made by the Smaller War-plants Corporation in 1943 showed that these large firms sublet about 34 percent of the value of their prime contracts but that only a quarter of this amount went to subcontractors with less than 500 workers.

When we overload the industrial machine at one end and underload it at the other, the inevitable result is failure to produce as much and as fast as can be produced. That is what happened in World War II. This fact appeared clearly in the unfilled order backlogs that prevailed during the latter part of the recent World War. In March 1944, the unfilled orders of large plants in the metal products industries averaged nearly a year's full production, whereas those of small plants averaged barely more than 5 months full production. While it is true that only the large company and the large plant can produce certain types of heavy military equipment, this pattern of overuse of large business and underuse of small business was not limited to such cases. Relatively simple types of metal products showed the same pattern. For metal pails, small plants had backlogs of between 4 and 5 months and large plants between 9 and 10 months. There were many other similar instances in which either the Government or the civilian market or both went unduly short or waited an unduly long time because orders had been unduly concentrated in the large companies.

The easy way of organizing industrial mobilization so that it depends chiefly upon large enterprises is not at all the efficient way of getting full production. The small companies are an important part of our national capacity. Their output is a vital part of our national strength. An equal opportunity for small business to produce is essential if we are to use all our muscle.

Thus there is harmony rather than conflict between the immediate needs of industrial mobilization and the longer run needs of a free-enterprise economy. Competitive private enterprise is regarded by all of us as one of the fundamental expressions of our freedom and one of the fundamental supports as well. While we may differ among ourselves from time to time about whether a large company has acquired monopoly power that needs to be curbed, I think most of us agree that to keep private competitive enterprise we must preserve small business along with large business. We must avoid a long run trend toward even greater concentration of economic power.

We can mobilize the maximum resources of small business if we want to do it and if we take the necessary steps soon enough. I shall not attempt to offer a complete program for this purpose. I shall merely mention a few of the more obvious means by which it can be accomplished.

We should make, and keep up to date, a study of the idle capacity available in the United States, particularly that in the hands of small business. We should also study the idle manpower that is available, particularly in the smaller communities. In the light of these studies, we should review the distribution of Government procurement, of industrial subcontracts, and of order backlogs for the sake of shifting orders from the overused to the underused facilities and from localities where labor is short to localities where it is more plentiful. We should examine the size of inventories and revise allocations of scarce materials to avoid tying up such materials in congested establishments where their turn-over will be slow. We should avoid withholding such materials from small plants which could use idle facilities and idle labor if the materials were available.

We should set up special machinery for placing Government contracts directly with small enterprises. We should use that machinery also to assure so far as possible that the subcontracts placed by large concerns shall go to small enterprises. The Smaller War Plants Corporation performed such functions fairly well during the last world war.

We should make every effort to simplify Government purchasing specifications so that they correspond as nearly as possible to ordinary commercial specifications for similar goods.

We should encourage plant expansion by small enterprises as well as by large ones. We should take steps to make available to small concerns loans and tax amortization privileges comparable to those that are extended to large companies that undertake strategically desirable plant expansion. Wherever practical we should encourage plant expansion in dispersed small units capable of being built and operated by small companies.

We should make production methods and new techniques available to small companies as fully as possible. We should consider a policy of making research grants to small companies that have appropriate research facilities. We should consider requiring that new technology that has strategic value and has been financed by the Government be made available on reasonable terms without undue restrictions to small concerns that will use it for mobilization purposes.

Steps such as these require exercise of judgment day by day in many varying situations. The first essential is a policy determination that the facilities of small business shall be fully used. But such a policy is not automatic nor self-executing. The second essential, therefore, is a specific assignment to one or more appropriate agencies to see to it that the policy is carried out.

De Seversky Calls Bigger United States Force for Europe a Trap

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. O. K. ARMSTRONG

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include herewith the following brief significant article from the New York Journal-American of Sunday, March 11, by the eminent authority on air power, Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky:

DE SEVERSKY CALLS BIGGER UNITED STATES FORCE FOR EUROPE A TRAP

(By Maj. Alexander P. de Seversky, internationally famous airplane designer and aviation authority)

The great military debate in Congress has been steered into a blind alley of confusion. Somehow the false impression has been created that the problem is simply whether or not to send four additional American divisions to Europe.

The average American may be forgiven if he now thinks that this is the heart of the dispute. With two divisions already in Europe, he wonders, why all the quibbling about raising this contingent to six.

Unfortunately, this is a misleading statement of the issue. If it were merely a question of a few more divisions, even the congressional witnesses opposing the scheme, the writer included, would readily go along. There are no overwhelming objections to such a trifling expansion of the American ground quota.

But the real issue is far removed from this. The four divisions are only the beginning of a process that must ultimately suck millions of our young men into a European slaughterhouse, under conditions made to order for the Kremlin.

BASIC STRATEGY

What is at stake in the debate is the nature of basic American strategy. The decision to be made is whether our industrial potentials and limited manpower shall be channeled into old-style ground warfare, in which the enemy enjoys all the advantages—or invested in air strategy, in which we can attain clean-cut supremacy both in numbers and quality.

The arguments advanced in favor of more American troops for Europe have little relation to the real problem. Indeed, they have raised a smoke screen of irrelevancies behind which the strategic core of the issue has been hidden from public view.

BOOSTING MORALE

We are told, for instance, that four more divisions will boost European morale by demonstrating America's will to fight for freedom. But in the light of our sacrifices in Korea, the American declaration of a national emergency, our vastly expanded military budgets, why should our will to oppose aggression be in doubt?

I submit that any European who still doubts it will not be convinced by the arrival of a few more divisions. Stalin has, and for years must continue to have, overwhelming superiority on the ground. To suppose that America would not fight if he slaughtered two divisions, but only if he slaughtered six, makes no sense.

Behind the beguiling talk of "only a few more divisions" is the plan—already adopted by our high command without consulting Congress and the people—which is bound to degenerate into a showdown on the ground against the Soviet and satellite armies. Though billed as "balanced forces," that plan still looks upon air power as an auxiliary to soften the enemy at home and to provide "air artillery" support for our foot soldiers.

The tragic reality is that America is being committed to an outmoded and fallacious strategy, because it is the only kind our military mentors understand. Like the French generals who staked their country on the Maginot line after 1918, our generals are making the commitment in a spirit of patriotic devotion.

We have been assured that 3,500,000 men would be enough unless the world situation deteriorated sharply. Almost at once, however, Gen. J. Lawton Collins took the stand to announce that the figure would have to be expanded within 6 months. That's the tipoff. We are preparing to fight a new war with the methods of the last, although history proves that such "frozen thinking" is fatal. More and more millions will be funneled into the hopeless attempt to match Moscow's teeming manpower on the ground.

GROUND GENERAL

The very make-up of our high command makes such strategy inevitable. Secretary of Defense Marshall is a ground general. On June 21, 1943, he declared: "Your adversary may be hammered to his knees by bombing, but he will recover unless the knockout blow is delivered by the Army." The fact that Japan, having been knocked from the skies, surrendered with an army of 6,000,000 well-equipped men still intact, apparently made little impression on General Marshall. Only last week in his speech at Columbia University, before the Institute of Arts and Sciences, he said, "The experience of battle * * * points to the continued and decisive role of ground forces."

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Bradley, wrote last year that he is "convinced beyond any reasonable doubt" that "we shall once more be forced to gain the inevitable victory over our dead bodies—those of our soldiers on the ground." And the Chief of Staff of the Army, naturally, is no less sold on bayonet warfare. All of General Collins' statements revolve around his certainty that "the doughboy is the final answer."

OTHERS GO ALONG

The other two members of the high command, representing the Navy and the Air Force, are in a minority and, in the nature of a military body, bound to go along with the majority concepts. Thus while the dispute rages around irrelevant matters like those four divisions, the life-and-death issue of a correct strategy is shoved out of sight.

I am not accusing our leadership of some mischievous conspiracy. The conspiracy is of another kind—like that of a fond mother who believes that castor oil is a cure-all, and administers it to her child in ever larger doses, thinly disguised with orange juice. Her intentions are the best, but her child will die all the same if his abdominal pains are due to acute appendicitis.

We are being coaxed and threatened and argued into putting more and more of our resources and manhood into surface force, for the kind of war in which we cannot hope to win under modern conditions. Our leaders do not grasp the possibilities of air power geared to take control of the air clear around the globe, by passing the surface strength of the Soviets.

POPULATION FACTOR

The optimistic references to a population of 200 or 300 millions in the western bloc are meaningless. This represents potential troops—but the Soviet Union has huge and superbly equipped armies already in being, supported by tactical aviation as good as ours and much larger in quantity. It is childish to suppose that Moscow will allow us to create West European forces capable of crossing out her dominance of the continent, when it has the power to nip the enterprise in the bud. How an additional four divisions put into the inextricable trap will deter Soviet aggression defies explanation.

After the war, we threw away our gun. Soviet Russia held on to hers. Now we propose to stoop down and pick up the discarded weapon. Why should the Kremlin let us do this—unless we have a powerful deterrent force elsewhere to stop them from putting a bullet through our forehead?

DETERRENT FORCE

That deterrent force can only be American strategic air power, operating directly from our continent—from bases, that is to say, inaccessible to the Kremlin's land might and tactical air force. Only under this protection can European capacity for defense be revived.

But today our strategic air force does not have the magnitude to serve as a real deterrent. Though properly conceived, and armed with atom bombs, it is no more than a token force. It will remain only a token force as long as we persist in dividing our potential three ways for so-called balanced forces—instead of applying the major portion to air power on the common-sense basis that first things must come first. Only when such an American Air Force is in existence will European rearmament be at all possible.

Public Assistance Provisions of the Social Security Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM T. BYRNE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. BYRNE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and statement:

DEAR ———: No doubt you have been informed of the recent action of the New York State Legislature, which adopted a resolution concerning the application of certain parts of the Social Security Act to the public assistance program in the State of New York. Since copies of the resolution may have been forwarded to you, I think you will be interested in the enclosed comments, which are taken from a statement I issued to the press the day the resolution was adopted in Albany. If you would like to have any additional information on this matter, please do not hesitate to let me know.

With warm good wishes, I am,

Cordially and sincerely,

OSCAR R. EWING,
Administrator.

STATEMENT BY FEDERAL SECURITY ADMINISTRATOR ON PUBLIC ASSISTANCE PROVISIONS OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT, MARCH 9, 1951

The resolution adopted by the New York State Legislature claims that the Federal Security Agency has threatened to withhold funds from New York for aid to dependent children, old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to the disabled, unless the State acquiesced in two "arbitrary conditions."

The resolution alleges that one of these conditions "would mandate an inflexible State-wide standard of assistance requiring all persons receiving assistance under a welfare program to receive mechanically the same benefits in total disregard of individualized needs." The second condition, according to the resolution, would require the State "to depart from its long-established civil-service system and compel the adoption of special civil-service standards and procedures for employees dealing with Federal welfare programs or a general revision of our civil-service system."

The 1935 Social Security Act provided for Federal contributions to the States for needy people—under certain conditions. It provided that each State submit a State plan which had to be approved, originally by the Social Security Board and now by the Federal Security Administrator, as meeting the requirements of the Social Security Act. This State plan, the act says, "shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State, and if administered by them, be mandatory upon them." Furthermore, since 1940, the act requires that all such plans include "methods relating to the establishment and maintenance of personnel standards on a merit basis."

These are not arbitrary conditions dreamed up by me or anyone else in the Federal Security Agency. They are part of the law of the land. Congress wrote these essential provisions into the Social Security Act because it wanted to protect helpless needy persons from arbitrary and capricious action, and to make sure that they would receive humane and individual consideration wherever they live within a State.

Failure to adhere to these provisions has resulted in serious differences in the treatment of needy people throughout New York

State. People in various parts of the State receive shockingly disparate amounts of assistance in relation to their need. The law clearly calls for equitable treatment for persons in need; and persons in New York State have not been getting equitable treatment.

There has been failure on the part of local welfare districts to include basic items in the budgets of needy persons. There has been an alarming variation in the tests applied in determining who is entitled to assistance and who is not. Thus, in some welfare districts a person may be denied assistance if he has as much as $100 worth of personal property, while in a neighboring district a person may be granted assistance even though he has $1,500 or more of personal property. In my opinion, the Congress that passed the Social Security Act was out to prevent precisely this kind of discrimination.

We have not insisted on an "inflexible" standard that would require all persons to receive mechanically the same benefit without regard to individual need. Quite the contrary. What we have asked the State Department of Social Welfare to do is to establish a Statewide policy that would be simple, objective, and consistent, so that a person in need would know what he is entitled to, and would not have to depend on the whim of a local official.

The Federal Government asks for equality of treatment, not necessarily equality of dollar assistance. The Federal Government asks that New York see to it that people in equal need receive the money to secure the same standard of living. Obviously, the rent costs in a small town upstate will not be the same as in Manhattan. The equal standard requires that a needy person receive the money to purchase equivalent food, clothing, and shelter, wherever he lives within the State.

All of this is well known to the State Board of Social Welfare. As a matter of fact, since 1944 the board has paid lip service to the requirements of Federal law. In that year it issued an instruction to local districts calling for equitable treatment of persons in equal need; but this instruction was never enforced. On January 22, 1951, this board ratified an agreement which the chairman of the board and I had reached on December 29, 1950, relating to aid to the permanently and totally disabled. That agreement provides for inclusion in the State plan of assistance standards to assure equitable treatment for all needy persons.

Thus the State Board of Social Welfare recognizes that there is no basis for the accusations contained in the legislature's resolution and accordingly agrees to abide by the law of the land.

As to requirements for an adequate merit system in the administration of public assistance in New York, the Federal law is perfectly clear. Its intent is to have administration of public assistance in all States free from political pressures. The fact is that New York has some 900 welfare positions exempted from civil service—more than the number of such exempted positions in all other States put together. New York is the only State in the Union where county welfare directors are not under the merit system. Moreover, 55 deputy directors are also exempt, along with a large number of other miscellaneous jobs. This contradicts the express requirements of the Federal Security Act. The State Board of Social Welfare has now assured us that it will take any steps which may be necessary to correct any deficiencies in the carrying out of personnel standards on a merit basis in accordance with the Federal Social Security Act.

These facts reveal the inaccuracies and distortions of the resolutions better than any argumentation.

The Prince of Peace, by William Jennings Bryan

REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, today is the ninety-first anniversary of the birth of William Jennings Bryan, one of the greatest Christian leaders our country has ever produced. His lecture on the Prince of Peace is the greatest argument of its kind I have ever read or ever heard.

In this day and time when the enemies of Christianity are trying to wreck our civilization, I think it is a good time to bring to the attention of the American people the argument of this masterful man, who probably did more to promote Christianity throughout the world than any other lay leader of modern times.

Mr. Bryan's lecture reads as follows:

THE PRINCE OF PEACE

MR. BRYAN. I offer no apology for speaking upon a religious theme, for it is the most universal of all themes. If I addressed you upon the subject of law I might interest the lawyers; if I discussed the science of medicine I might interest the physicians; in like manner merchants might be interested in a talk on commerce, and farmers in a discussion on agriculture; but none of these subjects appeals to all. Even the science of government, though broader than any profession or occupation, does not embrace the whole sum of life, and those who think upon it differ so among themselves that I could not speak upon the subject so as to please a part without offending others. While to me the science of government is intensely absorbing, I recognize that the most important things in life lie outside of the realm of government and that more depends upon what the individual does for himself than upon what the government does or can do for him. Men can be miserable under the best government and they can be happy under the worst government.

Government affects but a part of the life which we live here and does not touch at all the life beyond, while religion touches the infinite circle of existence as well as the small arc of that circle which we spend on earth. No greater theme, therefore, can engage our attention.

Man is a religious being; the heart instinctively seeks for a God. Whether he worships on the banks of the Ganges, prays with his face upturned to the sun, kneels toward Mecca, or, regarding all space as a temple, communes with the Heavenly Father according to the Christian creed, man is essentially devout.

There are honest doubters whose sincerity we recognize and respect, but occasionally I find young men who think it smart to be skeptical; they talk as if it were an evidence of larger intelligence to scoff at creeds and refuse to connect themselves with churches. They call themselves "liberal," as if a Christian were narrow-minded. To these young men I desire to address myself.

Even some older people profess to regard religion as a superstition, pardonable in the ignorant, but unworthy of the educated—a mental state which one can and should outgrow. Those who hold this view look down with mild contempt upon such as give to religion a definite place in their thoughts and lives. They assume an intellectual superiority and often take little pains to conceal the assumption. Tolstoy administers to the "cultured crowd" (the words quoted are his) a severe rebuke when he declares that the religious sentiment rests not upon a superstitious fear of the invisible forces of nature, but upon man's consciousness of his finiteness amid an infinite universe and of his sinfulness; and this consciousness, the great philosopher adds, man can never outgrow. Tolstoy is right; man recognizes how limited are his own powers and how vast is the universe, and he leans upon the arm that is stronger than his. Man feels the weight of his sins and looks for One who is sinless.

Religion has been defined as the relation which man fixes between himself and his God, and morality as the outward manifestation of this relation. Every one, by the time he reaches maturity, has fixed some relation between himself and God, and no material change in this relation can take place without a revolution in the man, for this relation is the most potent influence that acts upon a human life.

Religion is the basis of morality in the individual and in the group of individuals. Materialists have attempted to build up a system of morality upon the basis of enlightened self-interest. They would have man figure out by mathematics that it pays him to abstain from wrongdoing; they would even inject an element of selfishness into altruism; but the moral system elaborated by the materialists has several defects. First, its virtues are borrowed from moral systems based upon religion; second, as it rests upon argument rather than upon authority, it does not appeal to the young, and by the time the young are able to follow their reason they have already become set in their ways. Our laws do not permit a young man to dispose of real estate until he is 21. Why this restraint? Because his reason is not mature; and yet a man's life is largely molded by the environment of his youth. Third, one never knows just how much of his decision is due to reason and how much is due to passion or to selfish interest. We recognize the bias of self-interest when we exclude from the jury every man, no matter how reasonable or upright he may be, who has a pecuniary interest in the result of the trial. And, fourth, one whose morality is based upon a nice calculation of benefits to be secured spends time figuring that he should spend in action. Those who keep a book account of their good deeds seldom do enough good to justify keeping books.

Morality is the power of endurance in man; and a religion which teaches personal responsibility to God gives strength to morality. There is a powerful restraining influence in the belief that an all-seeing eye scrutinizes every thought and word and act of the individual.

There is a wide difference between the man who is trying to conform to a standard of morality about him and the man who is endeavoring to make his life approximate to a divine standard. The former attempts to live up to the standard if it is above him and down to it if it is below him—and if he is doing right only when others are looking he is sure to find a time when he thinks he is unobserved, and then he takes a vacation and falls. One needs the inner strength which comes with the conscious presence of a personal God. If those who are thus fortified sometimes yield to temptation, how helpless and hopeless must those be who rely upon their own strength alone!

There are difficulties to be encountered in religion, but there are difficulties to be encountered everywhere. I passed through a period of skepticism when I was in college and I have been glad ever since that I became a member of the church before I left home for college, for it helped me during those trying days. The college days cover the dangerous period in the young man's life; it is when he is just coming into possession of his powers—when he feels stronger than he ever feels afterward and thinks he knows more than he ever does know.

It was at this period that I was confused by the different theories of creation. But I examined these theories and found that they all assumed something to begin with. The nebular hypothesis, for instance, assumes that matter and force existed—matter in particles infinitely fine and each particle separated from every other particle by space infinitely great. Beginning with this assumption, force working on matter—according to this hypothesis—creates a universe. Well, I have a right to assume, and I prefer to assume a Designer back of the design—a Creator back of creation; and no matter how long you draw out the process of creation, so long as God stands back of it, you cannot shake my faith in Jehovah. In Genesis it is written that, in the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth, and I can stand on that proposition until I find some theory of creation that goes further back than "the beginning."

I do not carry the doctrine of evolution as far as some do; I have not yet been able to convince myself that man is a lineal descendant of the lower animals. I do not mean to find fault with you if you want to accept it; all I mean to say is that while you may trace your ancestry back to the monkey if you find pleasure or pride in doing so, you shall not connect me with your family tree without more evidence than has yet been produced. It is true that man, in some physical qualities, resembles the beast, but man has a mind as well as a body and a soul as well as a mind. The mind is greater than the body and the soul is greater than the mind, and I object to having man's pedigree traced on one-third of him only—and that the lowest third. Fairbairn lays down a sound proposition when he says that it is not sufficient to explain man as an animal; it is necessary to explain man in history—and the Darwinian theory does not do this. The ape, according to this theory, is older than man, and yet he is still an ape, while man is the author of the marvelous civilization which we see about us.

One does not escape from mystery, however, by accepting this theory, for it does not explain the origin of life. When the follower of Darwin has traced the germ of life back to the lowest form in which it appears—and to follow him one must exercise more faith than religion calls for—he finds that scientists differ. Some believe that the first germ of life came from another planet and others hold that it was the result of spontaneous generation.

If I were compelled to accept one of these theories I would prefer the first, for if we can chase the germ of life off this planet and get it out into space we can guess the rest of the way and no one can contradict us; but if we accept the doctrine of spontaneous generation we cannot explain why spontaneous generation ceased to act after the first germ was created.

Go back as far as we may, we cannot escape from the creative act, and it is just as easy for me to believe that God created man as he is as to believe that, millions of years ago, He created a germ of life and endowed it with power to develop into all that we see today. But I object to the Darwinian theory until more conclusive proof is produced, because I fear we shall lose the consciousness of God's presence in our daily life, if we must assume that through all the ages no spiritual force has touched the life of man or shaped the destiny of nations. But there is another objection. The Darwinian theory represents man as reaching his present perfection by the operation of the law of hate—the merciless law by which the strong crowd out and kill off the weak. If this is the law of our development, then, if there is any logic that can bind the human mind, we shall turn backward toward the beast in proportion as we substitute the law of love. How can hatred be the law of development when nations have advanced in proportion as they have departed from that law and adopted the law of love?

But while I do not accept the Darwinian theory, I shall not quarrel with you about it; I only refer to it to remind you that it does not solve the mystery of life or explain human progress. I fear that some have accepted it in the hope of escaping from the miracle, but why should the miracle frighten us? It bothered me once, and I am inclined to think that it is one of the test questions with the Christian.

Christ cannot be separated from the miraculous; His birth, His ministrations and His resurrection, all involve the miraculous, and the change which His religion works in the human heart is a continuing miracle. Eliminate the miracles and Christ becomes merely a human being and His gospel is stripped of divine authority.

The miracle raises two questions: "Can God perform a miracle?" and, "Would He want to?" The first is easy to answer. A God who can make a world can do anything He wants to do with it. The power to perform miracles is necessarily implied in the power to create. But would God want to perform a miracle?—this is the question which has given most of the trouble. The more I have considered it the less inclined I am to answer in the negative. To say that God would not perform a miracle is to assume a more intimate knowledge of God's plans and purposes than I can claim to have. I will not deny that God does perform a miracle or may perform one merely because I do not know how or why He does it. The fact that we are constantly learning of the existence of new forces suggests the possibility that God may operate through forces yet unknown to us, and the mysteries with which we deal every day warn me that faith is as necessary as sight. Who would have credited a century ago the stories that are now told of the wonder-working electricity? For ages man had known the lightning, but only to fear it; now this invisible current is generated by a man-made machine, imprisoned in a man-made wire and made to do the bidding of man. We are even able to dispense with the wire and hurl words through space, and the X-ray has enabled us to look through substances which were supposed, until recently, to exclude all light. The miracle is not more mysterious than many of the things with which man now deals—it is simply different. The Immaculate Conception is not more mysterious than any other conception—it is simply unlike; nor is the resurrection of Christ more mysterious than the myriad resurrections which mark each annual seed-time.

It is sometimes said that God could not suspend one of His laws without stopping the universe, but do we not suspend or overcome the law of gravitation every day? Every time we move a foot or lift a weight, we temporarily interfere with the operation of the most universal of natural laws, and yet the world is not disturbed.

Science has taught us so many things that we are tempted to conclude that we know everything, but there is really a great unknown which is still unexplored, and that which we have learned ought to increase our reverence rather than our egotism. Science has disclosed some of the machinery of the universe, but science has not yet revealed to us the great secret—the secret of life. It is to be found in every blade of grass, in every insect, in every bird and in every animal, as well as in man. Six thousand years of recorded history, and yet we know no more about the secret of life than they knew in the beginning. We live, we plan; we have our hopes, our fears; and yet in a moment a change may come over any one of us and this body will become a mass of lifeless clay. What is it that, having, we live and, having not, we are as the clod? We know not; and yet the progress of the race and the civilization which we now behold are the work of men and women who have not solved the mystery of their own lives.

And our food, must we understand it before we eat it? If we refused to eat anything until we could understand the mystery of its growth, we should die of starvation. But mystery does not bother us in the dining room; it is only in the church that it is an obstacle.

I was eating a piece of watermelon some months ago and was struck with its beauty. I took some of the seeds and dried them and weighed them, and found that it would require some 5,000 seed to weigh a pound. And then I applied mathematics to that 40-pound melon. One of these seeds, put into the ground, when warmed by the sun and moistened by the rain, goes to work; it gathers from somewhere 200,000 times its own weight and, forcing this raw material through a tiny stem, constructs a watermelon. It covers the outside with a coating of green; inside of the green it puts a layer of white, and within the white a core of red, and all through the red it scatters seeds, each one capable of continuing the work of reproduction. Where did that little seed get its tremendous power? Where did it find its coloring matter? How did it collect its flavoring extract? How did it build a watermelon? Until you can explain a watermelon, do not be too sure that you can set limits to the power of the Almighty or say just what He would do or how He would do it. I cannot explain the watermelon, but I eat it and enjoy it.

Everything that grows tells a like story of infinite power. Why should I deny that a divine hand fed a multitude with a few loaves and fishes when I see hundreds of millions fed every year by a hand which converts the seeds scattered over the field into an abundant harvest? We know that food can be multiplied in a few months' time; shall we deny the power of the Creator to eliminate the element of time, when we have gone so far in eliminating the element of space?

But there is something even more wonderful still—the mysterious change that takes place in the human heart when the man begins to hate the things he loved and to love the things he hated—the marvelous transformation that takes place in the man who, before the change, would have sacrificed the world for his own advancement, but who, after the change, would give his life for a principle and esteem it a privilege to make sacrifice for his convictions. What greater miracle than this, that converts a selfish, self-centered human being into a center from which good influences flow out in every direction? And yet this miracle has been wrought in the heart of each one of us—or may be wrought—and we have seen it wrought in the hearts of those about us. No, living in the midst of mystery and miracles, I shall not allow either to deprive me of the benefits of the Christian religion.

Some of those who question the miracle also question the theory of atonement; they assert that it does not accord with their idea of justice for one to die for others. Let each one bear his own sins and the punishments due for them, they say. The doctrine of vicarious suffering is not a new one; it is as old as the race. That one should suffer for others is one of the most familiar principles, and we see the principle illustrated every day of our lives. Take the family, for instance; from the day the mother's first child is born, for twenty-five or thirty years they are scarcely out of her waking thoughts.

She sacrifices for them, she surrenders herself to them. Is it because she expects them to pay her back? Fortunate for the parent and fortunate for the child if the latter has an opportunity to repay in part the debt it owes. But no child can compensate a parent for a parent's care. In the course of nature the debt is paid, not to the parent, but to the next generation, each generation suffering and sacrificing for the one following.

Nor is this confined to the family. Every step in advance has been made possible by those who have been willing to sacrifice for posterity. Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of conscience and free government have all been won for the world by those who were willing to make sacrifices for their fellows. So well established is this doctrine that we do not regard any one as great unless he recognizes how unimportant his life is in comparison with the problems with which he deals.

I find proof that man was made in the image of his Creator in the fact that, throughout the centuries, man has been willing to die that blessings denied to him might be enjoyed by his children, his children's children and the world.

The seeming paradox: "He that saveth his life shall lose it and he that loseth his life for My sake shall find it," has an application wider than that usually given to it; it is an epitome of history. Those who live only for themselves live little lives, but those who give themselves for the advancement of things greater than themselves find a larger life than the one surrendered. Wendell Phillips gave expression to the same idea when he said: "How prudently most men sink into nameless graves, while now and then a few forget themselves into immortality."

Instead of being an unnatural plan, the plan of salvation is in perfect harmony with human nature as we understand it. Sacrifice is the language of love, and Christ, in suffering for the world, adopted the only means of reaching the heart, and this can be demonstrated not only by theory, but by experience, for the story of His life, His teachings, His sufferings, and His death has been translated into every language and everywhere it has touched the heart.

But if I were going to present an argument in favor of the divinity of Christ, I would not begin with miracles or mystery or theory of atonement. I would begin as Carnegie Simpson begins in his book entitled "The Fact of Christ." Commencing with the fact that Christ lived, he points out that one cannot contemplate this undisputed fact without feeling that in some way this fact is related to those now living. He says that one can read of Alexander, of Caesar, or of Napoleon, and not feel that it is a matter of personal concern; but that when one reads how Christ lived and how He died he feels that somehow there is a chord that stretches from that life to his. As he studies the character of Christ he becomes conscious of certain virtues which stand out in bold relief—purity, humility, a forgiving spirit, and an unfathomable love. The author is correct. Christ presents an example of purity in thought and life, and man, conscious of his own imperfections and grieved over his shortcomings, finds inspiration in One who was tempted in all points like as we are, and yet without sin. I am not sure but that we can find just here a way of determining whether one possesses the true spirit of a Christian. If he finds in the sinlessness of Christ an inspiration and a stimulus to greater effort and higher living, he is indeed a follower; if, on the other hand, he resents the reproof which the purity of Christ offers, he is likely to question the divinity of Christ in order to excuse himself for not being a follower.

Humility is a rare virtue. If one is rich he is apt to be proud of his riches; if he has distinguished ancestry, he is apt to be proud of his lineage; if he is well educated, he is apt to be proud of his learning. Some one has suggested that if one becomes humble he soon becomes proud of his humility. Christ, however, possessed of all power, was the very personification of humility.

The most difficult of all the virtues to cultivate is the forgiving spirit. Revenge seems to be natural to the human heart; to want to get even with an enemy is a common sin. It has even been popular to boast of vindictiveness; it was once inscribed on a monument to a hero that he had repaid both friends and enemies more than he had received. This was not the spirit of Christ. He taught forgiveness; and in that incomparable prayer which He left as a model for our petitions He made our willingness to forgive the measure by which we may claim forgiveness. He not only taught forgiveness, but He exemplified His teachings in His life. When those who persecuted Him brought Him to the most disgraceful of all deaths, His spirit of forgiveness rose above His suffering and He prayed, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

But love is the foundation of Christ's creed. The world had known love before; parents had loved children, and children parents; husband had loved wife, and wife husband; and friend had loved friend; but Jesus gave a new definiiton of love. His love was as boundless as the sea; its limits were so far-flung that even an enemy could not travel beyond it. Other teachers sought to regulate the lives of their followers by rule and formula, but Christ's plans was, first to purify the heart and then to leave love to direct the footsteps.

What conclusion is to be drawn from the life, the teachings and the depth of this historic figure? Reared in a carpenter shop; with no knowledge of literature, save Bible literature; with no acquaintance with philosophers living or with the writings of sages dead, this young man gathered disciples about him, promulgated a higher code of morals than the world had ever known before, and proclaimed Himself the Messiah. He taught and performed miracles for a few brief months and then was crucified; His disciples were scattered and many of them put to death; His claims were disputed, His resurrection denied and His followers persecuted, and yet from this beginning His religion has spread until millions take His name with reverence upon their lips and thousands have been willing to die rather than surrender the faith which he put into their hearts. How shall we account for Him? "What think ye of Christ?" It is easier to believe Him divine than to explain in any other way what He said and did and was. And I have greater faith even than before since I have visited the Orient and witnessed the successful contest which Christianity is waging against the religions and philosophers of the East.

I was thinking a few years ago of the Christmas which was then approaching and of Him in whose honor the day is celebrated. I recalled the message, Peace on earth, good will to men, and then my thoughts ran back to the prophecy uttered centuries before His birth, in which He was described as the Prince of Peace. To reinforce my memory I reread the prophecy and found immediately following a verse which I had forgotten—a verse which declares that of the increase of His peace and government there shall be no end, for, adds Isaiah, "He shall judge His people with justice and with judgment." Thinking of the prophecy, I have selected this theme that I may present some of the reasons which lead me to believe that Christ has fully earned the title, the Prince of Peace, and that in the years to come it will be more and more applied to Him. Faith in Him brings peace to the heart and His teachings, when applied, will bring peace between man and man. And if He can bring peace to each heart, and if His creed will bring peace throughout the earth, who will deny His right to be called the Prince of Peace?

All the world is in search of peace; every heart that ever beat has sought for peace, and many have been the methods employed to secure it. Some have thought to purchase it with riches, and they have labored to secure wealth, hoping to find peace when they were able to go where they pleased and buy what they liked. Of those who have endeavored to purchase peace with money, the large majority have failed to secure the money. But what has been the experience of those who have been successful in accumulating money? They all tell the same story—viz., that they spent the first half of their lives trying to get money from others and the last half trying to keep others from getting their money, and that they found peace in neither half. Some have even reached the point where they find difficulty in getting people to accept their money; and I know of no better indication of the ethical awakening in this country than the increasing tendency to scrutinize the methods of money making. A long step in advance will have been taken when religious, educational, and charitable institutions refuse to condone immoral methods in business and leave the possessor of ill-gotten gains to learn the loneliness of life when one prefers money to morals.

Some have sought peace in social distinction, but whether they have been within the charmed circle and fearful lest they might fall out, or outside and hopeful that they might get in, they have not found peace.

Some have thought—vain thought—to find peace in political prominence; but whether office comes by birth, as in monarchies, or by election, as in republics, it does not bring peace An office is conspicuous only when few can occupy it. Only when few in a generation can hope to enjoy an honor do we call it a great honor. I am glad that our Heavenly Father did not make the peace of the human heart depend upon the accumulation of wealth, or upon the securing of social or political distinction, for in either case but few could have enjoyed it, but when He made peace the reward of a conscience void of offense toward God and man, He put it within reach of all. The poor can secure it as easily as the rich, the social outcast as freely as the leader of society, and the humblest citizen equally with those who wield political power.

To those who have grown gray in the faith I need not speak of the peace to be found in the belief in an overruling providence. Christ taught that our lives are precious in the sight of God, and poets have taken up the theme and woven it into immortal verse. No uninspired writer has expressed the idea more beautifully than William Cullen Bryant in the Ode to a Waterfowl. After following the wanderings of the bird of passage as it seeks first its northern and then its southern home, he concludes:

"Thou'rt gone; the abyss of heaven
Hath swallowed up thy form, but on my heart
Deeply hath sunk the lesson thou hast given,
And shall not soon depart.

"He who, from zone to zone,
Guides through the boundless sky thy certain flight,
In the long way that I must tread alone,
Will lead my steps aright."

Christ promoted peace by giving us assurance that a line of communication can be established between the Father above and the child below. And who will measure the consolation that has been brought to troubled hearts by the hour of prayer?

And immortality. Who will estimate the peace which a belief in a future life has brought to the sorrowing? You may talk to the young about death ending all, for life is full and hope is strong, but preach not this doctrine to the mother who stands by the deathbed of her babe or to one who is within the shadow of a great affliction. When I was a young man I wrote to Colonel Ingersoll and asked him for his views on God and immortality. His secretary answered that the great infidel was not at home, but enclosed a copy of a speech which covered my question. I scanned it with eagerness and found that he had expressed himself about as follows: "I do not say that there is no God, I simply say I do not know. I do not say that there is no life beyond the grave, I simply say I do not know." And from that day to this I have not been able to understand how anyone could find pleasure in taking from any human heart a living faith and substituting therefor the cold and cheerless doctrine, "I do not know."

Christ gave us proof of immortality, and yet it would hardly seem necessary that one should rise from the dead to convince us that the grave is not the end. To every created thing God has given a tongue that proclaims a resurrection.

If the Father deigns to touch with divine power the cold and pulseless heart of the buried acorn and to make it burst forth from its prison walls, will He leave neglected in the earth the soul of man, made in the image of his Creator? If He stoops to give to the rosebush, whose withered blossoms float upon the autumn breeze, the sweet assurance of another springtime, will He refuse the words of hope to the sons of men when the frosts of winter come? If matter, mute and inanimate, though changed by the forces of nature into a multitude of forms, can never die, will the spirit of man suffer annihilation when it has paid a brief visit like a royal guest to this tenement of clay? No, I am as sure that there is another life as I am that I live today.

In Cairo I secured a few grains of wheat that had slumbered for more than 3,000 year in an Egyptian tomb. As I looked at them this thought came into my mind: If one of those grains had been planted on the banks of the Nile the year after it grew, and all its lineal descendants planted and replanted from that time until now, its progeny would today be sufficiently numerous to feed the teeming millions of the world. There is in the grain of wheat an invisible something which has power to discard the body that we see, and from earth and air fashion a new body so much like the old one that we cannot tell the one from the other. If this invisible germ of life in the grain of wheat can thus pass unimpaired through 3,000 resurrections, I shall not doubt that my soul has power to clothe itself with a body suited to its new existence when this earthly frame has crumbled into dust.

A belief in immortality not only consoles the individual, but it exerts a powerful influence in bringing peace between individuals. If one really thinks that man dies as the brute dies, he may yield to the temptation to do injustice to his neighbor when the circumstances are such as to promise security from detection. But if one really expects to meet again and live eternally with those whom he knows today, he is restrained from evil deeds by the fear of endless remorse. We do not know what rewards are in store for us or what punishments may be reserved, but if there were no other punishment it would be enough for one who deliberately and consciously wrongs another to have to live forever in the company of the person wronged and have his littleness and selfishness laid bare. I repeat, a belief in immortality must exert a powerful influence in establishing justice between men and thus laying the foundation for peace.

Again, Christ deserves to be called the Prince of Peace because He has given us a measure of greatness which promotes peace. When His disciples disputed among themselves as to which should be greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven, he rebuked them and said: "Let him who would be chiefest among you be the servant of all." Service is the measure of greatness; it always has been true; it is true today, and it always will be true, that he is greatest who does the most of good. And yet, what a revolution it will work in this old world when this standard becomes the standard of life. Nearly all of our controversies and combats arise from the fact that we are trying to get something from each other—there will be peace when our aim is to do something for each other. Our enmities and animosities arise from our efforts to get as much as possible out of the world—there will be peace when our endeavor is to put as much as possible into the world. Society will take an immeasurable step toward peace when it estimates a citizen by his output rather than by his income and gives the crown of its approval to the one who makes the largest contribution to the welfare of all. It is the glory of the Christian ideal that, while it is within sight of the weakest and the lowliest, it is yet so high that the best and the noblest are kept with their faces turned ever upward.

Christ has also led the way to peace by giving us a formula for the propagation of good. Not all of those who have really desired to do good have employed the Christian method—not all Christians even. In all the history of the human race but two methods have been employed. The first is the forcible method. A man has an idea which he thinks is good; he tells his neighbors about it and they do not like it. This makes him angry, and seizing a club, he attempts to make them like it. One trouble about this rule is that it works both ways; when a man starts out to compel his neighbors to think as he does, he generally finds them willing to accept the challenge, and they spend so much time in trying to coerce each other that they have no time left to be of service to each other.

The other is the Bible plan—be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good. And there is no other way of overcoming evil. I am not much of a farmer—I get more credit for my farming than I deserve, and my little farm receives more advertising than it is entitled to. But I am farmer enough to know that if I cut down weeds they will spring up again, and I know that if I plant something there which has more vitality than the weeds I shall not only get rid of the constant cutting, but have the benefit of the crop besides.

In order that there might be no mistake about His plan of propagating good, Christ went into detail and laid emphasis upon the value of example—"so live that others seeing your good works may be constrained to glorify your Father which is in heaven." There is no human influence so potent for good as that which goes out from an upright life. A sermon may be answered; the arguments presented in a speech may be disputed, but no one can answer a Christian life—it is the unanswerable argument in favor of our religion.

It may be a slow process—this conversion of the world by the silent influence of a noble example, but it is the only sure one, and the doctrine applies to nations as well as to individuals. The Gospel of the Prince of Peace gives us the only hope that the world has—and it is an increasing hope—of the substitution of reason for the arbitrament of force in the settlement of international disputes.

But Christ has given us a platform more fundamental than any political party has ever written. We are interested in platforms; we attend conventions, sometimes traveling long distances; we have wordy wars over the phraseology of various planks, and then we wage earnest campaigns to secure the endorsement of these platforms at the polls. But the platform given to the world by the Nazarene is more far-reaching and more comprehensive than any platform ever written by the convention of any party in any country. When He condensed into 1 commandment those of the 10 which relate to man's duty toward his fellows and enjoined upon us the rule, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," He presented a plan for the solution of all the problems that now vex society or may hereafter arise. Other remedies may palliate or postpone the day of settlement, but this is all-sufficient and the reconciliation which it effects is a permanent one.

If I were to attempt to apply this thought to various questions which are at issue I might be accused of entering the domain of partisan politics; but I may safely apply it to two great problems. First, let us consider the question of capital and labor. This is not a transient issue or a local one. It engages the attention of the people of all countries and has appeared in every age. The immediate need in this country is arbitration, for neither side of a controversy can be trusted to deal with absolute justice, if allowed undisputed control; but arbitration, like a court, is a last resort. It would be better if the relations between employer and employee were such as to make arbitration unnecessary. Just in proportion as men recognize their kinship to each other and deal with each other in the spirit of brotherhood will friendship and harmony be secured. Both employer and employee need to cultivate the spirit which follows from obedience to the great commandment.

The second problem to which I would apply this platform of peace is that which relates to the accumulation of wealth. We cannot much longer delay consideration of the ethics of money making. That many of the enormous fortunes which have been accumulated in the last quarter of a century are now held by men who have given to society no adequate service in return for the money secured is now generally recognized. While legislation can and should protect the public from predatory wealth, a more effective remedy will be found in the cultivation of a public opinion which will substitute a higher ideal than the one which tolerates the enjoyment of unearned gains. No man who really knows what brotherly love is will desire to take advantage of his neighbor, and the conscience when not seared will admonish against injustice. My faith in the future rests upon the belief that Christ's teachings are being more studied today than ever before, and that with this larger study will come an application of those teachings to the everyday life of the world. In former times men read that Christ came to bring life and immortality to light and placed the emphasis upon immortality; now they are studying Christ's relation to human life. In former years many thought to prepare themselves for future bliss by a life of seclusion here; now they are learning that they cannot follow in the footsteps of the Master unless they go about doing good. Christ declared that He came that we might have life and have it more abundantly. The world is learning that Christ came not to narrow life but to enlarge it—to fill it with purpose, earnestness, and happiness.

But this Prince of Peace promises not only peace, but strength. Some have thought His teachings fit only for the weak and the timid and unsuited to men of vigor, energy, and ambition. Nothing could be further from the truth. Only the man of faith can be courageous. Confident that he fights on the side of Jehovah, he doubts not the success of his cause. What matters it whether he shares in the shouts of triumph? If every word spoken in behalf of truth has its influence and every deed done for the right weighs in the final account, it is immaterial to the Christian whether his eyes behold victory or whether he dies in the midst of the conflict.

"Yea, though thou lie upon the dust,
When they who helped thee flee in fear,
Die full of hope and manly trust,
Like those who fell in battle here.

"Another hand thy sword shall wield,
Another hand the standard wave,
Till from the trumpet's mouth is pealed
The blast of triumph o'er thy grave."

Only those who believe attempt the seemingly impossible, and, by attempting, prove that one with God can chase a thousand and two can put ten thousand to flight. I can imagine that the early Christians who were carried into the arena to make a spectacle for those more savage than the beasts, were entreated by their doubting companions not to endanger their lives. But, kneeling in the center of the arena, they prayed and sang until they were devoured. How helpless they seemed and, measured by every human rule, how hopeless was their cause. And yet within a few decades the power which they invoked proved mightier than the legions of the emperor, and the faith in which they died was triumphant o'er all that land. It is said that those who went to mock at their sufferings returned asking themselves, "What is it that can enter into the heart of man and make him die as these die?" They were greater conquerors in their death than they could have been had they purchased life by a surrender of their faith.

What would have been the fate of the church if the early Christians had had as little faith as many of our Christians now have? And, on the other hand, if the Christians of today had the faith of the martyrs, how long would it be before the fulfillment of the prophecy that every knee shall bow and every tongue confess?

Our faith should be even stronger than the faith of those who lived 2,000 years ago, for we see our religion spreading and supplanting the philosophies and creeds of the Orient.

As the Christian grows older, he appreciates more and more the completeness with which Christ fills the requirements of the heart and, grateful for the peace which he enjoys and for the strength which he has received, he repeats the words of the great scholar, Sir William Jones:

"Before thy mystic altar, heavenly truth,
I kneel in manhood, as I knelt in youth,
Thus let me kneel, till this dull form decay,
And life's last shade be brightened by thy ray."

Snide Sniping

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD BOLLING
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Washington Post of March 15, 1951. This editorial discusses the ridiculous lengths to which some people in our country are willing to go today to place partisan politics above the unity which we need in this critical period in our Nation's history.

The editorial follows:

SNIDE SNIPING

Time must hang heavy on the hands of the Republican National Committee. That august body recently issued, as a formal press release, a compilation of President Truman's travels and absences from Washington during the past year, prepared by its research division at the request of Senator ARTHUR V. WATKINS, of Utah. Its evident intent is to suggest to feebleminded or incorrigibly crotchety readers that Mr. Truman has been leading a carefree, gadabout existence, oblivious of his responsibilities to the American people.

A study of this remarkable piece of research reveals that the President did, indeed, take numerous week-end cruises on the Potomac, leaving Washington as a rule at noon on Saturday and returning late Sunday afternoon—he even took off Memorial Day, which happened to fall on a Tuesday last year—and that he made several short visits to Independence, Mo., to see members of his family and to rest. Most Americans, we have no doubt, will feel unreservedly glad that the President of the United States has the simple mother wit to take an occasional respite from his enormously taxing job. Many may criticize the way Mr. Truman does the job, at least in some respects, but very few, we are sure, will consider him guilty of neglecting it.

The Presidency has become, especially in recent years, a grueling test of physical endurance. Its demands are so heavy that a mere mortal can bear them only if his physician and his family make him take reasonable care of his health and indulge in a reasonable amount of relaxation. In point of fact, he owes it to the people to do this, and the people ought to require it of him. Too often a foolish fear of popular criticism has led Presidents to drive themselves irrationally—and to the detriment of their duties. Consider, for instance, this illuminating entry in Colonel House's diary for January 31, 1917:

"Mrs. Wilson spoke of golf and asked whether I thought it would look badly if the President went on the links. I thought the American people would feel that he should not do anything at such a time. The President at last suggested that we play a game of pool—at which we elderly men were absurdly inadept."

We are glad that Mr. Truman seems to have a better opinion of the common sense of the American people. The Republican National Committee appears to take it for granted that this is a Nation of fools.

Labor Is Entitled to an Equal Voice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the following article from the March 10,1951, issue of the Illinois State Federation of Labor Weekly News Letter, entitled "Backs United Labor Rights":

BACKS UNITED LABOR RIGHTS

The Reverend George G. Higgins, assistant director, social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, said that the United Labor Policy Committee "is doing all of us great service in insisting upon the 'right to an equal voice'" in the administration of Defense Mobilization Czar Charles E. Wilson.

Commenting on united labor's position that big business is running the national defense mobilization to the detriment of all the people, the Reverend Higgins said in his weekly column:

"In terms of the present controversy in Washington it—labor--is merely asking for the right to have a say—the right to an equal voice—in the mobilization program which is being administered at the top level by Charles E. Wilson, former president of General Electric.

"'So far,' said the official spokesman for American labor on February 16, 'virtually the entire defense mobilization program has been entrusted to the hands of a few men recruited from big business who believe they have a monopoly on experience, good ideas, and patriotism.' The Wall Street Journal replied, in effect, that labor is trying to run the show and shouldn't be allowed to get away with it.

"More moderate observers have concluded, however, that labor is perfectly justified in asking for the right to have a say. We ourselves would go so far as to maintain that American labor, far from being out of order in making such a reasonable demand, is doing all of us a great service in insisting upon the right to an equal voice in Mr. Wilson's administration.

"It is doing us the inestimable service of safeguarding certain basic democratic values in a far-reaching governmental program which otherwise could very easily—and even innocently—become a top-heavy and rather arbitrary bureaucracy.

"Mr. Wilson and his top assistants—chosen for the most part from the ranks of big business—are undoubtedly very competent and very honest. But not even the Archangel Gabriel ought to be delegated to administer the defense mobilization program on his own, as it were, without the fullest possible assistance—and surveillance—of organized labor, management, and agriculture.

"Philip Murray and William Green, as the Wall Street Journal will most certainly agree, wouldn't be qualified to administer the program on their own without the cooperation of business and agriculture. By the same token, therefore, Mr. Wilson is not qualified to go it alone without the participation of labor, on a basis of full equality with big business, in the administration of the program."

The Tragedy of Seoul

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, during World War II capital cities were destroyed, ruined, and devastated like they never had been in previous history. Heading this list, and there is a question as to the order in which they should be listed, are the capital cities of Warsaw, Poland; Berlin, Germany; and Manila in the Philippines. Another capital city is now in this category; and as the Korean war continues, this capital will, no doubt, head the list of total destruction as far as capital cities are concerned. My reference, of course, is to the city of Seoul; and in this connection, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Washington Evening Star of Saturday, March 17, headed "The Tragedy of Seoul:"

THE TRAGEDY OF SEOUL

It is hard for Americans, in the security and comfort of their homes, to imagine what life in far away Seoul is like today. It is hard for war correspondents to put in words the tragedy of a city which twice has been captured by Communist armies and twice has been liberated by United Nations troops.

One might think that the failure twice in the past to hold the South Korean capital against Red hordes would have left the miserable people of desolate Seoul resentful and sullen. Surely their faith in the defenders of their families, their homes, and their city has been put to cruel test during the past terrible months. Death, pestilence, and destruction have besieged them in frightening forms by day and by night. Their dwellings and business houses have been destroyed by blast and flame, their loved ones slaughtered or maimed, their food supplies confiscated. Only 200,000 of the once-thriving population of 1,500,000 persons remain in the rubble of what is virtually a dead city.

Yet there was no bitterness evident when American troops once more entered Seoul yesterday. On the contrary, the welcome which the GI's received was pathetically emotional. Ragged urchins cheered and tagged along beside the soldiers. Tears coursed down the cheeks of emaciated women. Men eagerly questioned the troops about the size of the liberating force. One resident voiced the question in the minds of all when he asked: "Will you stay this time?"

The demonstration left no doubt as to which type of occupation the citizens of Seoul prefer. The siege and seizure of a city by any army constitute a dreadful ordeal for the inhabitants. But if there is to be any liberating done by anyone, Seoul has made it plain that she wants it done by MacArthur's men, not Mao's. As for the question raised about the duration of this liberation, Seoul may look to the future with more confidence than at any time in recent months. At least the American troops which marched into the ravaged city were confident that this time they had come to stay. There is a good chance that they are right.

Rice Can Be a War Weapon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under previous leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to submit an editorial from the Southwest Citizen, of Lake Charles, La., as follows:

RICE CAN BE A WAR WEAPON

Rice is important to more people than any food in the world. It is particularly vital in some of the world's worst trouble spots.

Ninety-five percent of the world's supply of rice is grown in the Asiatic countries. Some produce more than they need, others less. When every Asiatic rice farmer is producing and distribution channels are open, there is enough to go around.

But take Communist China. It is a deficit nation. There is not nearly enough rice to feed its people. If the conquest of Korea had been complete and quick, there is a possibility they might have received supplies from there, since Korea was a surplus producer of rice. As matters now stand, Korea will not have enough rice to supply its own needs.

General Mao thus faces more perils than the bullets of the United Nations troops. If he is not able to obtain the needed rice from some source, he will have a hungry people on his hands and hungry people are inclined to take desperate chances and to do desperate things.

Though the Communists may win occasional victories with arms while following orders of alien masters in Moscow, what will the Chinese people gain? They may come to ask this question and, as they do, the attractions of communism will grow fewer and their enthusiasm for foreign adventures in Korea, in Indochina, in Tibet, and India will grow proportionately less.

All because there is less rice, to us an ordinary item of diet.

Growers in the United States cannot of course hope to produce a sufficient amount to feed the hungry people of Asia. But if our farmers do succeed in producing another bumper crop, there may be enough surplus on hand to weigh heavily in a diplomatic trade. This is one reason why the 1951 crop, here, in Arkansas, Texas, and California may well have considerable significance in the current war we are fighting against communism.

Bradley: Big Man, Big Heart

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the following article on Gen. Omar Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which appeared in Parade in the Washington Post of March 18, 1951:

BRADLEY: BIG MAN, BIG HEART

WASHINGTON.—There's one 18-year-old secretary tucked away in a remote cubicle of the Pentagon here who'll never forget the day she met General Bradley.

She was just a little late for work—a minute or two after 8:30. She scooted up the steps at the impressive river entrance and was about to go in one of the big oaken doors when a tall man in uniform stepped up and held it open for her. She slipped through, and suddenly realized who the tall man was.

"Golly," she told her friends later, "it was General Bradley himself."

That's a typical story about Gen. Omar N. Bradley, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and boss of bosses in the Nation's Armed Forces. Bradley is a forceful, determined and proven leader, but at the same time he's a warm, unassuming man who looks more like the family doctor than a top military strategist. Says a friend of the General's: "He has a humility approaching that of the late Will Rogers."

MAN WITH THREE HATS

Bradley, 58 and balding, retains these qualities even though today he bears the responsibility for the Nation's entire Military Establishment—Navy and Air Force as well as his old alma mater, the Army. Right now, he wears these three "hats" which make him one of the half-dozen most influential military men in the world.

But Bradley's high station has not changed his feeling toward the GI.

"I give you my pledge," he says, "that no weapon can ever be so sensational and no situation so critical as to receive more consideration than the welfare of our fighting men."

Chances are that when his term expires next August as head of the Joint Chiefs, President Truman will refuse to let him step down.

He's a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Military Committee, a top group which lays down broad policy for General Eisenhower. He also belongs to the Committee's "Standing Group" of three which receives reports from and issues orders directly to General Ike.

Bradley has the plain spoken quality common to many Missourians. A tense Congressman asked him recently whether an invasion of Norway by 500,000 Russians would mean we'd have to send an expeditionary force to Norway. Bradley said laconically: "You would if you wanted to get those fellows out."

He takes the same basically reasonable view of the troubled world situation.

AMERICA IN A SMALLER WORLD

"The world has shrunk to such an extent," he says, "that we must be ready to defend ourselves on very short notice.

"This is a condition familiar to the nations of Europe, but it's new to us. Yet they have existed for centuries under it—and there's no reason why we shouldn't be able to do the same."

Interestingly, Bradley has turned writer, and his A Soldier's Story will be published in June (Henry Holt & Co.). In it will be Bradley's own estimate of the men he fought with in World War II, from United States private to British field marshal.

Ireland Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me over radio-television station WXEL at Cleveland, Ohio, March 17:

It is customary on an occasion like this to extol the past glories of Ireland. A St. Patrick's Day speaker is traditionally expected to recall the times when Ireland was the sole light of learning and culture shining in the Europe of the Dark Ages, to tell once again how her far-reaching missionaries brought Christianity and civilization back to people crushed by the barbarian invasions.

Or he may review the history of our own country and show how, from its very beginnings, men of Irish birth or descent have contributed to the military, political, cultural, and industrial life of the American Republic.

Tonight I propose to break with tradition and to take a look at the Ireland of our own times. This will not be a waste of time, for most people seem to know very little about modern Ireland. Indeed, to judge from stories that appear from time to time in the newspapers, any story about Ireland will be accepted at face value, provided it is queer enough or unfavorable enough. Let me give you one instance. Around Christmas of 1942, an American publisher returned from a trip to England and Ireland. In an interview he spoke of the "enormous German Legation in Dublin," implying that it was a hotbed of spies, tolerated by the Irish Government. In the first place this publisher did something that no one with any journalistic experience should ever have done; he fell for a trumped-up story that was 2½ years old. In the spring of 1940 the London Times had its Dublin correspondent look into the matter. He reported that there were about six or seven people in the German legation in Dublin. Secondly, this publisher did not ask himself how the enormous numbers could have gotten there. It would be possible, of course, to land spies from a submarine. But diplomatic personnel are a different matter. They have to come openly and to be known by the government admitting them. Now, from the beginning of the war, Ireland was cut off from direct contact with Europe. Diplomats could not have come except through Great Britain. This is just one example of the way some people will swallow any story about Ireland.

We are told, for instance, that Ireland sat out the war comfortably while other people were beating Hitler. This is not the place to go into a long discussion on Irish neutrality. Ireland, no doubt, was as fully entitled to be neutral as was Sweden or Switzerland. But Mr. Churchill himself, in a speech at the end of the war, paid tribute to the Irish who had served in the British armed forces and manned the British factories during the war. From Ireland came almost a quarter of a million people to the British munition factories and to her army, navy, and air force. Mr. Churchill's personal airplane pilot was an Irishman, Paddy Finucane. If we realize that the population of the Irish Republic is not quite 3,000,000, you will see that almost one-twelfth of its people served Britain during the war—not bad for a neutral country. If we apply the same proportions to the United States, we should have seen from ten to twelve million Americans streaming across the border into Canada to work or fight in the war effort.

But let us take a look at Ireland today. One of the big controversies in this country at the present moment revolves around private denominational schools. How does Ireland handle its school question? Ireland handles its primary schools by a combination of private initiative and state aid. It has some 5,000 primary schools attended by 450,000 children, of whom 97 percent are Catholics. The state gives grants toward the construction and maintenance of primary schools. The school manager is usually the local Catholic pastor or Protestant minister. No school may refuse a pupil entrance on grounds of religion.

No great trouble arises with the Catholic population. Since Protestants are few and scattered, they may have difficulty in founding and maintaining schools. But the state, in cases of proved hardship, stands ready to defray the whole cost of such schools; even to the extent of providing a school where an average of 10 pupils can be assured. If a particular Protestant group cannot show enough children to justify a school for them, the state will pay half the cost of transportation to the nearest Protestant school, if the number of pupils does not fall below five. All the non-Catholic denominations in the Irish Republic have repeatedly testified to the generosity with which this overwhelmingly Catholic state treats them. It is worth noting that while catholicism is the religion of the vast majority of the Irish, there is no state religion there.

It used to be said, before Ireland became independent, that the Irish were incapable of governing themselves. Let me point out that the present Irish Government, that of Mr. John Costello, is only the third since 1921. France, on the contrary, has had 10 governments since 1945, and now needs another new one. The allegedly stable-minded British have had nine prime ministers during the 30 years during which Ireland has had three. This was not due to any dictatorship in Ireland. On the contrary, there have been numerous fair and hard-fought elections.

The present Irish Government is a coalition, or as the Irish prefer to call it, an interparty government. When Mr. Costello took office in February of 1948, the wise ones said that he would never succeed in holding his cabinet together, since it represented very different parties. He is now 3 years in office, and his government shows no signs of disintegrating.

One of Ireland's biggest problems today is building up after the war. Ireland, of course, did not suffer any war destruction. But it was cut off from many sources of supply. Its industrial plant ran down. Its land needed fertilizers. Today the Irish Government is engaged on a land reconstruction project greater than any ever undertaken by a previous Irish Government. It is investing some £40,000,000 in the scheme, helped by Marshall plan aid. The ECA Administrator in Ireland has complimented the Irish Government on the constructive uses to which it has put its Marshall plan funds.

There is nothing paternalistic about the land scheme. The government offers help to the various farming communities in the way of machinery, fertilizer, seeds, and so forth. It is up to the communities themselves to take up the government's offer; millions of acres of farm land are being improved; millions of acres of submarginal land are being brought up to cultivation standards. A nation-wide scheme of reforestation is under way. Replacing on the Irish hills the extensive forests that once clothed them will prevent the flooding of lowlands by the run-off rain water—no small consideration in a country with a rainy climate like Ireland's.

Ireland has very little coal, but the Irish have under their feet, more than 3 centuries' supply of fuel in the form of peat, or turf. During the war, when coal supplies were almost completely cut off, the importance of turf became appreciated. In fact, some 5,000,000 tons of this fuel are used every year. Most of it, 80 percent or more, is dug by individual farmers. But the government maintains the turf board, which keeps up research in modern methods of winning turf, drying it, compressing it, and using the byproducts. Moreover, it is building three electric power stations adapted to be fired by turf. One of them is already in operation. There are also two hydroelectric stations—one on the river Shannon, built some 25 years ago, and a new one being built on the Erne. There will be a nice balance between water power and turf-fired power. In wet years the water-power will be abundant. In dry years, the water-power may run low, but the turf will be easer to dig and process.

The power from the electric stations is being spread as rapidly as possible into all parts of Ireland. Villages where once the only light was the oil lamp or candle and the only power the muscle power of the farmer and his wife and family are now lighted by electricity, and the farm work is done by electric motors.

Here again, the Irish Government encourages private initiative. A rural community must estimate its own needs, roughly of course, and make application to the electricity supply board to have the power lines brought in. The local officer of the board makes a more accurate survey. He can point out to overconservative farmers the advantages of electric power and its small cost. Then, if enough people want it to justify the cost and to show a reasonable income from the power used, the power lines come in.

In this, as in other things, the aim of the Irish Government is to help the people to help themselves.

It is well known, of course, that the Soviet veto has kept Ireland out the United Nations—that is to say out of the General Assembly and the Security Council. The United Nations is the poorer by that, for it could well profit by the high moral principles that Irish statesmen have shown in international relations. People may not remember that Mr. De Valera, when the Fascists invaded Abyssinia in 1935, warned the old League of Nations that this was its crucial test. If it allowed aggression against a small and defenseless country to go unpunished, its days were numbered. Mr. De Valera was not heeded. We had the Second World War, and the League is ingloriously gone.

But while excluded from United Nations membership, Ireland is cooperating with the United Nations in the ways that are open to it. Ireland is a member of many of the specialized agencies of the United Nations: For instance, the International Labor Office, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the World Health Organization, the International Civil Aviation Organization, the Universal Postal Union, and the International Telecommunications Union.

Ireland is also an active member of the Council of Europe. In fact Ireland's Foreign Minister, Mr. Sean MacBride is the liaison officer between the Council of Ministers and the Assembly of the Council of Europe.

One may ask, perhaps, why Ireland did not accept membership in the Atlantic Pact. Here one must step warily to avoid treading on some sensitive toes. But there are certain facts which should be known. Since the British Government holds part of northeastern Ireland, claiming it as British territory, the Irish Government says that to join the Atlantic Pact would mean that it was ratifying this forcible partition of Ireland, which it has never recognized. The pact pledges each member to guarantee the territorial integrity of all the others. And since Britain claims northeastern Ireland as British territory, the Irish Government would be put in the position of guaranteeing what it has always regarded as an unjust usurpation of Irish territory.

Now there is here much more than a mere boundary dispute. If the United States, for instance, had a boundary dispute with Canada, one might say that it was mainly a question of territory. On whichever side of the disputed boundary a man lived, he would find himself under a fair and democratic government. But in 1921 the British set up a northern government to govern the territory they claim in Ireland. Shortly after coming into existence, the northern government declared a state of emergency and passed a special powers act, suspending all the civil guarantees.

The emergency has now lasted 29 years. Let me quote you a couple of opinions from fairly unbiased sources on the northern government. In 1935 the British National Council for Civil Liberties—which included people like Lady Astor and the late Bernard Shaw and H. G. Wells—had an investigation made of the northern government. It reported:

"Through the use of the special powers, individual liberty is no longer protected by law, but is at the arbitrary disposition of the executive. This abrogation of law has been so practiced as to bring the freedoms of the subject into contempt."

Writing in the New York liberal weekly, the Nation, in August 1949, a former correspondent of the London Daily Herald, Griffin Barry, described the operation of the special powers:

"A person detained under these regulations is deprived of protections that have hedged the liberty of the subject in Britain for ages. He may be held indefinitely without being charged and without trial. He is allowed no visitors and no messages. He has no access to legal advice. A curious statute deals with the examination of witnesses by a resident magistrate. * * * A witness may not be accompanied to court by a legal adviser or friend and is specifically not excused from answering questions on the grounds that 'an answer may incriminate or tend to incriminate himself.' Refusal to answer is punishable by penal servitude up to 14 years."

These are no extracts from the code of laws in a Communist so-called Peoples Democracy. They are regulations made for Irishmen in Northern Island, by a government set up and supported from London. The Irish Government recognizes that one of the objects of the Atlantic Pact is to prevent the further spread of that kind of police state over Western Europe. It could not logically sign the Atlantic Pact, which would mean ratifying the existence of a police state in Northern Ireland.

The objection may be raised that in view of the great threats of communism the Irish should waive their quarrel with England over the northern territory. To be logical, one should also urge the British Government to abolish, or at least to reform, the northern government. But the British will not even discuss the northern government. One can understand that; the northern government simply cannot stand discussion. It would seem only reasonable to urge the British to be just, before urging the Irish to be generous. For the ultimate redress of this injustice, Ireland looks not to arms, for it is a nation dedicated to peaceful settlement of international questions, but to the pressure of enlightened world opinion, especially of American opinion. God speed the day when Ireland's hopes will be realized.

In our own country the Irish have shown themselves most appreciative of the character of our American democracy. While on a night like this they foregather to revive the memories of the old country, to recall its glories and its sorrows, its perennial smile and tear, yet they have given to this Republic their unstinted loyalty and devotion. Many thousands of them in the late war gave the last supreme unanswerable testimony of loyalty—their lives. The Irish in America never forget the land of their birth or of their ancestors. But theirs is no divided allegiance; their love of Ireland has never conflicted with their loyalty to the country that has become for them a second homeland. And Americans of all creeds and classes, from all nations of the world, join with them tonight in honoring their ancestral Emerald Isle and the saint who has won and held for 1,500 years every Irish heart.

Armed Forces Ceiling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER NORBLAD
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include herewith an editorial from the Portland (Oreg.) Oregonian on the subject of an Armed Forces ceiling:

ARMED FORCES CEILING

If the Nation is to have universal military training, or its immediate equivalent, selective service for 18-year-olds, we are thoroughly in accord with the Senate's determination to establish a ceiling on military manpower. The 3,500,000-man limit proposed by Senator WAYNE L. MORSE, of Oregon, would have been adequate. The Senate compromised on 4,000,000.

Military greed in the matter of building a huge standing army, navy and air force is insatiable. But a principal argument used in bringing universal military training in by the back door of the 18-year-old draft was that creation of a large reserve pool of young men with around 2 years of military training would make it unnecessary for the Nation to support a permanent, back-breaking load of millions of men in the regular forces.

The high command pleaded for an open end on military manpower on the basis of preparedness for a national emergency. Should such an emergency—which could only be war with Russia—occur, Congress would be ready to remove the limitation without argument. There is no greater danger of war with Russia today than there has been for several years—perhaps less. The 18-draft and its possible successor, UMT, will build up a vast reserve of trained soldiers, sailors, and airmen for employment in such an emergency.

Nothing would suit the Soviet purposes better than to have the United States plunge itself into an economic collapse because of an unbearable burden of taxes, restrictions on production, and inflation. This would end more quickly than anything else our power to help free nations and our leadership in resisting Communist aggression. An unnecessarily great military force in being would contribute to such a debacle.

In voting a limitation on military manpower, Congress will be taking the Truman administration at its word in the matter of limited contribution of troops to defend Western Europe and in not attempting to garrison the entire world. It will be recognizing the validity of the concept that American strength is geared to the technical superiority of our weapons, and not to mass movement of troops. It will impress on the generals and admirals the economic necessity of making the most of their manpower—and womanpower.

Congressional surrender to the brass on this point would be a mistake which in the course of time could change American life so drastically that we would have lost a war without fighting it. If the United States cannot make its case for freedom in the world with a military force of 4,000,000 men, it might as well, as ex-President Hoover proposed, withdraw to Fortress America and await the assault of its enemies.

Workers of America Contributed Most to Its Greatness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the following article appearing in the February 1951 issue of the International Chemical Worker, written by H. A. Bradley, international president of the International Chemical Workers Union, entitled "Let's Face It":

LET'S FACE IT

(By H. A. Bradley, international president, International Chemical Workers Union)

Mussolini, acting on the theory that the workers of Italy possessed only muscle and no capacity for thinking, deliberately created a program of confusion and distrust in government; and when the confusion was at its height, he seized the power of government and enslaved the Italian people, not just the workers but all of the Italian people.

Hitler was a copycat. He noted well the maneuvers of Il Duce but improved on his technique of confusing the people and even wrote a book on the subject in which he brazenly stated that if you tell a lie often enough, the lie eventually becomes accepted as a fact—and how he lied and how often. By adding a little arson and murder to his lies, he was able to create enough confusion so that he, too, became the slavemaster of not just the German workers but of all the German people.

We must retrace history briefly and again consider Mussolini. Where did he get his ideas? Well, he had been gazing with envy at the modern masters of slavery, the heads of the World Communist Party in Russia, who proclaimed that only the working people had the ability to use their brains and govern themselves; but these leaders acted always exactly the opposite way. More confusion. They were able to take advantage of the people by fully exploiting the greed and persecutions of stupid dictators who had preceded them.

Today here in the United States, we as a people and as a Nation face grave responsibilities. Our way of life and our freedom is at stake. Our resources are being destroyed and our sons are being killed; and in Washington are men who are doing their utmost to create confusion in the minds of the people and distrust in our Government—men who even now by their actions, if not their words, seem to feel that the workers of this country are incapable of exercising good judgment.

In the current crisis the workers have not been permitted one single spokesman in any capacity where the views, ability, and experience of the worker might be utilized for the full benefit of all the people. Why is this so? Why do some political leaders insist on bypassing the viewpoint and assistance of the largest segment of our population? Why do they insist that they and only they have any mental capacity? Why do they continually try to hamstring every effort of our Government to function normally and properly? Why do they always insist that only they, and no one else, know how things should be done? Why this continual attempt to confuse a nation and discredit its government? Why are they against everything they do not control?

Let's face it. Is an attempt under way to force history to repeat itself and add other names to the dictator's roster?

It seems high time that the people—all the people of this Nation, take a look under the covers and see what some of this is all about. Let us not become victims of confusion, let us not become unjust critics of our governmental processes and let us not forget that it was workers who made America great, not professional opportunists. And it was the town meeting that consolidated our views and our actions, not the secret huddle of a few grasping, professional politicians bent on having their way even at the price of American security and freedom.

Tom Dewey Gets on an Expensive Bandwagon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Frank C. Hannigan, in his supplement to Human Events entitled "Not Merely Gossip," calls attention to the testimony given by the New York Governor before the joint Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees of the Senate a few weeks ago. At that time he said that we should send 100 divisions to Europe. He did not say what the cost would be. I think Tom Dewey is on the wrong bandwagon. Mr. Hannigan points out in his issue of March 14 just what 100 divisions in Europe would cost the American taxpayer. Apparently Dewey does not care what the cost will be. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including the item on Governor Dewey at this point in the RECORD:

The New York Governor's demand—reiterated in his Lincoln Day address—for 100 divisions for Europe had a round-number impressiveness for the newspaper headlines. But GOP Members of Congress wonder if Dewey really understood the budgetary implications of what he was talking about. Would he have ventured to propose that over six and a half million American soldiers should be raised to defend Europe? Yet, that is the substance of his talk, whether he knew it or not.

According to military observers, this is how it is figured. On the basis of World War II experience—and obviously our command is planning to fight the next war on the basis of the last one—the military manpower necessary for 100 divisions would come to at least 6,700,000 men. It is true that we begin with a figure of 18,000 men to a division; but that is only combat troops. All the auxiliary services must be figured and the divisional slice is always far greater than the actual front-line soldiers, since it must include the demands of logistics. Next, the cost of one soldier per year, including pay, allowances, shelter, food, clothing, transport, etc., comes to an estimated $10,000. On the reasonable assumption that the Dewey 100-division army would be composed of 5 airborne, 25 armored and 70 infantry divisions, the cost of equipment alone is estimated at $25,000,000,000. In short, the Dewey program would cost $67,000,000,000 a year for the Armed Forces, plus an initial cost of $25,000,000,000 for equipment. It may be that these figures give the New York Governor no pause, but they do impress Members of Congress who participate in the great debate and who seek to raise the money for such military plans.

Democrats Clean Their Own House—Republicans Not So Zealous in Harding Administration — Maryland GOP Should Be Embarrassed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial from the East St. Louis (Ill.) Journal, of Thursday, March 15, 1951. It follows:

WHO DIGS IT UP

Two Senate investigating committees are writing into the record some unpleasant history of our times.

Senator ESTES KEFAUVER'S subcommittee is looking into the operations of syndicate crime and is finding evidence of a partnership between crime and some public officials sworn to uphold and enforce the law.

Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT'S subcommittee is digging out the details of the manner in which influence has been exerted in the granting of loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The findings of the Kefauver and Fulbright committees have been embarrassing to the Truman administration. The Kefauver committee findings have implicated various Democratic Party organizations.

The RFC investigation has reached into the White House "palace guard," the close advisers of the President.

Senators KEFAUVER and FULBRIGHT are Democrats. Neither has betrayed the least inclination to relax in investigative zeal, no matter if the chips fall for the most part on the Democratic side.

In that particular respect the Republicans, while enjoying the embarrassment of the Democrats, must remember that the scandals of the Harding administration were not unearthed by Republicans. The scandals were made known during a Republican administration, but the Senate committee chairmen and prosecutors were Senators Thomas J. Walsh and Burton K. Wheeler, both Democrats.

While Democrats may be embarrassed by the findings of the Kefauver and Fulbright committees, they do not mind at all the revelations being made by another Senate committee, an elections subcommittee headed by Senator MIKE MONRONEY. The matter in which Senator Millard Tydings, of Maryland, was defeated last fall deserves an airing, and if Republicans in and out of Maryland are embarrassed, they deserve to be.

Iranian Oil

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OREN HARRIS
OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, one of the most alarming developments is now underway which could very likely result in a most serious problem to this country and other free nations of the world. I am fearful these happenings in the Middle East are little noticed and I call to the attention of the House the implications so evident in this explosive Middle East area.

For 50 years or more, the British have controlled the Iranian oil fields. The greatest known reserves of oil in the world are in the Middle East. The richest single pool is undoubtedly in the oil fields of Iran. The Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. has the largest reserves in this huge outlay. It is principally British in which the British Government owns the controlling interest, approximately 52 percent.

Great Britain has nationalized its most important industry and embarked upon national socialism. Now they are faced with the proposition that threatens their fuel pipeline.

I have been watching recently the developments of the Iranian Government repudiating their long years of control over these oil fields and following the same policies to nationalize this operation in their country. This means, of course, the Government of Iran will take over this largest of oil companies operating in that country.

The implications would, of course, be immediate. From these fields tons of fuel go to the armies, navies, and air forces of this country, Great Britain, and other western powers. For years Russia has no doubt been striving to bring about this dissension and expropriation of these rich reserves. In any war between the West and Russia this certainly would be the grand prize.

Should this action stand, it is very likely the next move would be to take over the American companies and any other operating in that area under firm agreements.

This, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, would be far more serious than the expropriation by Mexico in 1938.

Today there appears an editorial in the Washington Post. It is a sad commentary but yet points up some of the views and circumstances surrounding this problem and emphasizes how far reaching it might be. Under unanimous consent, I include it with my remarks in the RECORD:

IRANIAN OIL

The Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. is a British concern in which the British Government owns a controlling interest. It is not only the largest industrial enterprise in Iran, but also the only successfully operating oil company in the country, providing about 15 percent of the Government's income in the form of royalties and taxes and more than 60 percent of its foreign-exchange receipts. More than a third of Britain's oil imports are shipped from Iran, and the company is the chief source of supply for the Royal Navy. Nevertheless, the company's relations with the Iranian Government have been unsatisfactory for a long time. The Iranians claim that their Government's income from company operations is too low; that information about its activities is inadequate; that too much foreign labor is employed; that oil distribution in Iran is not efficient; and that the educational, health, and housing needs of employees are neglected.

Efforts to revise the terms of the 60-year concession under which the company operates were started in 1948, but the Iranian Parliament—the Majilis—failed to ratify this supplementary agreement, and it was withdrawn at the end of 1950. Thereafter agitation for cancellation of the concession was intensified, and the Parliament recently voted to nationalize Anglo-Iranian. The British are largely to blame for the growing opposition that led to this crisis. For, although the supplementary agreement went part way toward meeting Iranian demands, it did not go far enough. Belatedly the British have notified the Premier of Iran that the company is prepared to discuss a proposal for an equal division of profits—a concession that should satisfy critics whose chief complaint has been that the profit-sharing arrangement is unduly favorable to the British.

Whether this tardy overture will repair the damage already done is an open question. Much depends on whether nationalist sentiment, reflected in Communist-inspired desires to emancipate Iran from dependence on foreign capital, is strong enough to outweigh the economic arguments against expropriation of British oil properties. Thinking Iranians surely know that without the aid of foreign capital and foreign know-how the income from the oil industry would dwindle and the government would be deprived of funds needed to finance developmental projects in this backward area. Obviously it is to the interest of both countries to extend the agreement.

The free world has a tremendous political stake in the outcome of this controversy. For if the Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. were nationalized, oil now sold to the western powers would no doubt eventually be diverted to Russia. Directly or indirectly, Russia would be able to gain access to one of the world's richest oil fields. As Philip Toynbee points out in an article in the New York Times magazine, Iran is a tempting prize for economic reasons but its "real and compelling attraction is its strategic position."

Even if the Senate passes the nationalization bill, as expected, and it is approved by the Shah, 2 months are allowed for study of proposals for taking over the properties. So there is still hope that a solution of the controversy can be found that will protect the interests of both the British and the Iranians and keep oil moving in the same channels as at present. If this hope should be frustrated Great Britain might feel compelled to move troops into Iran to protect her oil properties, which, she protests, the Iranian Government has no legal right to nationalize. In that case Russia would have an excuse for moving her troops across the northern frontier and a third world war might be touched off.

The Story of Wright Bryan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. DAVIS
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 19, 1951

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in the latest issue of the magazine, Dixie Business, Col. Hubert F. Lee, the editor, has written an article entitled "The Story of Wright Bryan." Mr. Bryan, the editor of the Atlanta Journal, is one of the youngest editors of any metropolitan newspaper in the Nation.

Colonel Lee's story describes the interesting career of this outstanding Atlantian, and, under leave previously granted, I insert this article herewith:

THE STORY OF WRIGHT BRYAN

(By Hubert F. Lee)

Wright Bryan, one of the South's foremost leaders, is at 46, one of the youngest editors of any metropolitan newspaper in the nation. He is a native Atlantian who not only has spent his entire life in the South but who has achieved a distinguished record of contributions to this region.

Mr. Bryan's philosophy is that no newspaper executive is worth a darn unless he likes to be a reporter. Even though he is now editor of the Atlanta Journal—a post in which he has served since August 1945—he constantly practices what he preaches by getting into action as a reporter whenever he has a chance. He is known to his associates on the Journal as an editor who would never assign a reporter to do a job he wouldn't be willing to undertake himself.

Wright Bryan was born in Atlanta on August 6, 1905, son of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Bryan. He graduated from Clemson College, where his distinguished father was editor of extension publications, with a B. S. degree and then attended the University of Missouri School of Journalism.

His first newspaper experience was as a reporter and sports editor on the Greenville (S. C.) Piedmont. He joined the staff of the Atlanta Journal in 1927 as a reporter, in which capacity he served until he was named city editor in 1935. In 1940, he was named managing editor, and 3 years later he had so ably demonstrated his talents that the title of associate editor was added to that of managing editor.

Mr. Bryan left his executive position in September 1942 to represent the Journal as war correspondent on the scene of action in England. Although slated to return to his post at the Journal at the end of 6 months, he asked permission to remain in the European theater of operations until D-day. And it was on D-day—June 6, 1944—that he scooped the world. And what a scoop.

He flew across the English Channel in a C–47 with the first group of planes to take American parachutists to French shores.

En route back to England, he wrote his account of the invasion, and at 3:15 a. m., Atlanta time, NBC headquarters in New York notified radio station WSB in Atlanta that Mr. Bryan would shortly be on the air—"the first man to come back from the invasion and report to the Nation by air." Wright Bryan was also an accredited correspondent for NBC.

High acclaim greeted the calm, though stirring account of the momentous events. Atlanta newspapermen, active and (like this writer, has been) inactive, were thrilled by both the big news but most because Wright Bryan was making newspaper and radio history.

President Roosevelt wired Wright Bryan his appreciation of the broadcast.

Secretary of War Stimson said the broadcast was his first news of the invasion. Mothers and fathers and sons and brothers and sisters of the men in uniform and all the Nation heard it with all the mixed emotions of wartime anxiety, hope, and prayer. It was truly a distinguished journalistic achievement.

Later on the same day, Mr. Bryan flew back across the Channel and filed an additional dispatch replete with details of the fighting.

Then, almost before he himself realized it, he was in Normandy, assigned at first to Canadian troops and a little later with the American First Army at the St. Lo breakthrough.

On September 12, 1944, he was captured by the German Army near Chaumont, France, and was sent to Oflg 64, a prisoner-of-war camp at Szubin, Poland, from which he was liberated by the Russians on January 21, 1945. He had been wounded in the leg, an injury that did not fully heal until some time after he had returned to Atlanta.

Under his editorship, the Atlanta Journal has maintained a consistently courageous editorial policy. It has never hesitated to speak out boldly for what it believed was right nor to condemn what it felt was evil. Its editorial columns are known throughout the country for the intellectual honesty of their content. The paper has long been a leader in fighting to better the economic condition of the South and its people and the awakening of a greater civic consciousness so essential to progress.

Editor Bryan has been active for years in both newspaper projects and civic work. He has served as chairman of the Georgia Press Institute and as secretary and, currently, vice president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

He has been particularly active in the American Red Cross and served as one of the three general chairmen in the Atlanta Red Cross drive in 1946. He was president of the Atlanta Social Service Index in 1943. Meanwhile, he has also found time to devote his energies to numerous other programs designed for community betterment.

When Dixie Business resumed after marking time during the war years, its fall 1945 issue reprinted what Wright Bryan wrote about the great need for Atlanta putting over the annual community and war fund drive. Our editorial note at that time said: "Our selection of the outstanding column published in a southern newspaper appeared in the September 7, 1945, issue of the Atlanta Journal. Wright Bryan, famed war correspondent and now editor of the Atlanta Journal, is an internationally famous writer. He knows from personal observation the good work done by the war agencies."

Mr. Bryan is a member of the Capital City Club, Piedmont Driving Club, Atlanta Rotary Club, and the Overseas Press Club of America. He is steward of the First Methodist Church.

On October 12, 1932, he was married to Ellen Hillyer Newell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred C. Newell, of Atlanta. He and Mrs. Bryan have three children, Ellen Newell, Mary Lane, and William Wright Bryan, Jr.

In addition to Mr. Bryan's duties as editor of a great metropolitan daily, he somehow manages to find time for frequent radio broadcasts, sometimes interpreting the news and sometimes interviewing important personalities over WSB's Views of the News program. He also is in constant demand as a speaker for a wide variety of functions.

Collective Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am including an informative article by Mr. Felix Morley, an outstanding writer, which appeared in Barron's a few weeks ago. This is a thought-provoking article and I commend it to the attention of all Members of this body:

COLLECTIVE SECURITY—ACTION TO THAT END IS FAVORED BY AMERICANS IF APPLIED CONSISTENTLY

(By Felix Morley)

Condemnation of Communist China as an aggressor, by the Assembly of the United Nations, is much more than a belated international recognition of an obvious fact. It is also an endorsement of what has long been a distinctively American principle.

For over 40 years American statesmen, regardless of party, have argued that the most effective way to prevent war is to make aggression unprofitable. Theodore Roosevelt advocated this as early as 1910. After the outbreak of World War I, the principle of collective action was pressed energetically by William H. Taft, father of the present Republican leader.

In a speech at Cleveland, on May 12, 1915, former President Taft laid down four fundamental provisions for a "league of peace." The last of these four points was that in the event of aggression by one government against another, following a refusal to arbitrate the dispute, "then the remaining members of the league agree to join in the forcible defense of the member thus prematurely attacked."

The origin of the quest for security by collective action is much older, and really early American. It was first voiced by William Penn, in his Essay Toward the Present and Future Peace of Europe, written shortly after the founding of Pennsylvania.

In this essay, Penn, although a Quaker, argued persuasively for the use of force against aggression. He suggested an annual general assembly of governmental delegates empowered to consider all international disputes "that cannot be made up by private embassies before the sessions begin." If arbitration were refused or rejected then, in Penn's own words:

"All the other sovereignties, united as one strength, shall compel the submission and performance of the sentence, with damages to the suffering party, and charges to the sovereignties that obliged their submission."

What American leadership is now trying to accomplish through the United Nations in Korea is precisely what William Penn advocated in 1688, and what William Howard Taft again advised in 1915.

It should also be recalled that even before President Taft publicly urged collective action, President Woodrow Wilson was thinking about it privately. Soon after the outbreak of war in Europe in 1914, Mr. Wilson wrote that, at the end of those hostilities, "all nations must be absorbed into some great association of nations whereby all shall guarantee the integrity of each, so that any one nation violating the agreement between all of them shall bring punishment on itself automatically."

From this reasoning the League of Nations evolved. In the upshot, though membership was strongly urged by many Americans, including the then youthful ROBERT A. TAFT, the United States did not join the League. But hostility to the theory of collective security was not the prevailing reason for that refusal.

The fundamental and logical American objection was to the joining of the League Covenant and the Versailles Treaty in a single document, so that the League was at the outset made an organization of victorious powers empowered to maintain a punitive status quo in their own behalf. Many people thought it a false start to apply the doctrine of collective action to secure a peace regarded as unjust.

The story of the failure of the League of Nations, handicapped from the beginning by United States abstention, needs no retelling. Its greatest procedural blunder, undoubtedly, was the effort to secure disarmament ahead of the preparation of machinery to enforce peace. Nevertheless, for all its mistakes and weakness, the League kept the idea of collective action alive. Indeed its final gesture, on Dec. 14, 1939, was to expel Russia from membership for refusing to accept mediation of the dispute leading to the Soviet war of aggression against Finland.

The United Nations, like the League of Nations before it, developed from a wartime alliance. Its actual origin was the declaration, signed in Washington on January 1, 1942, whereby 26 governments subscribed to the now forgotten Atlantic Charter and pledged themselves "not to make a separate armistice or peace with the enemies."

In a simultanous public statement, Secretary of State Cordell Hull emphasized the collective action aspect of the alliance. He called its declaration "a living proof that law-abiding and peacful nations can unite in using the sword when necessary to preserve liberty and justice and the fundamental values of mankind."

When the time came for writing the Charter of UN as a permanent organization, two major mistakes made in respect to the old League were avoided. The United Nations was set up without reference to any postwar settlements and without any special responsibility for enforcing such settlements when made. Furthermore, in 10 separate articles (41–50) the San Francisco Charter sought to set up definite enforcement machinery for use against aggression, which the Covenant of the League of Nations failed to do.

On the other hand, the Charter of UN made two wholly new mistakes, the less excusable because they were both identified by constructive critics before the San Francisco Conference, but were committed by the Department of State in defiance of the "more haste, less speed" adage.

One of these disastrous mistakes was the assumption, bitterly upset by events, that the five permanent members of the Council would always see eye to eye on everything. On this assumption each was given the veto power that Russia has used so lavishly. Furthermore, no provision whatever was made for the probability that a permanent member of the Council would itself sometime commit aggression. This blunder had been avoided by the League covenant, which successively defined Japan, Italy, and Russia as aggressors, even though not strong enough to take effective action.

The second major blunder of the present Charter was to put preeminent authority in the Security Council, where the veto operates, instead of in the Assembly, where action may be decided by a two-thirds vote. This stupidity contributed greatly to the delay in defining Communist China as an aggressor, and could indeed have prevented any United Nations action in Korea, except that last June Russia happened to be boycotting all UN meetings.

Moscow is not likely to be unrepresented on the Security Council at critical moments in future. And it is ironic to realize now that Russia cannot be expelled from the United Nations except on the recommendation of the Security Council—where Russia has unlimited veto privilege.

The United States still has faith in collective action against aggression. That is demonstrated both by the unending casualty lists from Korea and by the pertinacity with which, after long weeks of unhealthy recrimination, the administration has finally pushed through the UN Assembly a rather futile condemnation of the Chinese Communists.

But the history of both the League and the UN demonstrate that collective action cannot be made effective through an international parliament at its present stage of development. And for that reason the effort, as General Eisenhower is making plain, must be channeled through limited military alliances rather than through UN.

What is beyond the power of General Eisenhower to explain is why the State Department has throughout been disposed to throw potential allies to the wolves in Asia, while pouring out billions to sustain other allies in Europe. That is a strange and futile way to implement the popular will to resist aggression as such. It has created that debilitating confusion in public thinking for which the President and Secretary Acheson must take responsibility.

A Refugee From Nazi Persecution Gives His Views on Being Called Into Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, because I want my colleagues in the House to have the benefit of the clear thinking of a foreign-born youth who is about to be called into military service for the United States, I herewith insert in the RECORD one of the most splendid articles I have yet read on why it is necessary for America to rebuild her Armed Forces.

Charles L. Klotzer, author of this article, has been in the United States only 2 years. Of the Jewish faith, this young man was forced from his native Germany by Nazi persecution, his father having served in a concentration camp. Opposed as he is to force and violence of any nature, he quite naturally opposes war.

It is a refreshing thing to read young Klotzer's reasoning on his desire to answer his adopted country's call to military service despite his adversion to army life and his conscientious opposition to war.

Our country owes its greatness to the kind of stock Charles L. Klotzer comes from. Since the beginning of our Republic, from many nations of the world, strong, sincere, honest young men like this one have come to our shores seeking the peace and the freedom all men cherish and in return giving to our country a high type of citizenship that has made us the great Nation we are. These were the people who built our country—these were our forefathers.

I am glad that Charles Klotzer took the time to put into writing his thoughts as he leaves his position on the Troy (Ill.) Tribune, and his new-found home in that typical American community, to enter the service of his new country.

The article to which I have referred follows:

WHY I DO NOT REFUSE TO BE DRAFTED

(By Charles L. Klotzer)

Although I am neither a conscientious objector nor a pacifist, I am opposed to war. As I am opposed to war, and as the army is an instrument of war, I am consequently opposed to the army. Nevertheless, I will report for duty next Monday morning.

My princip l objection to army life is that it cancels various personal freedoms. In general, it interrupts the healthy life of a nation; in particular, it retards the normal development of youth. In its ultimate sense the purpose of an army is destructive, leading toward actual combat. Combat itself does not achieve any elimination of international conflicts, it only forces physical solutions. One country will have to obey the other, not that it wants to. More probably, future wars cannot be won at all, they will end because of mutual exhaustion.

In spite of these reasons I will obey the induction order. Am I simply afraid? Am I giving up my high-sounding principles?

When I say I oppose war, I may be misunderstood. A truly defensive war, a war to check aggression, a war to uphold the foundation of our way of life, is a war which one has to support. World War II, which temporarily reestablished the four freedoms in Europe, created something. It destroyed what was evil, nazism; it created what was good, freedom.

The defensive side of a war is the one which counts. We have no right to invade others and change their way of living. We would be as guilty as those who want to reshape our society by force. As long as our country does not become the aggressor and employs its forces maintaining what is morally right, it is my moral and legal obligation to support an army.

It is a legal obligation because the institution of the Armed Forces is a matter of law. When I refuse to obey these laws, I also cannot call upon them to protect me when I need them. American laws cover every phase of life and provide for security and progress. Only by upholding them ourselves can one ask others to abide by them as well.

A military force, especially the American Army, need not necessarily cause evil.

Armies can be a powerful factor for peace. I say that somewhat hesitantly, as history has yet to prove that increased armed force secures peace. So far the existence of armies led to their use—and the slaughtering of human beings. Due to my lack of knowledge of present international moves and motives I extend to my country the benefit of a doubt, hoping that force will restrain force.

The American Army has a very high standard of ethics. Its leadership has not thrown us into battle for spoils or for more territory. They are a positive force which has stood for what was considered right in the past.

With this background in mind and hoping for a continuation of such a policy, I cannot help but acknowledge that it reflects on everyone clothed in a soldier's outfit. Those in the service must learn a feeling of belongingness to something which under the right leadership will secure liberty and justice.

At the same time those at home must assure a wise leadership for these forces, so that their feeling of identification and pride will not be betrayed.

So far I have been talking about generalities in regard to war and the Army. At the present time, however, there are additional considerations. There is the international tension, the threat of a new war, and the need to strengthen defenses.

Pressure Groups

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 13, 1951

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from the Congress-at-work section of Senior Scholastic Magazine, February 14, 1951, written by Mr. Herbert L. Marx, Jr., under the title "Pressure Groups":

PRESSURE GROUPS—THOUSANDS OF LOBBYISTS TRY TO INFLUENCE OUR LEGISLATION

One of the major industries in the United States—oddly enough—is lobbying. According to one who should know (Chairman FRANK BUCHANAN, of the House Special Committee on Lobbying Activities), lobbying today is a billion-dollar business in this country.

In American political slang, a lobby has come to mean persons (or an organization) hired by private interests to exert pressure on Congress for the passage or defeat of certain legislation.

Originally the lobbies in the Capitol building were the places where people with special causes to plead would buttonhole their Congressmen. Most lobbying today no longer takes place in the Capitol lobbies. But the name has stuck, and the people who engage in lobbying are known as lobbyists.

It should be pointed out at the very outset that there is nothing illegal about lobbying. The first amendment to the Constitution guarantees to all citizens the right "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." A petition may be a written statement with many signatures affixed to it. Or it may be expressed through an organized movement.

Many lobbies serve a useful civic purpose in bringing out facts not generally known to the public or to the legislators. The information supplied by lobbyists at times helps Congress decide what corrective legislation is needed. The danger, however, lies in the tendency of some lobbyists to assume that the public welfare coincides with their own interests.

Lobbying has become such a powerful national institution that it is sometimes referred to, jestingly, as the third House of Congress. It takes 13 columns of the Washington, D. C., telephone directory to list the names of lobbyists. Representative BUCHANAN asserts that there are no fewer than 1,500 lobbying groups and 10,000 individual lobbyists. Many lobbyists work for large national organizations representing special groups such as business, labor, farmers, real-estate owners, veterans, doctors. And there are, of course, a multitude of reformers who organize drives to champion their pet reforms.

Most lobbies make no secret of their identity and what they stand for. They appeal directly to the public through radio, newspapers, magazines, advertising, pamphlets, and movies. They present their case before congressional committees. They work for the election of candidates friendly to their cause.

Some lobbies, however, operate under cover. They keep secret who they are and what they stand for. They privately organize campaigns to send letters and telegrams to Congressmen—to give the impression that large numbers of voters support their program. They try to spread their propaganda without indicating its source.

What are some of the better-known lobbies? One of the largest lobbies represents the American Medical Association. The AMA announced that it had spent $1,225,028 in the first 9 months of 1949 to fight President Truman's national health program. Other big spenders during 1949 were the United World Federalists ($220,599), the Townsend plan backers ($285,371), the Citizens Committee on Displaced Persons ($186,371), National Association of Manufacturers ($86,000). Labor unions spent a combined total of more than $200,000.

In order to keep lobbies under control and to regulate their activities, Congress passed in 1946 a special Lobbying Act. It requires the registration with the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate of organized groups and their representatives who seek to influence legislation. The agent is also required to file a quarterly report of his lobbying activities and expenditures. All contributions of more than $500 must be noted. Statements are made under oath, and maximum penalties of a $5,000 fine, a year in prison, or both, are provided for violation of the act.

Three lobbyists who refused to supply the required information were cited last year for contempt of Congress. They are Dr. Edward A. Rumely, executive secretary of the Committee for Constitutional Government; Joseph P. Kamp, executive vice chairman of the Constitutional Educational League; and William L. Patterson, national executive secretary of the Civil Rights Congress.

The House also set up its special Committee To Investigate Lobbying Activities. On October 21, the committee submitted its report. It revealed that 152 corporations had spent $32,124,800 between January 1, 1947, and June 1, 1950, on "activities relating to attempts to influence legislation."

The report was based on replies to questionnaires sent by the committee to 173 corporations. Of this number, 65 reported spending more than $2,000,000 in printing and distributing publications dealing with public issues; 31 reported spending $2,000,000 for advertising dealing with public issues; 21 firms refused to tell what they spent.

Chairman BUCHANAN did not, however, criticize the right of business firms to engage in lobbying. "I do not believe in curbing lobbying activity in any way," he said. "But I do believe in full disclosure. Influencing legislation is an activity that should be carried on in a goldfish bowl."

Commenting on the committee report, the New York Times declared in an editorial, "The nature of the pressure and who is paying for it ought always to be public knowledge. * * * If this can be done, lobbying can be part of the democratic process; if it can't, some new legislation may be required."

Mexican War Hide-Out for F. D. R. Rumors Persist

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NORRIS POULSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 5, 1951

Mr. POULSON. Mr. Speaker, here is a very interesting article by Mr. Ed Ainsworth of the Los Angeles Times about one of the mysteries of F. D. R.:

MEXICAN VILLAGE WAR HIDE-OUT BUILT FOR F. D. R., RUMORS INSIST—$6,000,000 FACILITIES IN REMOTE SPOT

(By Ed Ainsworth)

PUNTA PENASCO, SONORA, MEXICO, March 13.—Did the death of President Franklin D. Roosevelt on April 12, 1945, suppress the story of a multimillion-dollar war hideout for him in this remote Mexican fishing village?

The rumors are flying thick and fast here today.

They have been started anew by news dispatches from Washington speculating about possible hide-outs for President Truman and other top Government officials in the event of bombing of the capital.

IMPOSING PALACE

An imposing palace and an extensive airport and a handy harbor and a paved highway all figure in the conjectures here about the Roosevelt hiding place.

Estimates run in the neighborhood of $6,000,000 (American money) for the combined facilities built here about 1943.

The accepted version in Punta Penasco is that the "palacio" was built for a proposed meeting of President Roosevelt and President Avila Camacho of Mexico to discuss the projected Pan-American military highway down the west coast of Mexico.

READILY ACCESSIBLE

Persistent stories are circulating, however, that the real purpose of the extensive construction projects was to provide a hide-away accessible by all means of transportation—motor vehicle, warship, and airplane—for the personal safety of President Roosevelt.

The palacio which is the central structure in the fabric of rumors, is being operated now under lease by Americans as a tourist hotel. It is owned, according to information given out here, by the Mexican Government.

The fine, paved highway to this port runs about 60 miles from Sonoyta at the Mexican border. Sonoyta, a mere sleepy hamlet, is approximately 95 miles south of Gila Bend, Ariz.

SPORT-FISHING MECCA

Punta Penasco, fast becoming a sport-fishing mecca for southern Californians as well as an important shrimp center, is 550 miles from Los Angeles. The port—named

Rocky Point for the sheer headland that rises from its long, curving, white sand beaches—is on the northernmost portion of the Gulf of California, southeast of the delta of the Colorado River.

It does not even appear on many maps.

This isolation is reported to have been the determining factor in its selection for the hide-out.

It was on April 20, 1943, that President Roosevelt and President Avila Camacho met in a historic conference in Monterrey to discuss the war situation and Pan-American unity and defense.

OFFICIAL DISCLAIMERS

The presumption is that, later on, when the gravity of the war situation was even greater, the Punta Penasco hide-away was prepared as a sequel to the Monterrey meeting.

In Washington today, official disclaimers of any knowledge of the project came from various sources.

Steve Early, White House secretary under the Roosevelt administration, declared that the only precautions taken for spiriting President Roosevelt out of Washington were the construction of a tunnel out of the White House and the creation of the well-known Shangri-La retreat in Maryland.

The Mexican Embassy denied any knowledge of the project involving President Roosevelt.

NOTHING IN FILES

"It's not a fancy palacio, it's just a decent hotel, and now they wish they had built it bigger," one Embassy spokesman said.

The State Department couldn't locate anything in its files concerning the affair, according to the press section.

Comptroller General Warren's staff reviewed old accounts without coming up with anything tangible in the General Accounting Office.

Despite these blind alleys in Washington, the circumstantial evidence piled up here to bolster the account that is current throughout both Mexico and the United States—that the palacio was a hide-out.

INTERIOR ELABORATE

The palacio is an extremely well-constructed hewn stone and wood building, with many modernistic features.

It is known as the Hotel Cortez.

The interior is elaborately finished, with much paneling and fancy woodwork. A significant feature is that there is no transparent window in the main lounge on the side toward the sea—an obvious precaution for the President's safety, according to observers here.

The main apartment and kitchen are on a grand scale.

Operators of the hotel are Mr. and Mrs. Richard Hussong of southern California. They are reported to be subleasing from Senora Olodia Manriquez, a reputed kinswoman of former President Plutarco Elias Calles who in turn is said to lease from a Mr. Bermudas.

The builders are listed as Petroleos Mexicanos.

Visitors who have come to this port over the new road during the last few years have been enthusiastic over the sport fishing and the fine sandy beaches covered with beautiful sea shells.

The big airport on the edge of town is said to be capable of handling the largest planes. The airport is managed by Felipe Ulica, who welcomes an occasional small plane and some commercial ones, but who has not reported any presidents dropping in so far.

Some people say that a deep-water passage was dredged in deepest secrecy right up to the huge breakwater near the mysterious palacio, presumably to provide a channel for a warship in case the President needed to be brought in or evacuated in that manner. Nobody seems to be able to pin down this story, however.

Perhaps the puzzle will never be solved.

Washington officials say the financial accounts of the transaction might be buried forever in some obscure bookkeeping or Mexican loan item.

So Punta Penasco drowses here beside the blue water of the gulf, and sometimes the cries of the gulls circling the harbor are the only sounds heard.

The Hotel Cortez—otherwise known as the Roosevelt palacio—does a good business with tourists.

Who knows the full answer?

Perhaps we will learn manana.

Termination Dates for Education and Training Under Servicemen's Readjustment Act and Public Law 16

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting information contained in a fact sheet issued by the Veterans' Administration concerning termination dates for education and training under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act and Public Law 16. The information given in this sheet will be helpful to Members in answering inquiries from their constituents on this subject.

The material referred to follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION
INFORMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1951.

FACT SHEET—CUT-OFF DATE FOR GI BILL EDUCATION AND TRAINING AND TERMINATION DATES FOR GI BILL AND PUBLIC LAW 16 TRAINING

Ex-service men and women have been asking the Veterans' Administration questions about the approaching July 25, 1951, cut-off date for GI bill education and training. Many others have been asking about the termination dates of the GI bill and Public Law 16 programs.

This fact sheet provides the answers to questions most frequently asked.

WHEN IS THE CUT-OFF DATE?

The GI bill states that a veteran's course of education or training "shall be initiated not later than 4 years after either the date of his discharge or the termination of the present war, whichever is the later." Termination of the war for GI bill purposes was fixed at July 25, 1947, by Public Law 239, Eightieth Congress. Therefore:

1. Veterans discharged on or before July 25, 1947 (and this includes most World War II veterans), must begin GI bill training by July 25, 1951.

2. Veterans discharged after July 25, 1947, must start within 4 years from their date of discharge.

3. Veterans who enlisted or reenlisted under the Voluntary Recruitment Act (between October 6, 1945, and October 5, 1946) may count the entire period of their enlistment or reenlistment as war service for GI bill purposes. They must start training within 4 years from the end of their enlistment or reenlistment period.

IS THERE A CUT-OFF DATE FOR PUBLIC LAW 16 TRAINEES?

There is no cut-off date for starting courses under Public Law 16, the Vocational Rehabilitation Act for disabled veterans.

Disabled veterans may begin Public Law 16 training at any time after discharge, but in time to complete it by the wind-up of the program. The wind-up, for World War II veterans, is July 25, 1956. For veterans disabled after fighting started in Korea, the termination is 9 years from the end of the current emergency, a date yet to be established.

WHAT IS MEANT BY "INITIATING" TRAINING?

To initiate GI bill training by the cut-off date means actually to begin. It does not mean merely to make an application for training before the deadline, with the training itself to begin sometime afterward.

Veterans actually in training by cut-off time will be allowed to continue afterward. Veterans not in training by that date may not start afterward—though there are some exceptions.

A veteran who has started his course in time, and who has continued in it, will be considered to be in training, even though he has temporarily interrupted the course for the summer vacation or for other reasons beyond his control.

Example: A veteran enrolled in the fall of 1950 for a 2-year GI bill business course. His first school year ends in June 1951, at which time summer vacation begins. The July 25 cut-off date comes during his vacation. Yet, he will be permitted to resume his training for his second year starting in the fall of 1951.

POST-CUT-OFF DATE TRAINING

A veteran continuing a GI bill course after the cut-off date will be expected to pursue his training continuously until completion, except for conditions which normally would cause interruption by any student.

Once he completes or discontinues his GI bill course after the deadline, he may not start another course.

What is a course? VA has defined a course as a "curriculum, program of study or training or combination of subjects as are prescribed by the institution as constituting a course."

For a veteran studying engineering, for example, VA would consider his over-all program of engineering as his course. A single subject within his program, such as drafting, would not be a course in itself.

Changes of course after the cut-off date: Public Law 610, which permits a veteran to make a first change of general fields of study merely by applying for it, will not be in effect after the cut-off date.

Instead, a veteran will be permitted to change his educational objective only while in training and then for reasons satisfactory to VA.

Satisfactory reasons for change are these:

1. When a veteran is not making satisfactory progress in his present course and the failure is not due to his own misconduct, neglect, or lack of application.

2. When the course to which he desires to change is more in keeping with his aptitude, previous education, training, or other such pertinent facts.

3. When the course to which he wants to change is a normal progression from his current course, and will help him attain his educational or vocational objective.

No additional changes of course will be approved, except for the most cogent reasons.

By change of course, VA means a change in the over-all program of study.

The following do not constitute a change of course:

A change of one or more subjects within an elected curriculum or program; the dropping of a subject without replacing it with another; the adding of a subject; change in the sequence in which subjects are taken, or advancement from a basic or preparatory phase to an advanced phase of a course.

ARE THERE ANY SPECIAL RULINGS THAT APPLY IN SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES?

In several instances VA has made special rulings with respect to the GI bill cut-off date. The rulings have been necessary to apply the cut-off date to special circumstances.

All of VA's special rulings are consistent with the law and with VA's basic regulations on the training deadline.

Following are descriptions of the special instances:

RETURN TO ACTIVE MILITARY DUTY

Veterans who have started GI bill training and interrupt it to go back into active military or naval service will not be bound by the cut-off date.

Instead, they will be permitted to resume their training within a reasonable period following their release from active service, even though they get out after the cut-off date.

They will be subject to three requirements:

The conduct and progress in their GI bill courses must have been satisfactory; the period of training obtainable after they are released from service will be limited to their remaining GI bill entitlement, and they may not train beyond the termination of the GI bill program (July 25, 1956, for most veterans).

This cut-off date extension applies only to veterans who already had started training, and are prevented from continuing with their training by reason of their return to uniform.

Reason for the extension: VA's regulations state that a veteran actually must be in training on the cut-off date, except for an interruption for reasons beyond his control. Return to active duty, VA ruled, is such an interruption.

SERVICEMEN IN TRAINING

Many World War II veterans, now in active military service, have been taking GI bill training during their spare time.

If they are forced to interrupt their studies because of military duties or transfers, the GI bill cut-off date will not apply to them. Instead, they may resume their education within a reasonable period after their release from active duty.

In fact, when they do reenter GI bill training, they may change from the parttime courses they were taking while in uniform to fulltime studies in the same field.

These veteran-trainees also will be bound by the three requirements of satisfactory conduct and progress, training limited to remaining entitlement, and no training after the program's termination.

Reason for the extension: Here, too, VA has ruled that the interruption because of military duties or transfers is beyond the veterans' control.

CORRESPONDENCE COURSES

Veterans taking GI bill correspondence courses will not be permitted to switch to classroom courses after the cut-off date—even though the classroom training would be in the same field as the correspondence training.

They may, however, take more advanced work by correspondence if the advanced training is considered a normal progression toward their educational goal.

In some cases, correspondence courses are offered as supplements to residence training in schools or on-the-job. A college, for example, might make available a home-study course to supplement classroom studies. Or a course by mail might be offered as a supplement to apprenticeship or on-the-job training.

In cases like these, the basic course itself must have been initiated before the cut-off date, rather than the supplementary correspondence phase of the course.

A veteran planning to take GI bill job training, for instance, could not enroll in supplementary correspondence training now with the intention of beginning his basic job training after the cut-off date.

Reason for the ruling: VA deadline regulations state that once a veteran completes or discontinues a course after the cut-off date, he may not start another. Correspondence courses have been universally accepted as independent courses within themselves, and not as stepping-stones to resident study. Therefore, a veteran who finishes a correspondence course after the cut-off date could not, under VA's regulations, start a classroom course.

The regulations also state that a veteran may advance from a basic or preparatory phase to an advanced phase of a course. Hence, a veteran may take more advanced work by correspondence after the cut-off date.

MEDICAL, DENTAL, AND OSTEOPATH TRAINING

Veterans who complete premedical, predental, or preosteopath training under the GI bill but haven't yet gained admittance to medical, dental, or osteopath schools, will be permitted to start their advanced training in such schools whenever an accredited school, wherever located, has room for them—even if it is after the cut-off date.

The veterans must establish the fact that they applied for admission each year after completing their GI bill preliminary training.

This special provision applies regardless of whether a veteran's preliminary training ended before or after the cut-off date.

Reason for the extension: Under VA regulations, a veteran must be in training on the cut-off date, except for reasons beyond his control.

The period between completion of premedical, predental, or preosteopath training and the date of acceptance by an accredited medical, dental, or osteopath school will be considered by VA as a period of interruption for a reason beyond the veteran's control.

TEACHERS IN TRAINING

Veteran-teachers who take GI bill courses during succeeding summer vacations may continue to do so after the cut-off date.

They will have to meet certain qualifications. Their study must lead toward a degree; they must be continuously employed as a school teacher the rest of the year, and they may not skip any GI bill summer sessions.

Reason for the ruling: VA regulations require that a veteran be in continuous training after the cut-off date, except for reasons which normally would cause interruptions by any student.

Summer training by teachers for the purpose of obtaining a degree is a long-recognized practice of the profession. Because of the veteran-teacher's unique position, VA will consider him to be in continuous pursuit of his course—within the meaning of the regulations—so long as he takes courses each summer with the objective of getting a degree, and continues to be employed as a teacher each succeeding year.

UNDERGRADUATE TO GRADUATE TRAINING

Veterans who finish GI bill undergraduate courses and intend to go ahead with graduate training which would start after the cut-off date may do so, if they file an application for their advanced training sometime before they complete their undergraduate work.

They must meet these two requirements:

They must start their additional training at the end of their summer vacation period, and the graduate course must be a normal progression of previous studies.

A veteran who receive his bachelor of arts degree in languages in June 1951, for example, could start work on his master's degree—also in languages—in September 1951, if he applied to VA in time.

This ruling also applies to those who finish undergraduate studies after the cut-off date, and wish to continue advanced studies at the end of the vacation period.

Reason for the ruling: VA regulations state that a veteran must be in training on the cut-off date, except for reasons beyond his control such as summer vacations. They also state that a veteran may progress from a basic or preparatory phase to an advanced phase of a course.

A veteran who completes undergraduate studies and applies for graduate work in time is considered to have met both provisions of the regulations.

WHEN DOES THE GI BILL PROGRAM END?

The law states that no GI bill education or training shall be afforded beyond 9 years after the termination of the present war.

Termination date of the war, for GI bill purposes, was July 25, 1947. Hence, the GI bill program comes to an end on July 25, 1956.

There is one exception. Veterans who enlisted or reenlisted under the Voluntary Recruitment Act (between October 6, 1945, and October 5, 1946) have 9 years from the end of that enlistment or reenlistment period in which to wind up GI bill training.

WHEN DOES THE PUBLIC LAW 16 PROGRAM END?

There are two termination dates for disabled veterans training under Public Law 16.

World War II veterans with disabilities incurred in or aggravated by service between September 16, 1940, and July 25, 1947, have until July 25, 1956, to complete Public Law 16 training.

Veterans disabled while on active duty on or after June 27, 1950, have 9 years from the end of the current emergency in which to finish training under Public Law 16.

To be eligible for the training, veterans in the second category must have disabilities resulting from conditions under which VA pays compensation at full wartime rates.

Assistance for Wives of Servicemen

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the increasing number of young men being called in the Armed Forces there is developing a situation calling for the attention of the Congress.

Many of the prospective mothers—wives of members of the Armed Forces—find it impossible to meet the increasing costs of prenatal and postnatal care and the expenses connected with childbirth.

Everything reasonable and possible should be done by the Congress to relieve these young mothers of this worry and unnecessary hardship.

For this reason, I am introducing today the following bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That the wife of any member of the Armed Forces of the United States who on or after the date of the enactment of this act incurs expenses in connection with childbirth (including expenses of prenatal and postnatal care), and for whom the payment of such expenses is found to constitute undue financial hardship, shall upon application be entitled to receive, in payment or reimbursement of such expenses, such amount not exceeding $100 as may be necessary to alleviate such financial hardship.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force shall, in accordance with regulations jointly prescribed by them, make payment or reimbursement of such expenses to each person who is entitled thereto under the first section of this act.

Toronto Stock Frauds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith one of a series of articles now being published in the St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Times exposing a group of stock promoters in Canada who transact a mail-order solicitation of American investors.

The article follows:

(By Richard S. Lewis)

TORONTO, ONTARIO.—When Cardigan Securities, Ltd., solicited stock sales in St. Louis last fall by mail and telephone, it told prospects it was offering them stock in Mensilvo Mines, Ltd., as a special favor to win confidence.

It did not tell them that Cardigan and its president, Horace Nelson Switzer, made 400 percent profit on every share of stock purchased, the United States Securities and Exchange Commission investigation showed.

The SEC found that the price charged by Cardigan Securities is an arbitrarily established public offering price made to hundreds of persons whose names were selected at random for mass mailing.

Mensilvo is a cobalt-silver promotion and its property is located in the cobalt area of northern Ontario. The SEC found that the promoter's statement the mine represented a safe and sound investment, sure to make money for the investor, had no basis. Instead, the promotion was—and is—highly speculative.

Cardigan also represented that money from the sale of stock would go into the Mensilvo treasury to develop the property. Actually, the SEC reported, only a small amount reaches the treasury.

"The 400 percent mark-up is divided among the promoters, vendors, optionees, underwriters, dealers, and salesmen," the SEC said.

The SEC also labeled as false Cardigan's representation that arrangements had been made to list Mensilvo stock on the Toronto Stock Exchange and that dividends would soon be declared. There was no basis for dividends, the SEC said.

Cardigan and its president, Switzer, "are conducting a scheme for obtaining money through the mails by means of false and fraudulent pretenses, representations and promises," said United States Trial Examiner James C. Haynes, Jr.

Fraud order No. 42671 was accordingly issued against this company's promoter, Cardigan Securities and Switzer, March 10, 1950.

Also, the irrepressible Switzer has been promoting Crangold Mines, Ltd., in St. Louis and vicinity. Not long ago, a St. Louis grocer bought 1,000 shares at 18 cents a share, paying Switzer $180.

According to the authoritative Canadian Mines Handbook of 1950, Crangold Mines, Ltd., has been inactive since a geophysical survey was made of the property in Senneville township, northwestern Quebec, in 1949.

Not long after he purchased the Crangold stock, the grocer was contacted by the broker-dealer and asked if he wanted to buy some more. The stock had gone up to 36 cents a share, doubled in value, he was told.

Like Mensilvo, the history of Crangold goes back about five years, during which neither property showed any particular promise.

In the case of Crangold, the records of the Ontario Securities Commission show that the stock Cardigan sold to the St. Louis grocer for 18 cents actually cost 5 cents and that the shares offered for 36 cents actually cost the promoter 7 and 7½ cents.

The promotion of Crangold and Mensilvo in St. Louis was attended not only by the usual flurry of promotional pamphlets and dodgers, but also by an impressive array of tabloid-sized newspapers pretending to be objective journals of the mining industry.

For example, the grocer received a publication entitled "East-West Commentary—Pulse of Canadian Markets," issued by John F. Burgess & Co., another licensed broker-dealer, listed at the same address as Cardigan, but in a different room.

This was shortly before last Christmas and Burgess got into the spirit of the season with the message: "Only 15 full trading days till Xmas."

Another publication which arrived at the grocer's store was Harold A. Prescott's "Mining Broadcaster."

"Our motto," said Prescott lightly, "is investigate before investing." Elsewhere in the Broadcaster Prescott's prints another motto: "Mighty oaks from little acorns Grow."

The little acorns are then described in a publication which the grocer also received called The Canadian Mining Reporter and Investment Counsellor.

Its headline was: "Make magnetic survey on Crangold" in big black type. This news seemed to be a bit old. The survey had been made in 1949 and nothing had come of it.

This publication also exploited a promotion called Marwood Mining Corp., Ltd., which it found to be a red-hot possibility.

Marwood attracted the attention of the SEC and United States Post Office, who called it a fraud.

United States Trial Examiner Haynes issued fraud order 42720 on March 17, 1950, against Cambridge Securities, Ltd. (a licensed broker-dealer) for promoting Marwood.

Cambridge's propaganda was so worded, the post office found, as to give suckers the impression that everyone should feel fortunate indeed to play a part in the development of Marwood.

The literature failed to mention, however, the fact that some of the properties Marwood intends to develop were actually producing ore in 1941–42, but not at a profitable rate and were abandoned.

Marwood is a triple threat deal. It has gold prospects in the Lightning River area of Northern Ontario and on Outpost Island of the Great Slave Lake in Northwestern Ontario. It has uranium prospects in northwestern Ontario, too, and interest in oil lands in the Maidstone area of the Lloydminster field of western Canada.

"Your opportunity," cries the Marwood promotion letters, "With three chances * * * Gold! uranium! oil!"

Marwood's claims that each of its properties is located near established gold, uranium and oil producers are so much hokum, the SEC investigation found.

"The vicious nature of this illegal promotion," said the SEC report, "can best be shown by the fact that shares of Marwood Mining Corp., Ltd., are being taken down (purchased wholesale) by the underwriter on a 'best effort' basis—that is, by option without a firm commitment, at from 10 to 15 cents per share and are being sold by the above fraudulent misrepresentations by mail into the United States at 60 cents per share."

A Chicago sucker told the SEC he bought 500 shares of Marwood at 60 cents a throw. The shares cost Cambridge 10 cents. The promoter made $250 net on one $300 stock sale.

Another promoter of Marwood, the United States Post Office found, was one W. A. Smith operating under a fictitious name as National Securities.

The postal fictitious name order No. 41077, issued July 25, 1949, also covered G. H. Corolis, operating under the name of Wellington Securities and promoting Camrose Gold & Metals, Ltd.; E. A. Manning, as Union Securities, soliciting in Dalo Oil Co., Ltd., Palermo Gold Mines, Ltd., and Karraka Gold Mines, Ltd.

George Edgar Mallen, operating as Gordon-Daly Co., selling Minoil Exploration, Ltd., and Meg Petroleum Dealers, Ltd.; and Harold George Graham and Steven Boleslav Roman, operating as Mitchell & Mitchell, selling Concord Mines, Ltd.

Trial Examiner Haynes described these enterprises as "unlawful businesses which are being conducted under fictitious names through the United States mails" despite the fact that the promoters were warned to stop selling in the United States.

But with 400-percent profits on sales of stock alone, irrespective of whether gold, silver, cobalt, uranium or what not is found, the promoters are not likely to let the United States SEC or Post Office slow them down.

Here in Toronto, the promoters can get away with it, too.

Hammond, Ind., and Rent Decontrol

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House of Representatives extended the rent-control legislation for 3 months.

A number of cities that have decontrolled are now clamoring for recontrol, but are helpless under the present law. When I spoke on rent extension yesterday I mentioned about the housing and rental crisis in the Calumet industrial region of Indiana.

The following telegram which I received this morning from Councilman John E. O'Donnell, of Hammond, Ind., reveals the unfortunate position the tenants of Hammond, Ind., are in today. I am receiving numerous protests from Hammond every day.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY J. MADDEN,
Congressman, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR RAY: At a meeting of the Hammond City Council held February 19 an ordinance was passed calling on Tighe Woods to decontrol rent in the city of Hammond. The mayor signed the ordinance on February 24 and it was transmtted to Washington same as approved by the Housing Expediter under date of March 2. Since that time I have received numerous complaints that rentals have been increased from 15 percent to as much as 100 percent. In a 42-apartment building at 48 Waltham Street the tenants have all been notified that the rent will be increased from 40 to 63 percent. Please advise what action can be taken by the city to reestablish rent controls in Hammond.

P. S.—I did not vote for decontrol. Wire return reply via Western Union collect.

Councilman JOHN E. O'DONNELL.

The Hammond City Council, with the approval of its mayor, voted to decontrol on February 24, 1951.

I am including the telegrams which I have received this morning from citizens of Hammond, protesting the rent gouging which has been brought about by reason of decontrol:

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Congressman RAY J. MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.:

Rent decontrolled. Landlords hog wild. We are at their mercy. Can anything be done? Please help us if possible.

CARROLL SUMMNER.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY J. MADDEN,
Congressman from Indiana, Washington, D. C.:

Since rent controls were removed in Hammond our rent, 1½-room apartment, has been increased 50 percent. Unfair.

Mr. and Mrs. BERNARD HOPPE.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY J. MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.:

Since rent decontrol in Hammond I have had my rent increased 58½ percent. This is certainly unjust. I demand Federal action on rent control.

MARGARET MAXWELL.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY J. MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.:

Decontrol of rent in Hammond has raised my rent from $47.50 to $75, which I consider exorbitant.

ESTHER DUSKIN.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY J. MADDEN,
Congressman from Indiana, Washington, D. C.:

Since rent decontrol our rent for 1½ rooms has increased from $50 to $75. My salary has increased 10 percent. What is to be done?

CHANDOS T. RAGON.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY J. MADDEN,
Congressman from Indiana, Washington, D. C.:

Since rent decontrol in Hammond our rent has been increased 50 percent for one and a half room apartment. Something should be done immediately.

JOSEPHINE MABREY.
LAVON BUDD.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.:

My rent has increased 60 percent since Hammond decontrol. Federal action for rent control urgently requested.

MAX MASON.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Congressman RAY J. MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Rents increased 40 percent since rents have been decontrolled. Landlords hungry and going hog wild. Give us your immediate assistance.

Mr. WILLIAM BRUCE.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY J. MADDEN,
Congressman from Indiana, Washington, D. C.:

Wish to protest rent raise of 40 percent since recent decontrol of rent in Hammond, Ind. Believe raise absolutely unreasonable and request new Federal controls.

ARTHUR C. SMITH.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.:

My rent has been increased 56 percent since decontrol in Hammond. Federal action to reestablish rent control is urgent.

ADDIE FAY DUGG.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.:

My basement apartment rent has been increased 75 percent since Hammond decontrolled rent. Federal action requested.

MAE WHITE.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY MADDEN,
Congress from Indiana, Washington, D. C.:

Since rent decontrol has gone into effect in Hammond, Ind., my rent has been increased from $55 to $77.50. Seems unfair. Please investigate.

Respectfully,
Mr. and Mrs. HOWARD RIPLEY.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. RAY MADDEN,
Congressman from Indiana, Washington, D. C.:

Since rent decontrol has gone into effect in Hammond, Ind., my rent has been increased from $42.50 for basement apartment to $70. Please check if legal.

Respectfully,
Mrs. JENNIE L. NEELAND,
Widow.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. Congressman RAY MADDEN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

I beseech you to act at once regarding unfair rentals. My rent is to jump 65 percent first of next month. Now I ask you in God's name, is that fair? Look to you for urgent help.

LUTHER DUES.

HAMMOND, IND., March 20, 1951.
Hon. R. J. MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.:

Although agreeable to reasonable rent increases, have been subject to 40-percent increase as result of Hammond decontrol. Justly demand immediate action against such unfair practice.

Mr. and Mrs. T. R. BLOCKER.

Hon. Robert Lee Doughton, of North Carolina

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD D. COOLEY
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, on last Wednesday evening, March 14, in the Virginia Dare room of the Sir Walter Hotel, in the city of Raleigh, the North Carolina Citizens Association conferred its distinguished service award upon our beloved colleague, ROBERT LEE DOUGHTON. The parchment, upon which appropriate language was written, was presented by North Carolina's very able and distinguished Lieutenant Governor, Hon. Hoyt Patrick Taylor. In presenting the award, Governor Taylor said:

In 1903, almost half a century ago, a successful farmer and stock raiser from one of the mountain counties in what was then North Carolina's lost province was appointed a member of the State board of agriculture. His sound counsel and hard work for agriculture, at a time when the State's farm resources were comparatively small, merited successive appointment to the board until his election to the State senate in 1908 removed him from the eligible list. The following year the State government authorities asked him to take over the direction of the State prison, a position held until 1911, when the people of this mountain district first sent ROBERT LEE DOUGHTON to Congress.

Since that date, 40 years ago, "Farmer BOB" DOUGHTON, as he is affectionately known by the people of his congressional district, has been returned to Washington regularly every 2 years. Most of the time his opposition has not been serious.

Forty years ago ROBERT LEE DOUGHTON, as a freshman Member of the House of Representatives, began his preparation for national leadership during two World Wars, the intervening peace, and the present global crisis, when the free world this Nation represents is fighting the encroaching enslavement of the world to communistic dictatorship.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee and chairman of this committee for a longer period of time than any other man in the Nation's history, ROBERT LEE DOUGHTON has carried the burden of initiating the tax legislation that financed the United States during years when every ideal for which our colonial forefathers fought was at stake. How ably this man from Alleghany County's mountains has borne this heavy responsibility is recognized by everyone who knows anything about American history of the past half century. The name of this Alleghany County farmer is known all over America. Though not a lawyer he is an authority in the most complex field of legal practice—taxation. Though never an active banker, save as director of the system of county banks, he helped to establish to serve northwestern North Carolina, his advice is sought and respected by Treasury officials and financiers whose contacts are world-wide. Though a lover of the peaceful pursuits of a farmer and stock raiser, he has helped finance the Nation's two world wars, and now, at a time of life when most men think they have run their race, he is so busy in formulating the Nation's fiscal policies for our defense against threatened dangers, that he came to Raleigh tonight on borrowed time. Though his independent nature and unbounded energy have never given him time to think of old-age security or retirement, he piloted through the National Congress the laws that make old age somewhat more secure for millions of Americans.

In all of those varied activities ROBERT LEE DOUGHTON has ben guided by those rock-ribbed principles of diligence, honesty, and a steadfast belief in the American ideal of individual initiative and responsibility he learned from his mountain ancestors.

When officials of the North Carolina Citizens Association asked me to perform this very pleasant task tonight, they said they were going to honor a distinguished citizen. I believe I am going to be bold enough to disagree with that version of this happy event. The Citizens Association is not honoring you, Congressman DOUGHTON. You are honoring the association. This State-wide organization of representative citizens from all over North Carolina is merely giving public recognition to honors you have earned through 50 years of public service. Personally, I consider it a great privilege and a high honor to be the instrument through which the North Carolina Citizens Association tonight awards ROBERT LEE DOUGHTON this parchment in recognition of his distinguished public service to his community, his State, his Nation, and the world. May you continue to live and serve for many more fruitful years and never get old enough to retire.

Mr. Speaker, ROBERT LEE DOUGHTON is not only a beloved citizen, but he is a statesman in the truest sense and meaning of that word. He is never influenced by petty prejudices nor blinded by fond partialities. With courage and fidelity he performs all of the duties of his high position in a manner compatible with all of the fine traditions of American statesmanship. BOB DOUGHTON understands the problems of our day and generation, and he appreciates the importance of the strength of our Nation in the world in which we live. He has seen other nations go down the primrose path of paternalism, and he wants no part of such a program. He has seen the currencies of other countries collapse and the high principles of people perish under the onslaughts of inflation. He understands, perhaps better than any other man in public life today, the great importance of protecting and preserving the financial stability of this, the greatest nation in all the earth.

In the golden hour of his great life, yet with the spirit of youth, he is carrying a burden which is greater than he has ever carried before, but in magnificent fashion he is bearing the great load. BOB DOUGHTON is the most distinguished living North Carolinian and one of the greatest Americans living today. There are no inconsistencies in his life; his character is constant. By the eloquence of his actions, the exalted nobility of his soul, and the simplicity of his life he has endeared himself to all who know him. As a colleague and as one who has enjoyed his friendship, I am glad to join with other North Carolinians in doing honor to one who by his life has exemplified all of the fine virtues and tender sensibilities of true American statesmanship.

Mr. Charles A. Reap, editor of the Albemarle Enterprise, wrote a very appropriate editorial about our colleague, the text of which follows:

CONGRESSMAN ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Few men in American history have ever served our Nation so long or ably as Congressman DOUGHTON from this district. As a lad in teens we recall going with father and others to hear him speak when he first ran for Congress in 1910. He was introduced as "Farmer BOB," and has ever carried that friendly name for the farmers. He has always been a farmer at heart and a true friend to the farmers. We recall his efforts in behalf of the farmers in the depths of the depression when he said it was almost necessary for farmers in his mountain counties to hire a lawyer to help them give away cattle.

As a public official Mr. DOUGHTON has acquired and merited the fullest confidence of the American people in all walks of life from the small farmer to the biggest business. During the early part of the war when we were assigned to make an economic study of household appliances we were sent to a number of the largest offices in New York City. While on this mission we were in the manager's office of Macy's in New York, the largest store in the world. There on the wall of the manager's office hung the picture of our own Congressman, R. L. DOUGHTON. The manager spoke very highly of Mr. DOUGHTON's ability and efforts in working out America's tax problems.

Possibly no man in American history has ever given so much time, effort and study to our never ending tax problems as has Mr. DOUGHTON. As long-time member and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee the burden has been on his massive shoulders, and he has worked early and late as he did on his farm toward an equitable tax policy. He has often stated that he was not satisfied with his own efforts in this problematic field, but has ever striven to do the best he could. He has been in Congress since 1910 and this has been his chief burden, hence no man in public office has ever carried such tax burdens for forty years.

Congressman DOUGHTON has labored diligently in Congress to aid America through two World Wars. He is now laboring again in an emergency that the world fears will lead to another world war. This is why so many people urge him to enter the race again this year when he wanted to retire to his Alleghany farms. It is fortunate that his age is little handicap to his health and vigor for he can doubtless still do more work by force of habit than the average younger man will do in a shorter workweek. From a nonpartisan viewpoint people have high regard for Mr. DOUGHTON's ability, honesty and integrity. We hope to see him returned to Congress from this district with the largest vote of confidence from each county he has ever received.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

OUR HOPES FOR PEACE

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, during this Easter season it is natural for our thoughts to turn to peace.

A few days ago I received a letter which expresses very well the longing for peace which is uppermost in all our minds today. The lady who wrote me said she felt that we, as a Christian people, must exert greater efforts of love and compassion for our neighbors, our friends and other nations—and she asked me if there was not something I could give her to do, to help bring peace. To quote, she said:

> I stand ready from this day forward to give every minute of time I can find to work for peace and true democracy.

I have many letters expressing a similar longing for peace. They express concern that we are losing sight of what should be our principal objective—a world at peace.

Their fears are not hard to understand. The news of the Korean War is constantly in our thoughts. There are constant reports of preparation for war in other parts of the world, and there is a great deal more speculation on where the Communists may strike next than on peaceful methods of settling the world's problems.

COSTLY MISTAKES

Here in the United States we find that we, as a nation, have made some costly mistakes in our efforts to build peace on the foundation of victory in the last world war. Some of the mistakes date from the period when the war still was in progress.

We must not again blind our eyes to the true nature of international communism. We must not be guilty again of duplicity toward our friends, selling them out to their enemies as we did Nationalist China. We must not aid and abet unfriendly forces as we did with the notorious loans to Poland. We must not alienate potentially helpful forces as we have done in the case of Spain and certain nations of South America. All of these things have contributed to our present dilemma—war and the threat of war only 5 years after our great victory.

International communism is the principal threat to peace. With a ruthless determination and a total disregard for moral or human values it has, in five short years, brought most of Asia and some 600,000,000 people under its dictatorship. Because some of our leaders thought they could deal with the Communist dictators—or that they could outguess them—we made promises and followed programs which led to the downfall of the Chinese National Government. Because we were not sufficiently zealous in our championship of freedom elsewhere, we contributed to the Communist overthrow of democratic governments in a half dozen central European nations.

POSITIVE PROGRAMS FOR PEACE

Recognizing the mistakes of the past, what can we do to bring peace to this troubled world.

First of all, we must build our military strength. There is good reason to believe that it is the threat of atomic bombing that has kept us from a third war in Europe. We must supplement our strength in atomic weapons with similar strength in our Armed Forces. Most of us accept the principle that military weakness invites attack. We have proved it three times in our own history, in 1812, in 1917, and in 1941. The recent boldness of the Chinese Reds is a further example.

But this is only a temporary expedient—not a permanent foundation for peace. Just because we are undertaking these military measures to avoid war through a balance of power, does not mean that we should or can afford to give second place to the positive measures that may build real peace. We have by no means exhausted the possibilities.

There is still room for diplomatic negotiations with Russia concerning the world's troubled areas. These are slim possibilities, to be sure, but they exist and they must be explored, first, because they may be helpful to a degree, and, second, because our moral position before the world demands that we continually explore every honorable means of avoiding war.

Another positive step lies in concluding peace treaties with our former enemies. A fair and equitable treaty should be signed with Japan. It should contain terms that will win for us the support of the Japanese people and the approval of others throughout Asia. Similar arrangements should be made in Germany. The mistakes of our occupation must be erased by a new policy in West Germany.

SETTLEMENT IN KOREA

The time has come when our Government should announce its terms for peace, or at least a truce, in Korea. To date we have done nothing to stop the killing. Are we justified in continuing this killing without clearly stating our military and political objectives? It is true our long-term objective is to stop communism, but winning a few more miles in North Korea will not resolve that world-wide issue. At the present time there is no basis for peace in Korea and therefore no possibility that war will end.

President Wilson's Fourteen Points in the First World War did much to shorten that struggle. Let us show our disposition toward a peaceful solution of our Korean conflict by announcing, through the United Nations if you will, the terms under which we would consider a cease-fire.

The United Nations is a possible instrument of peace. It is true that the veto in the United Nations has hampered desirable action, and it is true that the organization has not proved effective in the Korean War. But both of these are in part our fault. We agreed to the veto in the first place, although many people expressed misgivings, and in Korea our policies in large measure were responsible for encouraging the Communist attack. Certainly we are responsible for trying to make a military force out of the UN before it had the moral authority to command such force.

I realize that many Americans are enraged by the spectacle of the United Nations debating at length while Americans die in Korea. I feel the same way. But it remains a vehicle which may help bring peace. We must use it as wisely as we can, hopeful that it will fulfill in some measure the high hopes we had at the time of its creation.

THE BEST HOPE

Beyond all these things lies an even greater force for peace.

We are a great Christian nation. Most of us believe the Christian precepts of honesty, fair dealing, kindness, and love for other men. The same things may be said of the great masses of the people in other lands, whether they be Christian or Jew or members of one of the great religions of the east. Nowhere in the world, not even in Russia, do the people want war.

A group of Senators had this in mind recently when they introduced a resolution stating that the goal of the American people is, and ever has been, a just and lasting peace; that we rearm only with reluctance and would prefer to devote all our energies to peace; and that we reaffirm our deep and abiding friendship for all other peoples, including the people of Russia. The Senators felt that such a resolution, especially if it could be communicated to the people of Russia, would be a positive force for peace. Certainly it states our true feelings.

If war can be avoided for a time, we may by words and deeds convey this message to people throughout the world, encourage them by our example, and trust that the fears and ambitions which separate nations will be overcome by the love of peace which unites all mankind. Each of us by his own example and his active interest in our Government can contribute to this end.

In this way we may fulfill the mission of the Prince of Peace whose resurrection all Christians celebrate at this season.

The Congressional Secretaries Club Had a Gala Night February 27, 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, it is unnecessary for me to point out the pride we take in, and the appreciation we have for, the splendid work which is being done by secretaries and others, both in our congressional offices and on our committee staffs.

The Congressional Secretaries Club, as you know, is the organization made up of secretaries and clerks employed in the offices and on the committees, by the Members of both Houses of Congress.

At each of the meetings of the club, there is usually an informative address made by some top-flight public official—either a Cabinet member or other departmental head, talking on some current problem of great congressional and national interest.

On Tuesday evening, February 27, the regular meeting of the club was held in the Departmental Auditorium on Constitution Avenue. The regular business being quickly dispensed with, there was a kind of open-house meeting to which the club members had invited their immediate as well as their official families. The entertainment for the evening was provided by the Air Force Symphonic Band, accompanied by the voices of the Air Force Singing Sergeants. In addition to the musical program, all in attendance were given a preview of two films. One was actual footage of war in the air as it is being carried on in Korea as of this very hour, and disclosed the actual destruction not alone of Chinese planes but of some of the hundreds of bridges, industries, tanks, trucks, supply trains, and other war accoutrements and supports, as well as vivid candid camera account of the magnificent support accorded to the ground troops by our Air Force. The other picture depicted practically all types of aircraft in simulated battle action. This included, among others, a most realistic exhibition, done in color, of the almost indescribable damage that can be meted by a single United States Air Force intercontinental bomber B–36.

A short talk was given by Brig. Gen. Robert E. L. Eaton, Director of Legislation and Liaison, who, in part, stated:

We of the Air Force are firm in the knowledge and belief that the Congress of the United States is the policy-making body of this great union of States, and, moreover, that the Congress is the true voice of the American people.

General Eaton went on to say:

From its very date of establishment, the United States Air Force has had but two purposes in mind: (1) To afford our country the greatest possible measure of defense; (2) to accomplish this defense by the most prudent and effective means and with the least expenditure of the taxpayer's dollar.

The address of the evening was by Mr. Eugene M. Zuckert, Assistant Secretary of the Air Force, speaking in behalf of Thomas K. Finletter, Secretary, due to Mr. Finletter's absence on official business in the Far East.

Because of the earnestness and the utter frankness of these gentlemen in their dealings with our secretaries and others of our official families, I am asking the unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include in the RECORD the statements of Brig. Gen. Robert E. L. Eaton and Mr. Eugene M. Zuckert:

ADDRESS OF BRIG. GEN. ROBERT E. L. EATON

Mr. Johnson, may I express my thanks for the generous words spoken with respect to the Air Force Directorate of Legislation and Liaison.

We of the Air Force are firm in the knowledge and belief that the Congress of the United States is the policy-making body of this great union of States—and, moreover, the Congress is the true voice of the American people.

We believe that when Congress speaks, the American people themselves speak.

From its very date of establishment, the United States Air Force has had but two purposes in mind:

1. To afford our country the greatest possible measure of defense.

2. To accomplish this defense by the most prudent and effective means, and with the least expenditure of the taxpayer's dollar.

Recognizing that the power to fulfill these purposes comes from the Congress that the Congress is the arm of the Government which decides the number of weapons, and all other matériel woven into the warp and the woof of the fabric that goes to make up the United States Air Force, and, acting under the Commander in Chief, we regard ourselves as servants of the people.

For this reason, we are particularly happy this evening to be permitted to address an organization made up of the official staffs and families of our Senators and Representatives of the Nation's Congress.

In a more personal way, the responsibilities which are assigned to me constitute the direct point of contact between the Congress and the Air Force. I have thoroughly enjoyed my opportunities to be of service to the Members of the Congress—but I am even more pleased to present here tonight a distinguished gentleman whose work has long since marked him as one of the great figures associated with the establishment of the United States Air Force.

I know of no other who could have brought to that task greater skill, ability, wisdom, prudence, or a more thorough training to do the job as it should be done.

An experienced Government administrator—an attorney by profesSon—he served 4 years as professor in the relations of Government and business at the Harvard Graduate School of Business Administration.

It might well be said that his scope of responsibility within the Air Force includes all human as well as physical resources. His principal contributions have been in the field of management—the application of sound business administration of the military organization, including statistical controls, the development of organizational policies, civilian and military personnel control policies, budgetary policies, and educational and training polices.

Under his direction was developed the first performance-type budget in use by a military service. This performance-type of budget has been acclaimed by the Hoover Commission on Reorganization in Government as the pattern that should be followed in all Government budgeting.

He is here tonight as the personal representative of the Honorable Thomas K. Finletter, Secretary of the Air Force, to speak to you on matters of interest, both to yourselves and to the United States Air Force.

Ladies and gentlemen, it is now my distinct privilege and pleasure to present to you the Honorable Eugene M. Zuckert, Assistant Secretary of the Air Force.

ADDRESS OF MR. EUGENE M. ZUCKERT

Mr. Johnson, members of the Secretaries' Club, and honored guests, I bring greetings to all from Thomas K. Finletter, Secretary of the Air Force, whose trip into the Middle East precluded his being here personally to discuss with you the problems which we in the Air Force share with the office and committee staffs of the Members of the Congress.

When it was first proposed that I do this pinch-hitting for Mr. Finletter I was told that, inasmuch as we pretty much all knew one another, I could speak right off-the-cuff and without preparation. It is because of this fact that I made no effort whatever to prepare an address. In fact, I am glad that it happened just that way, and that I didn't have to make any type of address. Rather, I wish I could stand here and make answer to such questions as you would like to put to me, and perhaps, in that manner, get closer together on an even greater team made up of the legislation and liaison directorate personnel of the Air Force and all you secretaries on Capitol Hill.

I want to stress the fact that we are desirous of assisting all possible—not alone in informing you, and through you, the Members of Congress, with respect to the things with which they are concerned, but, in addition thereto, in rendering all possible assistance in doing the things your respective constituents desire in behalf of themselves and the Nation's interest.

As General Eaton so aptly pointed out, it is the fixed resolve of the Air Force to cooperate with the Congress, recognizing that they are the policy-making body.

We have made mistakes—and we realize that we will probably continue to make even more. You can be assured, however, that all possible is being done to abate these errors, if not altogether to eliminate them.

That some error will creep into such a huge organization as the Air Force is inevitable when one thinks of the tremendous turnover in personnel—the vast number of new persons to be brought into service—the numerous bases to be opened, and the never-ending planning attended by the letting of an almost endless variety of contracts in dollar values that can only be expressed in astronomical figures.

Determined not to fail, we are in no manner adverse to seeing our errors pointed out. Constructive criticism, we recognize, can only result in giving added impetus to measures that will further improve our methods and thus enable us to do the same and all other things even better.

My friends, may I take this occasion to tell you how happy we are with the results of the good work that is being done by our directorate of legislation and liaison and the equally splendid gentlemen and officers that we have in the personalities of Brig. Gen. Robert (Bob) E. L. Eaton, Col. James W. Wilson, Col. James W. Chapman, and Maj. Luke C. Quinn, Jr., who are representing us in our direct congressional liaison work.

It stirred my heart to hear the tribute paid by your gracious chairman to that self-effacing great American ace, gentlemen, and officer, Lt. Col. Johnny C. Meyer, of whom, we in the Air Force, as well as Americans everywhere, are justifiably proud. It has often been asked of me why it was that, as the greatest living Air Force ace, and after having shot down 37½ German planes in World War II, Johnny Meyer was not relieved from future combat duty. Such, however, is not the reward of airmen in your Air Force. His specialty is that of pilot in a fighter group. His experience in the Liaison Division was a routine tour of duty. It is solely because of his unique and peculiar training and experience as a fighter pilot that Johnny Meyer is now back in Korea with his fighting command. There we find him carrying on in the same tradition of the Air Force that has made him the beloved, respected officer in the field that he proved himself to be in his tour of liaison duty among you here on Capitol Hill.

It is well to remember that, on the eve of the Korean conflict, we had an Air Force of but 48 groups, with a total strength of 400,000 officers and airmen. Immediately upon entering Korea, legislation which supplemented the Air Force budget enabled us to rapidly expand the Air Force and to greatly increase its number of personnel, planes, weapons, and bases. Security precludes my telling just how large our Air Force is of this hour, but I can assure you that we are well on the way to almost doubling the number of personnel which we had last fall.

Authorization has been granted to attain a 68-wing level—and the 84-group level by January 1953. But, my friends, even these are not set goals—they may be raised once, or even several times. This altogether depends upon the critical world situation, which, I need not tell you, is changing almost daily.

Might I take this opportunity of pointing out to all that the tempo of your Air Force preparedness cannot be gaged with any accuracy upon results as they manifest themselves in Korea—nor do we make plans, day by day, based on the successes which we have achieved or the reverses met in the over-all picture as seen in Korea.

Ours is a program based upon long-range planning, and with two main considerations. The first is that we must immediately double our strength while, at the same time, we organize that expansion in such manner that we could again double and redouble the industrial and personnel mobilization should the requirement for full-scale Air Force development confront this Nation. Second only to that, and always in the forefront, is our desire to achieve the maximum of efficiency and of national defense, with the minimum expenditure of the taxpayers' dollars.

It seems inevitable that we convert some portion of the Nation's industrial production, now devoted largely to peacetime consumers' goods, to the increased production of planes, weapons, electronic equipment, and thousands of complex technical items required to meet the demands of a modern Air Force with engines and jets geared to supersonic speeds. Moreover, these things must be accomplished during the period that your Air Force is developing an over-all expansion of existing aircraft production capacity.

In maintaining the national economic health, great care must be exercised to prevent either the unemployment or displacement of labor from their homes or families, while, at the same time, achieving the maximum result from the most efficient use of the skilled labor resources available.

As of this very hour, automobile craftsmen are producing aircraft for jet planes, working at their own lathes and benches. One plant, which had previously been devoted solely to the production of flying boxcars, will now undertake to make the B–47 stratojet bombers, while, at the same time, it gears itself to an increased production of its own specialized end product.

It could easily mean that the little manufacturing plant just down the street, in addition to maintaining some certain percentage of its regular production, will, in the near future, produce any one of more than the 100,000 component parts that enter into the construction and development of but a single one of our great international B–36 long-range bombers.

At the same time that these things are being accomplished on the production line, the training camps of the Air Force are undertaking to absorb scores of thousands of the raw youth of our Nation and build them, by the use of the present limited housing and other facilities, and with the greatest dispatch, into well-trained and equipped members of the greatest Air Force in the world.

We must train a large percent of these young men—who, prior to their induction into the Air Force, never had been in an airplane—to fly precision jet bombers with a maximum of personal safety and military efficiency—or else cement them into effectively organized combat crews, trained to man and operate the complex equipments built into our long-range, international bombers of the latest models and supersonic speeds.

As you all well know, next to the Strategic Bombing Command, the principle mission of the Air Force is to secure the defenses of these United States. Top on all priority lists is to train these youths—young women, as well as young men—to carry out vital supporting roles, not alone in combat forces, but in a veritable catalog of administrative, aeronautic, scientific, and technical fields. As one great team, we do all in order that our peoples can continue the American traditional mode of existence and the American way of life.

The Battle Against Chronic Diseases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the battle against chronic diseases, which has been advanced by sizable congressional appropriations to the National Institutes of Health in recent years, is handicapped at the present time by a lack of precise data on the extent of these crippling illnesses. Federal, State, and local governmental agencies and nongovernmental organizations have been similarly handicapped in their attempts to properly plan facilities, rehabilitation programs and research projects applicable to particular diseases. Information to the extent of chronic and disabling diseases in the United States today is so inadequate that the Congress has to rely upon data 15 years old and of doubtful accuracy in making appropriations for research in these diseases. The last survey of national health was made in 1935. Its scope was restricted to the cities and did not cover a broad enough segment of the population.

Recent military and mobilization manpower demands point up the need for a more accurate picture of the extent to which chronic illnesses have handicapped our defense effort. In terms of production today, more than one and one-half billion man-days are lost annually because of sickness and disability. Nearly 3,000,000 workers annually are prevented from working by total disability. The financial loss to the Nation is staggering—$27,000,000,000 a year. In appropriating moneys for research to cut down this enormous toll, the Congress should have, for guidance, a factual up-to-date survey of the incidence of each particular disease. It is for these reasons that I am today submitting a bill to the Congress to provide for a survey of sickness in the United States. I am convinced that the considerable advances made in the science of sampling since 1935, plus other improvements to give more diagnostic medical accuracy, would result in a more accurate and less costly survey.

I am certain that the doctors of the country will cooperate fully in this vital survey. They have supported wholeheartedly the work of the Commission on Chronic Illness, established in 1949 to spearhead a joint attack on the serious national problems raised by chronic illness. The American Medical Association, the American Hospital Association, the American Public Health Association, the American Public Welfare Association, the insurance companies, labor unions, the Grange, industry, as well as State and city health and welfare departments are all represented on this commission. We can count on the assistance of the Commission on Chronic Illness in connection with the planning and operation of the survey program.

I can envision, as the result of this proposed legislation, provision for periodic estimates of the amount of chronic disease and handicapping conditions in the population. These periodic estimates will be needed by all types of public and private health agencies and organizations in the planning of programs. Many cities and rural counties which cannot afford to conduct a canvass of this sort will benefit tremendously from a periodic inventory which includes accurate, up-to-date data.

This Great Farming Area

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT E. JONES, JR.
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. JONES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following significant editorial which summarizes the great agricultural progress being made in Madison County and the Tennessee Valley. This fine editorial was written by Mr. Reese T. Amis, editor of the Huntsville (Ala.) Times and appeared in that paper on March 12, 1951. I am glad to call this splendid article to the attention of the Members:

THIS GREAT FARMING AREA

The annual farm edition of the Times is published today. It is the largest ever published in the State of Alabama. It contains 64 pages, tabloid size, and has 75 local pictures and some 125 local news stories.

The purpose of these annual editions is to chronicle the varied agricultural progress of Madison County and the Tennessee Valley.

Up until 15 years ago, cotton and corn were the mainstays of this rich agricultural area. That is no longer so. Beginning with the soil-conservation program set up by Franklin D. Roosevelt, and aided and abetted by the extension services of the agricultural colleges, especially Auburn, the type of farming was changed.

Instead of talking about crop diversification, farmers did something about it, increasingly, each year.

If you will look carefully through this farm edition, it will be found that there is not only a cotton and corn industry in this and adjoining counties, but a cattle industry, a hog industry, a sheep industry, a grain and seed industry, a dairy industry, and a poultry industry, not to speak of some others on a smaller scale.

This is one of the premier farming sections, not only of Alabama, but of the entire Southeast. It can produce bountifully, and profitably, almost any and every kind of farm crop. Intensive cultivation gives yields that are comparable in quality and quantity to the highest raised in any State.

Best of all, the farmers of this and adjoining counties are increasing the productivity of their soil annually. There are no exact figures, but many have estimated this growth in productivity as much as 50 percent in the past 15 years.

No longer does a farmer blithely allow his soil to wash away. He has become an apostle of soil conservation, and of enlightened soil practices. He enlists the help and advice of the agents of the Soil Conservation Service.

Where little more than a decade ago, a quarter or half bale of cotton was grown to the acre, the good lands are making a bale or more, with staple an inch or better in length.

We once made 15 or 20 bushels of corn to the acre. Yields of 100 to 150 bushels to the acre now are common. On one entire farm last year, the average was more than 100 bushels to the acre.

Up until a few years ago, the livestock industry was almost nonexistent in this county. Truck peddlers bought a cow, or sheep, or hog by the head, not the pound. Some few livestock were trucked off to Nashville or Birmingham for sale at stockyards. Today, there is a stockyard at almost every county seat.

It has now been demonstrated that as good cattle, hogs, or sheep can be raised and grown here as any that the Middle West produces—and more cheaply, because the grazing season is longer.

The end of our farming progress is not yet. In fact, it is perhaps just really geting under way. These past few years have made it clear to even the most uninformed that the new way of farming is more profitable. Nearly every farmer, big or little, is joining the parade, in more or less degree.

Farming in Madison County, and its neighboring counties, is becoming an increasingly attractive way of life.

Highways, electricity, better homes and buildings, better schools—all these, and others—more and more make rural life rank with, if not exceed, the pleasure of city life.

Senator Williams Attacks Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. CALEB BOGGS
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, the Sunday Star, a newspaper of Wilmington, Del., on Sunday, March 18, 1951, carried a news story of vital importance in these times. This news story was based upon a statement by the distinguished and able senior United States Senator from the State of Delaware, the Honorable JOHN J. WILLIAMS. The news account listed Senator WILLIAMS' suggestions to beat inflation and stabilize our economy.

This 10-point program to stabilize our economy and meet the greatest danger confronting our country, that of uncontrolled inflation, is most timely and merits the consideration of everyone interested in attacking the problem of inflation.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the statement of Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS, which was carried in the Sunday Star of Wilmington, Del., on March 18, 1951:

TEXT OF SENATOR WILLIAMS' STATEMENT ON INFLATION

The greatest danger confronting our country today is not the menace of attack by communistic forces beyond our borders or the destrictive influences of these same forces within our own country, but it is the ever rising spiral of uncontrolled inflation which now envelops our country and seriously threatens our entire economy and American way of life.

There are those who feel that the control of inflation is simply a matter of enacting a price and wage control law. Unfortunately it is not that simple.

In order to intelligently approach the solution of this problem, we must first recognize the No. 1 cause of inflation, which is large governmental expenditures accompanied by a long series of unbalanced budgets. So long as our expenditures exceed our income, just so long will our deficit spending dilute our monetary blood stream by decreasing the purchasing value of our dollar and increase the spiral of inflation. This diabolical practice has reduced the purchasing value of the 100-cent dollar of 1900 to the 31-cent dollar of today. The further continuance of this practice will further decrease the purchasing value of our dollar and entirely destroy our economy.

The diversion of our productive capacity to wartime materials reduces the amount of civilian goods available for purchase, and unless this additional money is siphoned off by increased taxes the result is higher prices.

Upon the outbreak of war in Korea last June, Congress was confronted with a prospective increased expenditure of 30 to 40 billion dollars annually. Recognizing that all these additional expenditures would not be covered by increased taxes, Congress enacted the Defense Production Act, commonly designated as a price and wage control law.

This price and wage control law has been on the statute books since August of last year, and yet during this 7-month period our country has witnessed one of its most rapid inflationary spirals. The cost of living today has advanced 6 percent above the July 1950 level.

Why has the enactment of this so-called price- and wage-control law not deterred the upward trend of this spiral of inflation but in fact has increased the upward trend? Is it because (1) Congress has failed to take adequate steps to minimize the causes of inflation? (2) Is there something wrong with the law? (3) Is there something wrong with the administration of the law? (4) Or is it a combination of all three?

Suppose we discuss first the question, "Has Congress taken the proper steps to minimize the causes of inflation by reducing all nonessential Government expenditures to the fullest extent possible?"

Unfortunately the answer is "No." Notwithstanding all the orations which have been made on the floor of the Senate advocating economy, the net result is that we are currently spending more money on domestic programs than ever before in our history. Nor is there any program to reduce these expenditures during the next fiscal year. For instance, note the following tabulation of the budgetary requests of those nondefense agencies handling domestic programs for the next fiscal year as compared with their expenditures for the current year as compared with the preceding 10 years.

According to this chart it is apparent that no effort has been made to curtail the public works and welfare programs of our domestic departments.

[In thousands]

Year	Department of Commerce	Department of State	Department of Labor	Department of the Interior	Department of Justice
1941	$147,827	$23,955	$23,013	$169,537	$67,135
1942	445,437	31,434	24,145	286,490	84,215
1943	622,846	37,922	26,112	281,206	107,885
1944	156,200	53,190	55,034	235,424	114,940
1945	88,313	55,340	71,589	214,338	117,866
1946	108,469	102,345	82,289	248,817	106,650
1947	200,112	193,269	140,490	290,408	112,086
1948	198,372	315,595	86,590	320,603	116,024
1949	642,899	350,852	15,490	516,401	126,759
1950	688,200	300,672	58,805	646,431	135,970
1951	713,542	271,593	208,573	631,828	147,752

The next two questions raised were: Is there something wrong with the law? and Does the fault lie with its administration?

At the time the Defense Production Act was passed by the Congress I made the statement that the law could not possibly serve as a measure to control inflation if the Senate insisted upon adopting amendments providing for special exemptions to every pressure group in the country.

An exemption was provided for wage earners.

An exemption was provided for farmers.

An exemption was provided for the press, including newspapers, magazines, and periodicals.

An exemption was provided for the fees of lawyers, doctors, and all other members of the professions.

And exemptions were provided for many other groups too numerous to mention.

It is only natural that each of these groups, while having no objection to rigid controls over other groups, would want their own special group to be exempt. However, what Congress overlooked, as they did in World War II, was that there is no such thing as partial controls. You cannot expect the wage earners to accept controls over wages unless the cost of living is stabilized. You cannot expect the farmer to accept controls over his products unless labor costs are controlled, because without the stabilization of labor, his production and equipment costs inevitably soar. You cannot expect any of these groups to accept controls unless all other groups accept the same restrictions. At the same time, through increased tax rates, industry would be operating on a lower net-earning basis.

Now the question is: What can we do today to stabilize our economy and eliminate the destructive threat of uncontrolled inflation? It is later than we think; however, I believe that it is not too late if the Congress and the administration will pursue the proper course and display the necessary courage to do the job.

These are the necessary steps which I think must be taken, namely:

1. The economies recommended by the Hoover Commission should become effective immediately, thereby saving millions which are currently being lost through overlapping bureaus and through unnecessary waste. According to the best authorities our domestic, nondefense expenditures could easily be reduced by $7,000,000 000.

2. An immediate overhauling of all Government employment records and eliminating therefrom all nonessential Government employees.

3. An immediate stopping of all construction work on all Government buildings and public-works projects which are not declared essential to our national defense program.

4. An immediate ban upon the expansion of any existing or upon the enactment of any new welfare programs.

5. Increase production by increasing the numbers of working hours and the efficiency and productivity of the workers. Full production is the mortal enemy of inflation.

6. Repeal all subsidy programs including those on agriculture, labor, and industry. Practically every segment of our society is being subsidized in some manner at the expense of the taxpayer.

7. Our existing tax laws should be revised so as to eliminate many of the loopholes now existing and thereby spreading the tax load on a more equitable basis.

8. Stop the absurd policy of spending millions buying agricultural products and destroying them for the avowed purpose of creating a scarcity and then spending added millions to sustain another agency to hold prices down.

9. Adopt the Federal Reserve Board formula of more realistic interest rates, thereby discouraging loose credit. Credit should be made readily available only for those purposes which contribute to the strengthening of our national economy and our national defense.

10. After the above recommendations have become effective, we should immediately adopt a fair and equitable tax law which will balance our budget and place our economy on a pay-as-you-go basis. To charge our present-day expenditures to future generations means that we are not only shirking the responsibilities of this generation but jeopardizing the future as well.

We should at all times recognize the importance of maintaining our economic and financial strength, which is so necessary to our national security and the preservation of our form of government. We should also recognize that our greatest enemy is inflation, which, if uncontrolled, means certain economic collapse, hardships upon people living on a fixed income, a devaluation in our monetary standards, and a loss of savings to people who have labored all their lives to assure themselves of a competency in their later years.

I am thoroughly convinced that if the above 10 recommendations are put into practice we shall be able to abandon dependency on price and wage controls, which at best can only be regarded as a stopgap remedy and which should be put into effect only after all other remedies have failed.

Lenin knew the destructive force of inflation when he said in substance, "Inflation is the spark of revolution. I will print so many bonds and so much money that the capitalists will choke on them."

I agree with CIO President Murray that "inflation must be stopped. Inflation can be stopped if we meet this major problem of the home front with the same boldness, intelligence, and courage that our Armed Forces are showing in Korea."

Broadcast by Raymond Swing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. HOWELL

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following broadcast by Raymond Swing over Station WOL, Washington, D. C.:

One of the proposals the Soviet Union wants at Paris to get on the agenda of a four-power conference is a reduction of armaments. Nothing promotes Soviet interests more effectively than its ability to convince people that the Soviet Union wants to reduce armaments, and that the western world—well, look at it—is building up its arms. That is supposed to identify who it is wants peace. What the Russians mean by a reduction in armaments is a percentage reduction of standard arms after an abolition of atomic weapons. They want atomic warfare banned by international agreement first of all. Then they want other arms scaled down on the basis of existing ratios. Thus in 1948 the Soviet Union proposed to the United Nations Assembly a reduction of one-third in existing armaments. The western powers rejected this plan, so did the United Nations.

It is clear that any Russian offer will not be like the one made in the first disarmament talks of the League of Nations. At that time Mr. Litvinov proposed genuine, total disarmament. It may be doubted if he would have offered it then had there been any chance of its being accepted. But he did offer it, and it startled the world, which was not ready then to forego the unlimited sovereign right to wage a national war. The present Soviet regime is not repeating the Litvinov offer. All it offers is something that, if accepted, would leave the Soviet Union relatively stronger than its rivals. For if the atomic bomb were banned, the Soviet Union would be unchallenged in its supremacy as a land power. And if armaments were to be reduced percentagewise, the Soviet Union with its huge ground forces, still would remain on top. It is easy enough to convince Americans of the spuriousness of the Russia disarmament proposals. But it is not so easy to convince those who hear only the Russian side of the story. Nor is it easy to convince the world that the western powers are, as they say, arming for peace, since on its face this is a paradox. It happens to be a truthful paradox. Put it is not persuasive.

The Western World has ideas about disarmament of its own. But they are not worked out in detail, not carefully thought through, and not the result of consultation between the western governments. One gets it by glimpses, as when President Truman proposed to the United Nations on its anniversary in October a program of unusual disarmament under foolproof international control. At that time he asked that the study of atomic control and disarmament be merged, a step that now is being taken by the United Nations.

One gets another glimpse of it in the proposal now being discussed by the United Nations to set up an international police force. This, however, is quite meaningless in the UN as it is, for the Soviet Union sits on the Council with its veto power, and the police force would be under the control of the Security Council. So this proposal now is being supplanted by the Acheson plan for setting aside armed forces by all UN members for duty at the call, not of the Security Council but the Assembly, where the veto does not operate. This is now up for action at Lake Success, but somehow its bearing on disarmament is in the shadows. It looks much more like an effort to prepare for another Korea, by assuring the United Nations a force with which to head off an aggression.

The idea of a UN legion which can fight anywhere at any time would be a necessary part of a genuine, world-wide, total disarmament. For if nations give up their national armaments, there would have to be police to enforce the laws by which the disarmament has been effected. But a UN legion would be powerless against the Red Army and any talk about it in a world of unlimited national armaments is not realistic. So one sees in this western thinking no coherent program. It does not come to the root of the problem of war. Suppose the west gets what it now asks. Suppose the UN merges the study of atomic control with the reduction of armaments and also creates a UN force, there still is no concerted western program with the ultimate objective of a world without war. The arms race would not be stopped. No headway would be made against the Soviet campaign for its spurious kind of peace and disarmament.

The need for a genuine disarmament offer by the west is daily more apparent, for it seems to be the only way to meet the Soviet case before the world this summer. For if the four power conference is held and does not end the cold war and the arms race the west will be at a distinct disadvantage in not having a positive and genuine aim with which to match the Soviet pretense.

Just now the United States is engrossed with the job of enlarging its Armed Forces and inspiring the Western Europe countries to enlarge theirs. Probably it is against human nature to do this and talk about peace at the same time. But it is essential to know what this force we are building is for and it is important to know what it is not for.

Walter Lippmann in his column today brings this out skillfully in a recognition of the difference betwen two verbs, to deter and to compel. Our military force has only the purpose of deterring, he points out, and if we try to use it to compel it may cease to deter. "We have the power," he writes, "to cause great destruction within the Soviet Union and the satellites. Were we to allow the Russians to think that this power of ours would be used to support a policy of ultimatum and unconditional surrender in the cold war, almost certainly our whole vast military effort would cease to be a deterrent against military aggression. For the power to deter can only be effective if the nation at which it is directed has been convinced that it will not be struck if it refrains from striking." He goes on to point out that if the Russians believe we will strike them, not because of what they do, but because of what they are, they will not be influenced in what they do. In other words, the power to deter only works if there is a clear alternative to war. It works only if there can be a negotiated settlement. The power to deter, Mr. Lippmann, says, is the military complement of the doctrine that the Soviet Union and the United States can coexist, and that their coexistence can be made tolerable. This is an unanswerable way of saying that the objective of western policy must be peace. But it can only be said convincingly in terms of concrete policy. And it is not yet being said in that way. A UN legion, or a UN police force, against aggression, or a merger of the study of atomic energy control and arms reduction are not a program to offset the Russians. The western program must lead to peace, must lead if possible to the end of modern war. While it is both desirable and imperative that the west be strong enough to deter—to prevent an aggression, that is only half a program. The other half is to build peace, and to end the arms race. This is said in the knowledge that it is what President Truman wants, and what a substantial number of the ablest men in Congress want. The knowledge that sooner or later the United States must take the lead to negotiate a genuine settlement, a true peace, a real disarmament, is shared by many American and western leaders. What they differ about is timing. Thus Secretary Acheson wants no basic negotiations until the west is stronger. But without a peace objective the Soviet world may not believe the western power is intended only to deter. They may fear it is being created to compel and a constructive solution may come too late.

Senator McMAHON today suggested that Congress, on agreeing to send troops to Europe and enlarge its armed forces, should pass a resolution disavowing the desire for war with the Russian people. That is good as far as it goes. Still more persuasive would be a formula with the backing of all the western governments stating it to be the ultimate objective to end the very possibility of national wars. That is, to meet the Russian formula of arms reduction by a formula of arms elimination, under the sovereignty of the UN. I am not saying the Russians would or would not repudiate such a formula. But if the west adopted it, whatever the Russians did would decide before the whole world what chance there is to realize peace.

Address of Hon. Sean MacBride

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by His Excellency Sean MacBride, S. C., T. D., Minister for External Affairs of Ireland, to the Overseas Press Club, New York, on Monday, March 19, 1951:

The advance of democracy coupled with the development of transport and communications places an ever-increasing burden on the shoulders of our statesmen and governments. The ever-increasing tempo of international conferences, as well as the vast amount of administrative work that falls on the shoulders of ministers and governments, leaves little time for considered objective thinking.

At the beginning of our century international conferences were big and rare events. Preparations were made for them long in advance and they were held in a leisurely atmosphere. Nowadays our statesmen are snowed under by mass documentation from government agencies and from the international organizations to which they belong; they have, too, to attend international conferences with increasing frequency. As a result of this high pressure insufficient thought has so far been given by the leaders of the democratic world to the fundamental issues that are involved and to the necessary remedies. Many decisions have to be taken in the agony of a crisis and are, therefore, based on the expediency of the moment. It is difficult for the statesmen of today to look ahead and to take the long view based on objective planning.

The struggle which divides the world into two main camps reaches deeply into the foundations of our civilization; it is a conflict of ideologies which must consequently be fought out in the conscience of mankind. In the struggle against communism our attitude must be not merely a negative one of piling up defensive equipment but must also be constructive. To oppose the Communist ideology the western democracies have the fundamental beliefs which form part of their tradition and outlook, a belief in the democratic way of life and a belief in fundamental human and political rights. One of the greatest needs of the western nations is a clear enunciation of what they guarantee to their peoples. Counter materialism and physical force do not provide the necessary ideals around which the human conscience can rally. We in the democratic world must evolve a clear-cut political and economic philosophy which will enunciate clearly the principles for which we stand. These should be based upon the liberty and dignity of the human being, justice, and equality of opportunity. In the economic sphere, they must include the right to work for an adequate family wage, and the utilization of productive capacity for the welfare of the people. In the national sphere, they should include a clear enunciation of democratic principles and assert the right of nations to determine their own affairs freely, by democratic means, without outside interference.

The provision of such a banner is, in my view, a matter of urgency and of the utmost importance. It should receive from world statesmen at least as much consideration and thought as the military and economic problems that confront the world. It is essential, I believe, if democracy is to be the force we would like it to be, that its cardinal principles should be defined, accepted, and applied by all democratic powers.

The considerations with which I have just dealt are applicable to both America and Europe and should be dealt with jointly by the democratic nations of both continents.

Even if the progress made in Europe has been agonizingly slow and subject to constant diversionary and delaying tactics, the fact that a start has been made towards a greater degree of coordination is important. Europe has hitherto been the starting point and the storm center of most wars, hence the importance of seeking to establish a system of organization that will at least reduce the likelihood of political and economic conflicts between the free nations of Europe. The creation of OEEC and the Council of Europe have been steps in the right direction and I sincerely hope that nothing will happen as a result of the present world tension to minimize or divert the efforts of these two organizations. I hope that at all stages the United States foreign policy makers will appreciate the long-term importance of the concept that underlies this attempt at European organization and not allow the United States to be made the excuse for procrastination on grounds of diplomatic or military expediency. For the first time a real effort is being made to secure active cooperation between the European democracies for purposes other than war or military defense. This in itself is of far-reaching importance and represents a new concept in European affairs. It is through the two organizations that I have just mentioned, the Council of Europe and the OEEC, that these efforts are being carried out.

The OEEC was originally set up to administer the European end of the Marshall plan; to be quite frank, it was regarded at first, in many European capitals, as a piece of "window dressing" to satisfy American congressional and public opinion. In the last 18 months, however, the value of the OEEC as a real instrument of economic cooperation and planning is coming to be more generally recognized. This position was not achieved without a considerable amount of energizing on the part of some of its members; great credit is due to the help such men as Paul Hoffman, Averill Harriman, Bill Foster, and Milton Katz gave in seeking to infuse the OEEC with a concept of integration. The rule of unanimity rendered the progress slow, as the pace was set by the slowest members of the convoy. That any progress was made is in no small measure due to the insistence on frequent meetings of the Ministers; this compelled the Ministers concerned, and their government, to take a greater degree of interest in the work of the OEEC. However, it is really in the years ahead, when Marshall aid will have ceased, that a true test of the OEEC's worth can be determined.

As I have often advocated at its Council meetings, the OEEC should be the economic nerve center of Europe, and its Council of Ministers should constitute an economic cabinet for Europe. Any attempt by a major European power to bypass the OEEC in economic matters, as has happened on a number of occasions, should be sternly frowned upon, both in Europe and in America. As far as possible all matters relating to economic affairs and trade should be canalized through the OEEC.

If the 2½ years of its life the OEEC has done much to justify its existence, and, as I have indicated, it has in the last 18 months gone beyond being merely an agency for the division of United States aid. Industrial production in the OEEC countries is now about 30 percent higher than in 1938. Agricultural production has also been on the increase and in almost all fields it is higher than prewar. The organization has done much valuable work in tackling the problem of currency restrictions and shortages which have so much bedeviled European trade since the end of the war. The two Intra-European Payments and Compensation Agreements, culminating in the establishment of the European Payments Union, have gone far to establish the smooth and efficiently operating mechanism of international payments which is essential for trading among the European nations. The liberalization of trade from quantitative restrictions has been another step; not all difficulties have been resolved here but progress has been made. In addition there has been a great deal of solid and useful work done in relation to the exchange of technical and scientific information between countries, the coordination of investment, the cooperative examination of problems arising in agriculture and in many other sectors.

OEEC, then, has by its many activities shown itself to be an organization within which the many and varied economic problems confronting all nations in Europe today can be tackled realistically. I hope that it will be regarded more and more by the United States as the medium for economic action with Europe. We have learned the lesson that by cooperation we can hope to overcome many of our problems. Unilateral and isolated action is hurtful not only to the European community as a whole but ultimately to the country responsible for such action.

We must, of course, not overlook the fact that the interests of the different member countries must be carefully attended to. Not all of the countries of Europe are equally well developed economically. Some are highly industrialized while others have had their development retarded and cannot so easily expose themselves to courses of action which highly industrialized countries may take in their stride. That is why, in particular, such arrangements as the Schuman plan and Benelux are to be commended, because, while lacking nothing of the energy and determination which must characterize our actions in this field, they pay attention to the realities of the situation and form sound bases on which more large-scale actions may be founded.

However, the OEEC is purely an intergovernmental organization and suffers from all the defects inherent in this type of organization. Such organizations are of their nature slow, cautious, ponderous, and inevitably subject to the arts of secret diplomacy. By opposition and delaying tactics governments who are not wholeheartedly in favor of closer integration can successfully block progress. Because the discussions are for the most part held in secret and are of a technical nature, public opinion has little opportunity of asserting itself. These defects have, to a certain extent, been overcome in the Council of Europe.

Unlike the League of Nations, UNO and the OEEC, the Council of Europe is not a purely intergovernmental organization. The Assembly of the Council of Europe is, in effect, the first real attempt to constitute a European parliament. True, the seat of power rests in the Committee of Foreign Ministers and not in the Assembly. Nevertheless, obstruction, secret diplomacy and power politics will lose much of their effectiveness under the searchlight of an active European Parliamentary Assembly. The Assembly has already asserted itself and will, I hope, continue to show that the Committee of Ministers and Governments must take cognizance of its views. There will also be a better informed opinion in the different European parliaments on international problems and a greater degree of mutual understanding between the members of the different parliaments. It will not, therefore, be so easy for certain governments to maintain an evasive and obstructionist attitude on questions affecting European cooperation.

There is, however, a serious danger that the conservative attitude which has been forced upon the Committee of Ministers by certain governments will further dishearten and disillusion that section of European opinion which saw in the Council of Europe a real hope of concrete progress. I hope that the Assembly and those of my colleagues in the Committee of Foreign Ministers who support the viewpoint of the Assembly will persevere with patience and determination in their attempt to give reality to the concept of a European Assembly.

One of the problems which will have to be faced in the near future is the integration of the OEEC with the Council of Europe. This will present some difficulties, as certain countries are not members of the Council of Europe while they are members of the OEEC; it is also likely that proposals in this direction will be opposed by certain governments who prefer the secrecy and unprogressive attitude of intergovernmental organizations. In any scheme for integration care will have to be taken to preserve intact the Secretariat and economic organization of the OEEC, which is highly competent.

I have tried briefly to give you a picture of the European scene. The work of these two main instruments of European cooperation does not, however, fill the lacuna for a clear statement enunciating the moral and political philosophy of the free democratic world on the lines which I indicated at the beginning of this talk. This is a task which might well be undertaken by the Council of Europe in conjunction with America. It is, I believe, a matter of urgency.

I would like before concluding to refer briefly to the only territorial dispute which exists in the North Atlantic area, namely, the infringement of the sovereignty of the Irish people by the enforced partition of Ireland by Britain. No nation in the world can claim to have more clearly defined natural boundaries than Ireland. The basis of democratic rule depends upon the right of the people of a nation to determine their own affairs freely by democratic means and without outside interference. What right, therefore, has Britain to partition our country or claim sovereignty in any portion of it against the will of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people? This violation of the democratic principles for which the democratic world stands injures not merely Ireland but also the cause of the free world.

The Constitution, Our Palace of Liberties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL ALBERT

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a very timely address on the Constitution of the United States by Miss Ann West, of Antlers, Okla. The address follows:

THE CONSTITUTION, OUR PALACE OF LIBERTIES

Let us go back in time to the month of May, the year 1776, and to stately Independence Hall, Philadelphia. Here we see gathered together a very distinguished group of men. Their minds are keen, and their personalities as varied as you will find in any group. All of this intellect and all of these personalities are intent upon one purpose. That purpose, my friends, was to formulate a document which would proclaim the independence of these young colonies from the tyranny and exploitation of an oppressive monarchy.

The way was not to be smooth in attaining their goals, nor were they always to see eye to eye on the means of achieving the end toward which they worked. There were clashes of temper, conflicting sectional interests, jealousies, problems of finance and organization—all set against a lurid backdrop of a devastating war and its desolation. The result of their consecrated efforts was the Declaration of Independence, the foundation stone of constitutional government.

However, it was one thing to declare that we meant to be free and quite another to draw up a set of rules and regulations governing and guarding that freedom. Following that meeting in Independence Hall, there were other meetings of august and purposeful leaders, each with his own idea of what the charter of the new nation should contain. In Independence Hall in 1787, the ideals and beliefs of freedom-loving men were incorporated into the Constitution of the United States, which stands today, 164 years later, a guardian to our palace of liberties.

The architects of this palace were many and varied and each has left the imprint of his hopes and plans on the structure. Let us examine for a bit three of the master framers or builders of the Constitution and their contributions.

First, let us consider Alexander Hamilton, nicknamed the Little Lion, probably because of his perseverance in overcoming obstacles that would have thwarted a lesser man. After the Revolutionary War, Hamilton was elected to the New York Assembly from which he was appointed as a delegate to the Constitutional Convention. He was the moving force of this assembly, composed of some of the most brilliant thinkers the world has ever seen. Hamilton, according to Chancelor Kent, "surpassed all of his contemporaries in his exertion to create, recommend, adopt and defend the Constitution of the United States of America." Hamilton had great visions of what this young nation could and should be, and when others were less ambitious than he, he felt the bitter pangs of disgust, but grasped hopefully at each semblance of progress. He believed fervently in a strong, centralized government with the States subordinate to the Nation. This basic principle of Hamilton's is found throughout the Constitution. It forbids several powers to the States and proclaims with authority that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land. ARTHUR VANDENBERG, the venerable statesman of our own day, had this to say of Hamilton: "He was the brains in the pilot house when the ship of state set out into the perilous seas of history. The Republic is his monument."

Now let us consider James Madison, sometimes called "The father of the Constitution." At 36, he was one of the youngest members attending the Convention. Maj. William Pierce, a delegate from Georgia, describes Madison thus: "Mr. Madison is a character who has long been in public life; and what is very remarkable every person seems to acknowledge his greatness. He blends together the profound politician with the scholar. He perhaps has the most correct knowledge of the affairs of the United States of any man in the Union." Night after night, during the months that the Assembly was in session, Madison made a complete record of the proceedings of the day. From these notes, published after his death, we derive a picture of the hopes and fears of the delegates, of their attempts and successes to lead the Nation wandering blind and helpless into the light of freedom. Madison once stated that if men were angels, a government would not be needed. If angels governed men, controls on the government would not be necessary. As neither is the case, a government that controls the people but is also obliged to control itself, is the ideal form of government. Madison believed firmly in giving every free man the right to vote, and he led the fight for popular suffrage in electing our representatives. I believe Madison's chief contribution to the Constitution was his firm conviction that the will of the majority could not be far from right.

The last man whom we shall consider is Benjamin Franklin, then the most widely known man in the Colonies. Ben Franklin was old, past 80, but he still had the most farsighted vision of any delegate attending the Convention. He was physically feeble at his fourscore years, but his brilliant intellect was unimpaired. He was content to let the younger men plan the structure of the palace, giving them the benefit of his older wisdom. His common sense turned disagreeable men into cooperative ones, helped make the Constitution a reality. Franklin was firmly convinced that the people should have the controlling voice in the Government, and today the sound sense of the common people finds expression through him. His last earnest address to the delegates so influenced the assembly that, according to Francis Thorpe, the noted author and historian, "it gave us the Constitution." In this speech Franklin said that he had noticed on the back of Washington's chair a carving of the sun and its rays. He had often wondered if this portrayed the rising or setting sun, but that now, at the conclusion of their arduous labors, he was sure that it was the rising sun of a great new country. What prophetic words Ben Franklin spoke. Franklin needs no memorial of stone, for he has a living one in our Constitution.

Alexander Hamilton's idea that the Constitution must be the supreme law of the land and that in union there is strength—Madison's great democratic principle that the will of the majority is nearly always right—and Ben Franklin's conviction that the controls of the Government must remain in the hands of the governed, are all great supporting beams in the structure of the constitutional Government of today.

One cannot pick three men out of this assembly of brilliant personages and state that, beyond all doubt, they were the leaders. George Washington, the brilliant general and statesman; Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, the sagacious Yankee lawyer; Robert Morris, of Pennsylvania, the financial backbone of the Colonies; Thomas Jefferson, absent from this assembly yet making his influence count for a minimum of government and a maximum of freedom—all these men and many others, were architects of the palace. When the document was completed, some hesitated to sign the charter because it didn't meet their views in every particular, and was, as Hamilton once said, "a bundle of compromises." However, most of the men realized that this step, if not perfect, led the right way toward attaining a government that would improve with years. These men little thought that from these Colonies would come forth the greatest nation in the world, a nation dedicated to the cherished belief that all men are created equal. How much we of today owe to those stalwart men who masterminded the building of our palace of liberties.

Once a structure is built, it must be maintained carefully and must sometimes be remodeled. The Constitution provides for the remodeling of itself through amendments, but it is up to us, the American citizens of today, to maintain and defend our Constitution against any nation or theory of government which attempts to force its will on free people. It is especially up to us, the youth of this Nation, to be on guard against any encroachment on our personal liberties by a foreign ideology. It is up to all of us—regardless of race, creed, or color, to band together in a common effort to defend the great fundamentals of democracy bequeathed to us as a sacred heritage by our gallant forefathers. Even now, the Communists are battering without and working as termites within, to undermine the strength of our palace. We dare not let them succeed.

Back in 1775 that eloquent statesman, Patrick Henry, flung the challenge that we of today must accept when he asked, "Is life so dear or peace so sweet as to be purchased by the price of chains or slavery?" We must answer with him, "Forbid it, Almighty God." May we, too, be willing to defend to death, if need be, the Constitution, our palace of liberties.

St. Lawrence Seaway Again

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the old economic monstrosity, the St. Lawrence seaway, is back with us again. It may be of interest to Members of Congress to read the following article that appeared in the January 3, 1951, issue of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat:

ST. LAWRENCE AGAIN

A new attempt will be made to put over on this country the discredited St. Lawrence seaway and power project. Members of the new Congress may expect a propaganda barrage urging approval of the project as a war measure. The New England States, so the propaganda line runs, need more electric power for war industries. The seaway is needed, we are told, to provide a submarine-safe passage for iron ore from Labrador to the Great Lakes.

The catch in this reasoning is that this country will have won or lost its security long before the project could be completed. In the meantime, money, material, and manpower urgently needed for mobilization would be diverted to a scheme which would ultimately benefit Canada far more than the United States.

There is nothing new about the hysteria for a St. Lawrence seaway, except the propaganda. The project has been before Congress since early in the twenties. It has been studied by congressional committees time and again—and each time has been decisively rejected. Its value as a transportation artery has been vastly overrated. Because it would be closed to navigation for at least 5 months out of the year, it has been called the world's greatest part-time transportation agency. The 27-foot channel proposed would be too shallow for 91 percent of the American merchant marine—a fact generally overlooked by those who urge its construction.

Governor Dewey, of New York, is for it—at least the power project—although it obviously would have an adverse effect upon the port of New York City. New York and the other New England States naturally would like to have the Federal Government—which includes Missouri taxpayers—finance cheap hydroelectric power for the industries of those States.

Every Congress in the last three decades has seen through the flimsy arguments for the seaway and power project. It is to be hoped the next Congress will be as wise. Certainly, it is against the national interest, as well as military security, to embark on so costly a scheme at this time.

Lenten Guideposts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following fine statement by Mr. Charles Spaulding, proving that men of good will, who truly believe in God's goodness and are obedient to His will, can succeed in the United States regardless of race, creed, or color in any locality North or South:

LENTEN GUIDEPOSTS—THE LAND OF THE FREE

(By Charles Spaulding, president of the North Carolina Mutual Life Insurance Co., Durham, N. C.)

My father was a slave, and I was born one of 14 children on a small cotton farm 75 years ago.

I have been president of a life insurance company that has about $140,000,000 worth of insurance in force, a bank that has $5,000,000 in resources; I have been a director of a bonding company, a building and loan association, and a fire insurance company, I have been a trustee of several universities, chairman of the board of a large hospital, and have been invited to conferences to the White House.

I recite these statistics, not to boast, but to show what can happen to a supposedly underprivileged Negro, not in Russia, but right here in America in the heart of the Southland where members of my race allegedly have the least chance to become successful.

Nothing grieves me more than to have a young man approach me with this sad attitude: "I'm nothing but a Negro. How can I ever amount to anything?"

I simply point to the successful careers of Booker T. Washington, Ralph Bunche, Jackie Robinson, Gen Benjamin O. Davis, Miss Marian Anderson, George Washington Carver, and Judge William H. Hastie.

My father, Benjamin Spaulding, taught me the most important lessons I ever learned about getting ahead in this country. He believed in the promise of America, which promise could be realized only by years of sweat, thrift, and enterprise. He never expected something for nothing.

In my youth we learned as much about living from the Bible as we did from schoolbooks. In fact, the Bible was taught in school, and I have always felt education took a great backward step when this practice was stopped. God could get along without me, I was told, but I would never amount to much without God.

I left the farm at 21 and came to Durham, N. C. where I could continue my education through the eighth grade. A full-grown man among kids, I studied my English and arithmetic while washing dishes for $10 a month in a hotel.

Soon after my graduation two men of my race—John Merrick (a barber) and A. M. Moore (a doctor)—asked me to manage an insurance company which they planned to start. They would provide the backing and policy; I the full-time hustle.

It was a bold idea, since an insurance company run by Negroes had never succeeded before, doubtless because of the inferiority complex our own people had about the executive ability of members of our race. Sales resistance was great.

We had 29 cents in assets when a make-or-break crisis occurred. One of the first men who signed up for a policy died. His widow promptly appeared and demanded the $40 due.

Mr. Merrick and Dr. Moore dug down in their pockets for the payment, determined that every claim be met instantly. It was a major moment for our firm, and the news spread like wildfire. Our credit rating soared. From then on our worst obstacles often turned out to be blessings in disguise.

In the years that followed we grew and expanded despite depressions and setbacks of every conceivable type. Mr. Merrick and Dr. Moore have long since died, but their integrity will always be a part of the organization.

Out of the growth of the business and my own growth as a man came many conclusions. One was: That for a business to realize its maximum potentialities, a combination of business and faith was needed. Every business reflects the integrity of its employees. And without faith that integrity is too often assaulted to hold up forever.

Some of my people blame the white man in the South for all their difficulties. There are always two sides to everything. In our earliest, darkest days, Washington Duke, the famed tobacco man, spent many hours giving pointers to our business; Judge W. R. Winston, the noted Carolina jurist, aided us with legal advice.

Then there was the incident in 1933 during the bank crisis. The State banking commissioner called several of Durham's leading bankers and said:

"Spaulding said he wants to open Monday morning. But what if they stage a real knockout run on him?"

Without exception the bankers replied: "Tell Spaulding that as long as we have money he will have it."

No prejudice there.

Faith helps me in my relationships with people, just as the Bible helps me in working out tough problems. My wife has always been able to say proudly: "There are no dusty Bibles in our house."

The first thing I do at work in the morning is to close the office door and open the Bible to the ninety-first Psalm. I believe in this Psalm as I believe in getting up in the morning.

Before each board meeting I stop outside the board room to ask myself this question: "Am I fit to be an executive?" This repeated check on humility always reminds me that I am an instrument of God. His ideas direct our company policy.

It doesn't make any difference where you are, God is there and can hear your prayers. I pray in what many would consider very odd places. For example, at home every time I finish taking a bath, while cleaning the tub, I say: "Lord, as I clean this tub, clean my heart." I want both to be as spotless as possible.

During the rest of my years I plan to spend time with young people in an effort to give them a vision—a conviction that the color of their skin has nothing to do with whether they are successful or not. Changing deeply planted ideas is hard, but not impossible.

It grieves me to see so many Negroes pull out of the South for the promised riches of the large northern cities. For that matter, there is often complete disillusionment and frustration for many people of all races who leave small community situations where they are doing well for the promised big-city gold.

There was the situation of the Negro farmer who lived outside of Durham. I'll call him Jeff Thomas. Jeff began to receive letters from his daughters in New York's Harlem, pleading that he sell his farm and move up with them. Jeff worked all his life for his farm; he loved every bit of it, yet finally the salesmanship of his daughters was too much.

Jeff sold his 20-acre farm for $2,000, much less than the farm was worth. Then he pulled up stakes and moved to Harlem.

What he found shocked and numbed him. His daughters, instead of living in a comfortable house, as he had been led to believe, had two rooms in a large run-down tenement. His home amounted to a small bed and bureau.

Within a year all his money was gone, and Jeff was a lonely, helpless figure amid a teeming multitude. He was a farmer in New York with not only no land to till, but hardly a tree or blade of grass within sight. It was a pitiful situation. And his case is multiplied many times today.

My credo is summed up in this prayer: "God, give me the serenity to accept what cannot be changed. * * * Give me the courage to change what can be changed. * * * And the wisdom to know one from the other."

Public Housing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTONI N. SADLAK
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Speaker, in the Monday morning, March 19 issue of the oldest newspaper of continuous publication in America, the Hartford (Conn.) Courant, there appeared an editorial commenting upon two public-housing situations which are causing the taxpayers to ask questions. Though these two instances may be isolated cases, it may be the forerunner of surveys and perhaps investigation amoung housing projects that may reveal other facts which have not been brought to light in connection with housing authorities. The editorial follows:

PUBLIC HOUSING REQUIRES CLOSE SCRUTINY

It becomes more evident every day that before a lot more of public money is sunk into public housing in Connecticut, somebody ought to give the whole situation a thorough going-over. In Danbury the five members of the Town Housing Authority resigned the other day. They were completely fed up with the families who, with plenty of money for television sets, were unable to keep up their rent payments. Thirty-one of the 40 families in the project were delinquent in their rent payments.

The other side of the coin is the long existing situation in Hartford. Neglect of Bellevue Square by the Hartford Housing Authority is now followed up by charges of tenants that their inquiries of local officials are met with insolence and sarcasm. The fact that Bellevue Square is now being given a thorough clean-up does not in the least change the complexion of things. Why was it permitted to get into such a state of disrepair?

Certainly it was not due to any lack of money. Figures indicate that more than $73,000 was charged off against maintenance of Bellevue Square last year. Tenants who live there might be interested to know that it is claimed that $1,400 a week has been spent there on maintaining the project. Of this more than $8,000 was spent for painting and decorating. Another $10,880 was allegedly spent on maintenance of grounds. More than $14,000 was spent for janitorial services and another $7,290 for heating labor.

The question certainly arises as to how it is possible to spend money at the rate of $1,400 a week and still, at the end of the year, to have a project that looks like an adjunct to the city dump. There is even an item of $2,331 for the operation of motor vehicles, gas, and oil. Coming on top of the charges of responsible State officials that the Hartford Housing Authority is greatly overstaffed, it seems obvious that investigation by some responsible public authority is long overdue. Or is this a completely autonomous little empire?

The Thirty-ninth Parallel Should Be the Line

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MIKE MANSFIELD
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, as the UN forces advance toward the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea, the question arises as to whether or not we should stop at that imaginary line.

Last November I urged that a buffer area be created along the Manchurian-Korean frontier; that the UN troops stop short of it and that the buffer area be occupied by South Korean troops. Since that time, conditions have changed markedly. I now wish to urge that the UN forces advance as far as the thirty-eighth parallel and stop there so that the original Republic of South Korea can once again be established in its own right. I further recommend that South Korean forces be sent into the area north of the thirty-eighth parallel up to the thirty-ninth parallel so a defense line can be established which will increase the defensive strength of South Korea and establish a status quo which can be maintained. Furthermore, if and when this is done, a warning should be issued against any further attempts to disturb the situation as thereby created. A move to the thirty-ninth parallel by South Korean forces and a declaration of maintainance of the status quo will, in my opinion, be a long step toward stopping Stalin's plans to involve us in an all-out war in Asia; it will allow the UN to start rebuilding South Korea and will have served notice to the world that aggression does not pay.

It might be well to point out that recent remarks by both Gen. Douglas MacArthur and Gen. Matthew B. Ridgway indicate that in their minds there is no longer any serious thought of attempting to liberate all of Korea. General Ridgway has stated "if the Korean war ends at the parallel, it would still be a tremendous victory for the United Nations."

Mr. Speaker, the most important result of the Korean war to date is that not since it began have the Russians or any of their satellites launched any other act of territorial aggression. This does not mean that they will not do so but the fact remains that they have not done so. Perhaps one of the reasons for this is because not one but a number of nations have stood up and insisted that aggression be resisted. Russia, with her Communist Chinese and North Korean allies, has not been allowed to win a cheap and swift victory. It is too soon, perhaps, to say that the war in Korea has prevented a world war but it seems safe to assume that our resistance in Korea has put off a general war and has won for us time to build up our strength and to continue to work to prevent a world war. We have had to pay a high price to put down aggression in Korea but we have pointed out to the Russians that a satellite cannot commit an act of aggression with immunity. The North Koreans and the Communist Chinese have gained nothing except a frightful loss of life and prestige. While the unification of all Korea is the ultimate possibility in that part of the Far East, yet, it is of greater importance to us that we discourage the Russian bloc from further adventures which would sooner or later launch an atomic war.

Oil and Gas Tax Depletion Allowance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 13, 1951

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement I made before the Ways and Means Committee in opposition to the reduction of the 27½-percent oil and gas tax depletion allowance, March 19, 1951:

Mr. Chairman, to satisfy the appetite of this administration for more taxes, the President is again asking for a reduction of the oil and gas depletion tax allowance which has worked successfully and to the benefit of this Nation for many years.

If the administration is successful, less oil and gasoline will be produced, which will cause the price to rise, and every citizen will pay more for every gallon of oil or gasoline he buys, whether it is for his car, his tractor, or fuel oil to heat his home. It will not only affect the oil producer and farmer who may have oil, it will nick the pocketbook of all of our citizens. It will weaken our national defense and will cause everyone to pay more taxes, rather than less.

The President has referred to the oil and gas depletion allowance as a tax loophole that should be plugged. I submit if there is no loophole, there is nothing to plug.

This committee and the Congress in 1926 after a thorough study of the entire problem found this percentage method was more practical to administer, was fair and just, placed all taxpayers on an equal basis, and wrote the 27½-percent depletion allowance into the law.

In the subsequent Revenue Act of 1934, this committee and the Congress reviewed carefully the experience under the percentage depletion provisions. It had proved satisfactory during the 8 years and was continued in the act unchanged.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in 1936, when the revenue act was again reviewed, testified before the House Ways and Means Committee, that the Treasury Department, with regard to the depletion provisions, "would not want to see any change." Congress made no change in these provisions.

Then again in considering the Revenue Act of 1942, the depletion provisions received a most comprehensive and detailed review by your committee and the Congress. The success of these provisions in assuring adequate oil supplies for World War II was demonstrated conclusively and the provisions were continued.

Again, only a year ago the President and the Secretary of the Treasury recommended a reduction of the 27½-percent depletion allowance. Your committee held full and complete hearings which brought out all of the facts and voted to maintain the 27½-percent depletion.

Throughout the past 25 years of trial and experience this depletion allowance has proven, beyond question, to be a necessary and effective means of assuring an increasing oil supply essential to the Nation's economic progress, industrial expansion, and for our national defense.

It has proven there is no loophole to plug—no one is cheating the Government out of a dollar in taxes because of this depletion allowance.

The Congress knew it was not a tax loophole when they wrote it into the law. Their review of this provision in several subsequent tax bills has confirmed the wisdom of the members of this committee and the Congress.

The Congress, in writing this provision into the law, sought to protect the oil owner or producer from being compelled to pay an income tax on his capital investment.

The Congress also realized that this depletion allowance was necessary as an incentive for further exploration and production of oil in an expanding economy.

The question was raised before the Ways and Means Committee in the hearings last year as to whether the oil industry was spending the 27½ percent for exploration and drilling of new wells.

In response to that question Mr. R. B. Anderson, president of the Texas division of the Mid-Continent Oil and Gas Association, appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee on February 14, 1950, and I quote excerpts from his testimony.

Mr. Anderson said, "a detailed survey has just been completed of a group of large oil companies including all of the so-called major companies in the industry for a 12-year period from 1936 to 1947 inclusive. The survey shows that this group of companies spent more in their effort to find new oil reserves than the total percentage depletion allowed for the same period, or $1,833,000,000 more in their efforts to find new oil than the total additional taxes they would have paid without the depletion percentage.

"The total sum expended by this group of companies during the period, including both expiration and development, was $5,541,829,000; or more than twice the percentage depletion allowed."

Continuing Mr. Anderson said: "It is the necessary incentive to the oil and gas producer whether large or small to plow back his funds in the search for new and essential reserves.

"It is also the incentive for new and risk capital from outside sources to be expended in the search for new and additional oil reserves.

"The facts shown by the survey are conclusive evidence that these provisions have done what they were intended to do and that the larger producers are as dependent upon the percentage depletion provision as are the smaller operators in their continuous search for oil."

I submit, that the foregoing statement by such an eminent authority as Mr. Anderson proves that the depletion allowance is justified, necessary, and is being used as the Congress intended, for the expansion of exploration and oil development.

OIL PAYS FULL SHARE OF TAXES

It is utterly fallacious to consider the present 27½-percent rate of depletion on oil production as unjustified or excessive. The petroleum industry has always paid its fair share of taxes, and in my opinion is now paying more than its proportionate share.

Mr. Chairman, if this depletion allowance is reduced, it will ultimately close down hundreds of thousands of stripper wells which are at present producing over a million barrels of oil a day. Industry and national defense will lose this oil now so much needed.

More seriously than this, all of these millions of barrels of oil will be left in the ground never to be recovered.

I do not believe this committee or the Congress will allow this to happen. It will almost completely stop what is known as wildcat drilling throughout the Nation. By this I refer to the little oilmen who cannot continue to finance their drilling without this depletion allowance.

EIGHTY-TWO PERCENT DRY HOLES

It is these small producers on whom this Nation is dependent for increasing supplies of oil. They drill 75 percent of the so-called wildcat wells, which are those drilled in unexplored areas for new reserves. Eighty-two percent of the wildcat wells drilled in the United States last year were nonproductive.

ILLINOIS, SEVEN OUT OF EIGHT DRY

In Illinois alone last year the industry drilled 810 exploratory wells, of which 700, or approximately 7 out of every 8, were dry and abandoned.

A DANGEROUS GAMBLE

On a gamble to obtain $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 in taxes the administration proposal would strike a blow which would kill the incentive to explore for new oil reserves in our country. This is no time to take such a dangerous gamble.

Demand for petroleum has risen 750,000 barrels a day in the past year. Due to the present war emergency the oil industry is right now facing a gigantic task. The Petroleum Administration for Defense is asking the oil industry to further increase its production by 1,000,000 barrels daily.

WE NEED GREATER PRODUCTION

What we need is more exploring for oil, more new oil wells brought in and greater production. If this depletion allowance is reduced, we will have less oil. Then oil will join the ranks of inflation with higher prices per gallon for gasoline and oil and will cost the American taxpayers more than the $300,000,000 in taxes sought in increased prices of oil and gasoline. It will weaken the industrial power of our country, weaken the power of our military machine, and endanger the defense of all of the people.

Let us look at the remarkable record of the oil industry in World War II. It achieved miracles in supplying our Armed Forces. It did so on its own. At the same time, it was necessary that the Government subsidize many other basic and essential industries to achieve the desired production. If we tamper with the time-tested tax base as applied to petroleum, within the year we may find it necessary to subsidize the drilling of oil wells.

I should like to pose this question: Which is more important—assurance of a continued oil exploration program sufficient to meet our military and essential civilian demand in any event, or the return of a relatively few additional dollars in the public Treasury? That is the choice which now faces the Congress.

This ill-considered attack on the rate of depletion is a direct blow at our very security. But it goes beyond that. We must consider that the economic and governmental structures in some 20 States are vitally affected. The health of the oil industry influences the economic well-being in at least 12 of our major producing States.

PRICES OF OIL LOWER THAN 30 YEARS AGO

The average price of gasoline in 1949 was 20.47 cents per gallon as compared to 29.74 cents in 1920—an actual reduction of 9.27 cents while during this period the quality of petroleum products has improved manyfold. Also during this period, gasoline taxes were increased more than 10 times.

ILLINOIS OIL PRODUCTION

I have lived close to the oil industry in Illinois. In my district are thousands of independent oil producers, among whom are many operators of stripper or marginal wells. In Illinois there are thousands of such wells with a daily average production of 2½ barrels of oil a day. All will be closed down without the depletion allowance and the oil will be lost forever.

THOUSANDS OF DRY HOLES

Many people are led to believe all is profit and riches for those engaged in the oil business. The facts show a different picture. Out of 6,785 exploratory or wildcat wells drilled in Illinois from 1937 to 1950, inclusive, 6,389 were dry and only 306 produced oil.

The loss or cost in drilling the 6,389 dry wells was $95,835,000. No one gives publicity to these staggering losses of these men who are willing to risk their money, these free enterprisers who might well be referred to as the last of the vanishing rugged pioneers who are willing to struggle and sacrifice to win success by their own efforts.

Members of the committee, I would like to point out that the oil industry paid in State and Federal taxes last year $3,551,370,000. This does not include many of the taxes below the State level and does not include income taxes paid by the great body of men employed in the oil industry or probably $500,000,000 in addition.

In addition many States, through their legislatures are raising the taxes on the oil industry, and the President and the Secretary of the Treasury are asking this committee of the Congress now to increase Federal gasoline tax from 1½ cents to 3 cents which would add an additional tax burden of over $500,000,000 a year.

I am informed that the average gasoline State tax is 6 cents a gallon. Federal and State taxes on gasoline now produce a total revenue of about $2,500,000,000. This reaches an approximate grand total of over $4,500,000,000 resulting from the oil industry. This does not include many further millions the oil and gas industry will have to pay because of the increased corporate and excess-profits taxes.

If we continue to heap unbearable taxes on the oil and gas industry, we will destroy one of the most powerful branches of our economy, slow down the industry of the Nation at a time when it is necessary to expand it, and weaken our national defense on which we are now spending countless billions of dollars to build up.

If the administration is successful in reducing this depletion allowance, it will so reduce oil production in this Nation that instead of scraping the bottom of the barrel and getting $300,000,000 more in taxes, they will probably lose $500,000,000 in taxes that would normally flow into the Treasury if the oil business is allowed to continue to expand in the future as it has in the past.

Mr. Chairman, the oil industry has made a remarkable contribution to all of the people in the Nation. It is a splendid example of competitive enterprise. Millions of people have invested billions of dollars in the oil and gas industry, making it possible to carry its services to every citizen of the Nation.

Those in directing the management of these organizations continue to spend billions of dollars each year in the further expansion of this great industry which expands our national economy and which renders the people a better service and brings employment to countless millions of them in addition to helping furnish the finest transportation in the world to our people.

Few people realize that gasoline, oil products, and natural gas and oil to power the industries of our country are being furnished to all of the people at a lesser price than they were 25 years ago.

Let me point out again that the average price of a gallon of gasoline in 1920 was 29.7 cents a gallon without any tax. Leaving off present taxes the average price of a gallon of regular gasoline on July 1, 1950, was 20.4 cents. In other words, because of the great exploration, production, and supply of oil, gasoline, and gas during the past number of years, your gasoline is delivered to you by the oil industry at about 9 cents a gallon less than 30 years ago.

It is the Government, both State and National, that adds the extra average of about 6 cents in taxes a gallon and not the oil industry.

Think what it would mean to the people if all other industries would have held the prices of their products down to the people, as the oil and gas industry has done. If they had, we would not have the ruinous inflation that is upon us today. By comparison, the Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that the general cost of living has gone up in this same period 44½ percent. Again, let's make a comparison. Oil produced and delivered to the filling stations of the Nation today is 9 cents a gallon less than 30 years ago, while all other commodities are up a general average of 44½ percent.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY THOUSAND MILES OF PIPELINE

Few people realize that throughout the days and nights, the weeks and months, that billions of barrels of oil due to the foresight and good management of those directing the oil and gasoline industry, flow underground to distribution points all over the United States through 120,000 miles of great oil pipelines—yes, delivering it at lower prices to the distributor than it cost 30 years ago.

NINETY-EIGHT THOUSAND MILES OF GAS PIPELINES

That likewise the oil and gas industry through the same business foresight has 98,000 miles of big gas pipelines which carry the gas underground to power thousands of great industries throughout the United States and to furnish heat for millions of homes. Yes, and at a lower price than was charged for gas many years ago.

WHO BENEFITS?

All the people are benefited by an adequate supply of oil and gas which keeps the price of these products at the lowest possible level. It is not a few oil men who benefit. They only get their legitimate tax rights under the Constitution. It is the 150,000 people who reap the benefits, and it is the United States Treasury that benefits in billions of dollars in taxes collected from this great industry.

CHICAGO AREA BENEFITS

All cities, industrial and farm areas benefit. By illustration, may I refer to Chicago and its trade territory. What an adequate supply means to that vast trade area.

The people of the city of Chicago use more fuel oil, natural gas, and gasoline than any other city in the world.

The farm trade territory of the city of Chicago embracing seven States constitutes the largest rural market for petroleum products in the world.

The greatest saturation of automobiles, tractors, and motorized farm equipment in the world is found in this area.

The largest per capita use of petroleum products in the world is in the area of these seven States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Michigan, Indiana, Iowa, and Nebraska.

The petroleum and natural-gas industry has furnished these products in this great productive locality in such abundance that the price of natural gas today is cheaper than it was 10 years ago, and the price of gasoline before Government taxes are added is 9 cents a gallon less than it was 30 years ago, and gives the consumer, through its refinement and improvement, 50 percent more power than it did 30 years ago.

Certainly, the Government should not be permitted to slow down the service to our people, and the march of progress of the great oil and gas industry.

The oil and gas industry which employs millions of men as a rule pays the highest standard wages and seldom do you ever hear of a strike in the oil and gas fields that amounts to anything worthy of mention.

It is a mistake for the Federal Government to bog down and slow down this great essential industry by tampering with the 27½-percent depletion allowance which would reduce supply of these essential products and drive them on the escalator of inflation by governmental interference.

It would be a tragic blunder if this depletion were reduced, which would weaken and endanger the national defense of our country. I feel certain that the Ways and Means Committee in its wisdom will again refuse to reduce this depletion allowance, and I feel certain the Members of the Congress will applaud such action on the part of the Ways and Means Committee.

Let us not kill the goose that lays the golden eggs.

Let us not temporize with or endanger the security and defense of our Nation in these perilous times.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, American investors owe a debt of gratitude to the St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Times for the warning given in a series of articles now being published in that great newspaper.

Mr. Richard S. Lewis, Star-Times staff writer, has performed a fine public service as author of the articles which describe in detail the operations of a group who seek to funnel American capital into gold-brick promotions. Working with mailing lists of potential American investors, these promoters undoubtedly have many victims for their nefarious schemes. Thanks to the investigations of Mr. Lewis for the Star-Times, they are now being exposed and thousands of investors are being saved from loss of investment capital.

This series of articles should have the widest circulation throughout the country. I am hopeful that other newspapers will call attention to this stock-promotion racket as a result of the Star-Times exposure. The St. Louis newspaper is to be congratulated for this unusual public service. I am sure this series of articles will be listed high among the outstanding newspaper contributions for 1951.

With my remarks I include the following article which is one of the series which I have mentioned:

(By Richard S. Lewis)

TORONTO, ONTARIO.—This is the story of how an American fugitive from justice who jumped $40,000 bond in New York City 3 years ago masterminds gold mine and oil promotions here today.

He is Albert Edward DePalma, age 50. Thirty years ago, he sold knitted ties in St. Louis. When this venture failed, he became a waiter at Autenrieth's restaurant in Clayton. It used to be across the street from the courthouse.

From St. Louis, he went East. He sold used cars for a while in Brooklyn.

Born in Capetown, South Africa, DePalma was brought to the United States at the age of 2 by his parents and reared in Savannah, Ga. He never made much money in the United States.

Then he went to Toronto and got into the mail order stock racket. Today he is regarded as one of the wealthiest men in this city.

Like a number of other promoters here, DePalma cannot set foot in the United States without risking arrest. He jumped bail after he was indicted in Cleveland in 1947 on 14 counts of mail fraud in connection with his promotion of Novell Porcupine Gold Mines, Ltd. and Peg Tantalum Mines.

DePalma ranks high on the United States Securities and Exchange Commission's list of most wanted swindlers. The Canadian Government protects him from United States authorities by refusing extradition. Although DePalma has been denied a broker-dealer license here, his stock promotions are peddled by fronts who are licensed broker-dealers.

These broker-dealers are peddling stocks in the same gold and tantalum mine promotions which were the basis of the Cleveland mail fraud indictments in 1947, and in addition, they are handling an oil issue which the United States SEC also finds to be a phony.

They are Victor H. Waddell, suite 26, of 29 Melinda Street; Frank Shea, 221 Victoria Street, and William A. Deering, 71 King Street West, all of Toronto.

These three are currently licensed broker-dealers in good standing with the Ontario Securities Commission. They are also members of the Broker-Dealer Association, the outfit which does not like the laws of the United States.

In addition to these fronts, DePalma has been represented in the past by J. F. Wright, who was licensed as a broker-dealer in April 1949, at suite 110, 221 Victoria Street, but who is no longer a licensed broker-dealer.

Another DePalma stooge was Robert C. H. Mitchell whose license as a broker-dealer was cancelled by the Ontario Securities Commission on January 13, 1948. The Commission declared Mitchell to be a front for DePalma.

The mining ventures which led to the Cleveland indictments—Peg Tantalum Mines and Novell Porcupine Gold Mines, Ltd.—are still current. The SEC investigation shows that Novell Porcupine Gold Mines, Ltd., permitted its claims to lapse after DePalma's indictment. In May 1949 the claims were restaked on behalf of J. F. Wright and on September 23, 1949, Palamino Gold Mines, Ltd., was formed and took over Wright's claims.

Wright became the president of Palamino, according to the 1950 Canadian Mines Handbook, at the same time he was promoting its stock as a broker-dealer.

All through 1949–50 Palamino circulars were pouring into the Midwest, offering 25 shares of stock per person (no more) at $1 a share.

This is a typical DePalma promotion technique. In 1946, when DePalma was promoting Novell Porcupine by flying around the United States in his private airplane with his name printed all over it, he permitted each sucker to purchase only $10 worth of stock.

Palamino promotional circulars kept referring to the fact that a big company called Progress Diversified Minerals, Ltd., was sinking $1,000,000 in some property adjacent to the Palamino site in the Yellowknife mining district.

Progress Diversified, according to the promotion, had been working a property which Wright, himself, had purchased from an old prospector in 1944 on the basis of "striking samples" of ore.

The fact that Progress Diversified and Palamino were two angles of the same promotion is not stated in the literature, but it happens to be the case. DePalma admitted that much to me.

Not long after United States postal fraud orders began flying at Wright and Palamino, DePalma ended its career and formed a new company called Indigo Consolidated Gold Mines, Ltd., in which both Palamino and Progress Diversified were merged.

From Novell Porcupine to Palamino and Progress Diversified to Indigo, the SEC and the United States Post Office have kept up with DePalma all the way.

Indigo, in the opinion of SEC and postal investigators, was a device to evade the fraud order issued against Palamino, since both Shea and Waddell were asking suckers to send their remittances to Indigo.

Shea and Waddell told the suckers that stock shares, selling to the public at 70 cents, would soon sell for $5. They did not mention the fact, however, that DePalma was purchasing these shares from the mine treasury for 25 cents.

The broker-dealers also advised mailing lists that Indigo was in production and making money and that the mine adjoined the famous Noranda mine, whose vein runs into Indigo property.

Mining Engineer Benjamin Adelstein, of the SEC, reported that Indigo's mine is 1,700 miles away from Noranda, that insufficient ore has been encountered at Indigo to show a feasible commercial operation, and that there is no present reasonable basis for assuming the venture will be profitable.

Indigo appeared on the scene last year, however, as a brand-new promotion as far as St. Louisans knew. DePalma's name was not connected with it.

Indeed, this was the reason he changed the name, he told me.

The stock promotion was handled by Waddell and Shea. Both advised prospective clients that for each share of stock outstanding there was $4 of ore indicated at a depth of only 500 feet on a mere one-sixth of the company's vein structure. The SEC found these claims untrue.

Broker-Dealer William A. Deering also got into the act. His advertising literature last month represented that work on Indigo's properties had reached the stage where the ore zone would be reached last September.

According to the SEC investigation, Deering told suckers that arrangements had been made to list Indigo on the Toronto Stock Exchange at $2 a share.

In reviewing the Indigo case prior to issuing a fraud order against it November 24, 1950, Trial Examiner Daniel J. Kelly asserted that no application has ever been made to list Indigo on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

DePalma swore it was listed, but he delisted it himself. He was vague about the reason.

Examiner Kelly also made the point that Indigo's property is in an inaccessible area of the Yellowknife district, served only by airplane and tractor train in the winter.

This would create unusually high costs for operations and mill installation, he commented.

In addition to Indigo, DePalma's broker-dealer fronts were active in promoting his oil stocks in the Petromine Exploration & Finance Co., Ltd.

In Post Office fraud order No. 42707, issued March 16, 1950, Trial Examiner James C. Haynes, Jr., said the broker-dealer concern of Waddell & Co. "is engaged in conducting a scheme for obtainng money through the United States mails by means of pretenses, representations, and promises that are knowingly false and fraudulent."

The SEC report stated that Petromine shares were peddled by long-distance telephone and mail in the United States by Waddell on such representations as—

It was the largest independent oil producer in western Canada.

It owns the richest quarter section of the Lloydminster field.

That seven Petromine wells are the finest commercial producing wells in the area.

That Petromine wells flow fairly well on their own, but to control the wells they are pumped.

The SEC reported that in truth and fact Petromine was not the largest independent producer in western Canada; that it did not own the richest quarter section in the Lloydminster field; that its seven wells are not even good commercial producing wells and that the oil has to be pumped in order to squeeze it out of the ground.

The SEC found untrue the claim that application had been made to list Petromine shares on the stock exchange here. It found untrue the claim that all funds derived from stock sales went into the company treasury to develop the well.

Instead, the SEC found the company treasury received 20 cents out of each share sold to the public for 50 to 75 cents. "This mark-up of 150 to 300 percent a share was distributed among the promoter, underwriter, dealers, and salesmen," the SEC report said.

"Waddell's representation that Petromine was a safe and sound investment is absolutely false," the SEC said.

Because of bank loans outstanding and limited production from its well, Petromine assets are likely to be taken over by creditors.

"The resultant loss to investors will be 100 percent of the purchase price of their shares," the SEC report said.

The St. Lawrence Seaway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from a constituent of mine:

SUFFERN, N. Y., March 15, 1951.

Hon. KATHARINE ST. GEORGE,
House of Representatives, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. ST. GEORGE: Recently the House Public Works Committee has been conducting hearings on the various resolutions proposing the completion of the perennial boondoggling St. Lawrence seaway and power project, now garbed in the cloak of a defense measure.

I am opposed to several phases of the bill, particularly that part covering the St. Lawrence seaway, as I am convinced, contrary to the blandishments of the sponsors of the bill, that the project is for defense purposes, that it will not add one iota to national defense, Governor Dewey and all the proponents to the contrary notwithstanding. It is not in reality a defense measure at all, and I am deeply concerned by this insistence to spend vast sums of money, great quantities of materials and millions of manhours, which will have to be diverted from our defense requirements and be dissipated on projects which will be detrimental rather than beneficial.

How much this part of the subject bill will cost to complete no one seems to know, even approximately. Reliable engineers 10 years ago—when the matter was under consideration and when costs were considerably lower—estimated the cost at from $800,000,000 to $1,350,000,000. If then, as is usually the case with public projects of this type, the cost of building the St. Lawrence seaway runs true to form, and in this day when the "squanderbund" is in the saddle, the final costs will reach staggering proportions. In support of this contention, I point to the final cost of the Panama Canal, the highest cost estimate of which was placed at $160,000,000 by a well-known and reliable engineer, but which actually cost the Nation $375,000,000 before it was completed, or 134 percent more than the highest estimated cost.

I am, however, in perfect accord with the building and cost of the Panama Canal, since it was actually built for and has proven to be one of the most important links in our chain of national defense.

Besides being opposed to this bill on the grounds that this is not the time for nondefense expenditures, particularly at a time when it is apparent that real defense requirements are seriously straining the economy of the people, I oppose this scheme on the grounds of being directly detrimental to the living standards of a great part of the American people, especially those living in the North Atlantic States.

That this letter may not assume too large proportions, I am attaching hereto for handy reference a list of 17 reasons why I oppose the passage of this nefarious bill and pray that you, in the interest of every American, will vote against this insidious measure when it comes before the House.

Very respectfully yours,

G. J. GARDNER.

SEVENTEEN REASONS WHY THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY SHOULD NOT BE BUILT

1. It will slow up our war efforts in Korea by directing to the project enormous quantities of steel, lumber, cement, machinery, explosives, and other materials now so urgently needed.

2. It will slow up our defense efforts by diverting manpower so vitally needed for essential industry at this time, and may prove to be disastrous.

3. In the event of invasion, and the best authorities say it is possible, it will be difficult to defend.

4. Only 5 percent of American ships of 2,000 tons or over could be operated through the seaway.

5. Only 30 percent of foreign ships of 2,000 tons or over could use the seaway.

6. Only smaller ships of our Navy could use the seaway.

7. In this time of strain upon our national finances, it will require many millions of dollars to prepare our lake ports for this type of navigation service.

8. Weather conditions will permit the use of the seaway for only 8 months or less each year.

9. Out of the money spent of our tax dollars only 6 percent would be for the benefit of American workmen and shipping.

10. It will reduce employment in many of the major industries of the United States.

11. It will tend to reduce the earnings of American marine workmen millions of dollars annually.

12. It will skyrocket the already high cost of living.

13. It will increase our taxes by untold millions of dollars each year.

14. It will subsidize foreign workmen, shipping and factories at the expense of American workmen and industries.

15. It will place American workmen in competition with cheap foreign labor.

16. It will place an intolerable burden on American workmen and industry for all time to come and without hope of benefit.

17. It will do irreparable harm to all of the North Atlantic ports established at such great cost, especially that of New York City in our own State, and make for unemployment on a huge scale, not to mention destroying the railroads within our State borders, now struggling for survival.

West Point Appointment System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. W. (PAT) KEARNEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. KEARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I have before me a clipping from a newspaper which complains about the system of appointing candidates to the United States Military Academy at West Point.

WEST POINT APPOINTMENT SYSTEM HIT

BUFFALO, March 17.—The West Point Society of Western New York wants more enlisted men—and fewer friends of politicians—given a chance to attend the United States Military Academy.

"The number of (cadet) appointments available for enlisted men of the Armed Forces should be very materially increased," said a statement in connection with local observance today of the academy's one hundred forty-ninth anniversary.

"This increase could be immediately brought about by transferring at least 1,062, or half of the appointments now available to Senators and Representatives, to the Armed Forces."

The statement was approved by the society's board of governors. The society is an alumni group.

Having Congressmen appoint most of the West Point cadets, as at present, is "to a great extent just another form of political patronage," the statement said.

The West Point Society of Western New York believes in the appointment of more enlisted men and fewer friends of politicians. They believe the number of appointments available for enlisted men of the Armed Forces should be materially increased. I believe so, too. But I wish the West Point Society of Western New York would advise me as to the number of their members who were appointed to the Academy by their several Congressmen. It would make interesting reading, I am sure, in view of their resolution concerning appointments. But you see, my colleagues, they are out of the service, either by resignation, retirement or otherwise.

But to have this group, or any other similar group, complain that "having Congressmen appoint most of the West Point cadets, as at present, is to a great extent just another form of political patronage" is interesting, to say the least.

The resolution of the West Point alumni could, in my humble opinion go still further with further provision that the academy be more interested in obtaining lads who desire to make the Army their life's career instead of looking for prominent football and other qualified athletes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I include herewith one of a series of articles which have been appearing in the St. Louis (Mo.) Star-Times, exposing the operations of a stock promotion group in Canada which has been preying upon unsuspecting American investors. The Star-Times is performing a great public service in exposing these operations.

The article follows:

(By Richard S. Lewis)

TORONTO, ONTARIO.—The letter we received last November 13 from Leader Securities, Ltd., of 88 Richmond Street West, fairly glowed with promise.

"We are pleased to have you with us as a participant in the promising future of Treasure Rouyn Mines, Ltd.," it said. "The response to our offering of these shares has been overwhelmingly enthusiastic. Judging by the number of reservations received, there is every indication that a substantial oversubscription will result."

Approximately 15,000 persons in the Middle Western States received the same letter we did. It was followed by a second letter urging us to immediate action in sending in our check for 500 shares of Treasure Rouyn stock at 30 cents a share.

"Substantial wealth has accrued in many fortunate individuals by the tremendous growth of Canada's mining industry," the second letter said. "We believe these profits will be more than surpassed in the future."

This, in turn, was followed by expensively prepared literature indicating how our fortune would be made by investing in an aggressive mining company exploiting the wealth of the Noranda mining district of Quebec.

Included was a small publication called Mining News and Market Digest, which featured an article on the front page headlined: "Treasure Rouyn plans completed for early start on new program."

Underneath was a picture of a gold miner drilling in a tunnel. There were other pictures, one entitled "Winter in a Mining Camp," which showed a group of miners standing around outside snow-covered log cabins.

Another showed a mining head frame under construction. None of these had anything to do with the Treasure Rouyn mine, but they were instructive.

We also received a little booklet entitled "Mine Making Portrayed." This, like the four-page Mining News and Market Digest, was sent to us with the compliments of our broker, Leader Securities, Ltd. It showed how mines are dug and gave us a brief history of the Canadian mining industry.

When we did not send in our check, we received another letter from Leader on December 11. The tone was a little different.

"Due, no doubt, to pressure of other business," it said, "you have omitted to forward your check in the amount of $150 Canadian funds, or $142.50 American funds, covering our statement of your account relative to the purchase of 500 shares of Treasure Rouyn Mines, Ltd."

It went on to say that the company was anxious to adjust our stock position, and our immediate remittance was to our own advantage.

All this we got from Leader Securities for a penny post card we sent in asking for information. We haven't received any more dunning letters asking for $150 we never agreed to put up in the first place, but we do continue to receive more propaganda. Leader is trying to sell us some cobalt now.

This is somewhat typical of the way the moose pasture promoters here besiege you with literature and attempt to make you believe you actually owe them money. We got the long-distance-telephone treatment, too. Everybody does.

Let's examine this proposition.

In the first place, Leader Securities Ltd., of which one Lionel Richmond is president, became the subject of United States postal fraud order No. 42687 on March 13, 1950—8 months before we were solicited.

The fraud order was written because of misrepresentation made in regard to the possibility of making profits out of Treasure Rouyn Mines.

The purpose of the postal fraud order is to prevent mail from the United States reaching its Toronto destination. But our postal card asking more information got through this barrier.

Maybe that's because it was addressed to "Accounts Department," suite 101 at 88 Richmond Street, west. The postal fraud order lists Leader's address as suite 305 at 88 Richmond Street, west. Leader simply switched offices in the same building to confuse and confound the United States postal authorities.

But the Post Office caught up with this maneuver on Sept. 12, 1950. It issued a supplemental fraud order covering suite 101 as well as suite 305.

Then Leader dodged again. They sent us a self-addressed envelope in feminine handwriting in which they wanted us to send our "cheque."

The address was: "Cashiers Department, suite 101, 90 Richmond Street, west."

Dodging the United States postal fraud orders here is as easy as rolling off a mail sack. There was no indication on the return envelope to indicate the address was Leader Securities.

This is not the legal address of Leader Securities. But that's where this outfit picks up much of its mail from the United States.

Having seen how Leader bamboozles the United States Post Office, let's see how they are trying to take us for a ride with their gold mine.

Without the permission of the Ontario Securities Commission, it would not be possible for Leader or any of the other broker-dealers here to pull these shenanigans.

According to the official bulletin of the Ontario Commission, an organization calling itself Baylord Securities, Ltd., agreed to purchase 250,000 of Treasure-Rouyn stock at 5 cents a share on June 27, 1949.

In February, 1950, the record shows that Baylord and the mining company agreed to cancel this agreement in favor of a new agreement. Under it, Baylord entered into the purchase of 10,000 shares at 10 cents a share and was granted options on 1,240,000 shares, of which the first 490,000 shares were to sell also at 10 cents and the rest as ascending prices ranging from 12, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35, 40 to 50 cents a share.

What Baylord agreed to do, in brief, was to sell 500,000 shares to the public and pay the mine treasury 10 cents for each share. Only the first 10,000 shares required cash on the barrelhead.

Now Baylord Securities is not a licensed broker-dealer in Ontario. It operates as an underwriter and it had to find a licensed broker-dealer to promote the stock to the public.

Accordingly in July of 1950, Baylord was granted permission by the Ontario Commission to give Leader Securities a suboption on the shares at a half-cent mark-up per share.

This agreement was modified on August 29 when Leader took options on 1,115,000 shares. It was to purchase these from the treasury at 12 cents a share for 456,000 shares and the remainder at ascending prices up to 50 cents.

What all this adds up to is that Leader was offering to sell us 500 shares at 30 cents a share—for which it paid a wholesale price of $10\frac{1}{2}$ to 12 cents per share. This was a bargain, according to the promotion ethics here.

Under the broker-dealer association code Leader could have charged 34 to 36 cents a share, and indeed advertised in the Mining News and Market Digest it was asking 34 cents.

At this point it should be explained that the Mining News and Market Digest is not an independent publication, but one of the myriad propaganda devices published by the promoters themselves to create an illusion of publicity which they cannot get in any respectable newspaper either in the United States or Canada, except through articles exposing their operations.

How is this price of 30 cents a share set?

Treasure Rouyn stock is not listed on any market. There is no trading in it. There is no bid price.

It started out at 5 cents a share wholesale when it was first promoted by Baylord. It went up to 10 cents under a new agreement alleged to have been made between Baylord and the mining company.

Then Leader got into the act and decided to see if it could get 30 cents for the stock.

The value of Treasure Rouyn today appears to exist in the minds of the promoters—and the suckers if the promoters can make them believe it.

That the promoters and the broker-dealer are the same people is evident by the fact that the executive office of the mining company is in the same suite in the same building as Leader Securities, Ltd.

The Canadian Mines Handbook, an authoritative listing of current and abandoned mining properties in Canada, lists the concern as having 32 claims in Rouyn and Beauchastel Townships, northwestern Quebec.

Development of the property, the Handbook shows, up to March 1950, consisted of a geophysical survey which was in progress at that time. This was to be followed by diamond drilling to determine if any gold is to be found in the property.

The fact that the stock-selling deal was all set up nearly a year before the geophysical survey was made or any diamond drilling got under way is made clear by the records.

The fact that the SEC and the Post Office have found this promotion to be based on fraud also is a matter of record.

But the Ontario Securities Commission makes such promotions as this legal. The result is that in defiance of United States postal fraud orders, Lionel Richmond, of Richmond St., West, Toronto, is not only promoting fraudulent stock in St. Louis through the mail, but trying to dun suckers who even indicate some curiosity in his promotion.

Government Extravagance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM E. HESS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Western Hills Press, Cheviot, Ohio, of March 16, 1951:

GOVERNMENT EXTRAVAGANCE—COUPLE OF EXAMPLES THAT ARE NOT HEARSAY

Many stories of profligate extravagance on the part of the Federal Government are told, some so fantastic that the average housewife who diligently shops from store to store to save a few pennies to stay within an inflation-riddled budget or that the average small businessman who turns out a light in an effort to keep expenses inside of income find them hard to believe.

But occasionally, each of us comes across personal examples that cannot be denied. Thus, to the editor's desk came this week, a release from the local Navy Recruiting station. Not one copy, not two copies, not three—but 10 copies of the same release were included in the mailing. Accustomed to receive three copies of releases from military agencies (no Army or Navy form is official in less than triplicate), this set a new high.

Knowing from daily experience how increasingly difficult it has become to secure paper needed for the ordinary operations of a printing and publishing business and being familiar with the recent directive setting aside 5 percent of all mill production of certain papers for Government use, it is needless to say that this wholesale news release did not improve Navy press relations insofar as we are concerned.

Nor is this an isolated instance. The Treasury Department, in its campaign to stimulate the sale of Savings Bonds, is also generous to a fault. For instance, it has not been long since that one of our periodic shipment of mats for Savings Bond advertisements arrived with four duplications of each ad, none of which we had specifically ordered. The fact that one mat will provide casts for a half dozen plates, if that number of duplicate ads would be required by a single publication for any conceivable reason, is a matter of elementary knowledge to anyone familiar with graphic arts processes. It would doubtless be presuming too much to expect that the Treasury Department "expert" publicists would know as much.

The value of these mats on the Cincinnati market we ascertained to be $2.24; the packing and handling charge a minimum of 35 cents, and parcel post from Chicago, the point of origin, to Cincinnati, 19 cents. (Of course, these mats came under Government frank, adding to the postal deficit for which the second-class mailing rates granted to newspapers get principal credit.)

Thus, this single mailing cost the Treasury Department (which of course, is you and I) an estimated $2.78, or considerably more than twice of what it should have been had single mats been sent. Had proof sheets for editor's selection been sent, the general trade practice, the cost would have been even a smaller fraction of the actual cost. And there are over 10,000 weekly newspapers in the United States, the majority of which are doubtless on the Treasury Department's mailing list.

We also find in our mail a news release (one copy) from the Ohio Public Expenditure Council stating, Ohio's share of President Truman's proposed $71,600,000,000 budget, as submitted to Congress, amounts to $3,752,028,016.40. Hamilton County's share, alone, amounts to $341,509,129.20 or an average of $475.12 for every man, woman, and child in the county.

So what, it's only money. Your money, that is.

Toronto Stock Frauds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith one of a series of articles now appearing in the St. Louis, Mo., Star-Times, exposing the operations of a stock-promotion group in Canada which has been systematically defrauding American investors. The article follows:

(By Richard S. Lewis)

TORONTO, ONTARIO.—There is no question about the oil boom in Alberta. It is real. Some of the greatest oil pools in North America have been discovered there.

But not by the mail-order stock promoters of Toronto's Bay Street. Tying their promotions to the legitimate boom, the Bay Street buccaneers have leased lands on the fringes of the oil areas and drilled wildcat wells as a basis for selling schemes.

According to them, they hold open the door for United States participation in Canadian western oils.

Alberta authorities have vainly warned Americans to beware of the flamboyant promotions emanating from Toronto. But their warnings have been drowned out in the torrents of promotional literature from Bay Street promising big profits overnight to investors in Canada's black gold.

The oil promotions seem to be the easiest to sell in the United States, possibly because the Horatio Alger oil millionaire is a familiar figure to Americans.

This is the kind of propaganda oil promoters are feeding St. Louisans:

"Once upon a time, only a few months ago, a farmer named Bill Mulligan and his wife and 11 children lived in a tumble-down shack with a dirt floor near Bon Accord, Alberta.

"The family was very poor. If it hadn't been for the milk from their four cows, the Mulligans would have been hungry at times.

"Then along came an oil company and drilled a hole in their cow lot. Oil gushed out of it and, lo, the Mulligans aren't on a milk diet any more.

"They are eating beefsteaks now and have just bought a new home, two new tractors, and a $4,000 sedan in which they are touring the States. All of them are riding high."

Now this rags-to-riches documentary was not invented by the promoters. It was published by the American magazine last August, in an enthusiastic article entitled "It's Easier To Get Rich in Canada," by Clarence Woodbury.

No criticism of Woodbury's article nor the facts he has assembled to show why it is easier to get rich in Canada is intended.

But reprints of this article are being mailed by Toronto's broker-dealers to St. Louisans in support of fraudulent oil stocks.

As early as November 1949 C. O. Nickle, a recognized oil authority of Calgary, Alberta, issued a public warning to beware of the wildcatters. He criticized the high-pressure selling methods used by the Bay Street buccaneers to sell western oil stocks.

At that time, most of the promotions were based on drillings in the Lloydminster area. This field is favorable at best only for efficient operators, he said, who can keep costs to a minimum, but not to operators who put two-thirds of the investors' dollar in their pockets and use one-third to look for oil.

"Chances for an investor to get his capital back, let alone realize a profit, are about comparable to a snowball in Hades," he said.

The most prevalent western Canadian oil promotions circulating in the St. Louis area are Cordasun Petroleums, Ltd., and Maidstone Oils, Ltd. Both of these have been found fraudulent by the United States Securities and Exchange Commission and the Post Office.

Probably the most aggressive promoter in the group of licensed broker-dealers pushing these stocks is J. D. Cullingham, of J. D. Cullingham & Co., 185 Bay Street.

Cullingham, who occupies office space on the floor below the headquarters of the notorious bail jumper, Albert E. DePalma, is the subject of postal fraud order No. 43124, issued May 5, 1950.

Also, Pennsylvania, Nebraska, Michigan, Minnesota, California, Wisconsin, Ohio, and Virginia have issued cease and desist orders against Cullingham. But in spite of these efforts, he is still spreading the old oil throughout the Middle West.

By mail and over the telephone, Cullingham promised St. Louisans that he could sell them stock below the market price, when there wasn't any market to begin with; that they were sure to make money; that the stock was safe and sound, and that Cordasun Petroleums was an investment, not a speculation.

Not many of the broker-dealers go this far. Most of them admit their promotions are speculative, but, they add, nobody makes money in Canada unless he speculates.

Cullingham's pitch is rather distinctive. He tells you that Cordasun's 35-cent shares have been oversubscribed and that the offering price to the public has now risen to 50 cents. But—

"As principals we have allotted a special bloc at a preferential price of 45 cents per share—a price 5 cents under the prevailing public offering quotation of 50 cents a share."

How can anyone resist such an offer which enables you to make a nickel a share before you buy the stock at all?

It's not hard to resist when you look behind this deal. The SEC and the postal inspectors did.

They found that Cullingham received 300,000 treasury shares from Cordasun at 7½ cents, 300,000 at 10 cents, and 15,000 at 12½ cents, with options to purchase more stock at ascending prices.

This is the stock Cullingham has been offering at 35, 45, and 50 cents. What he offers it for, the SEC found, has no relation to any market value.

The postal investigation found that glowing representations were made about a Cordasun well known as Bailey-Nisku well No. 1, which was promoted as a prolific producer.

United States Trial Examiner James C. Haynes, Jr., reported in his findings that this well had been drilled to 6,000 feet and abandoned as a nonproducer.

Analysis of the amended prospectus filed by Cordasun with the Ontario Securities Commission shows that Cordasun's holdings in seven areas are not substantial enough to warrant the promises of profit made by the promoter, according to Haynes.

In the area called Pouce Coupe (which means "Flea Bite") the prospectus shows Cordasun has only a one-eighth interest in certain acreage. In addition to this and the well which was abandoned, the prospectus shows two gas wells on the holdings of other companies were drilled and sealed for lack of a market.

In the whole area, there has been no production as of Feb. 3, 1950, according to the examiner's report.

In the East Leduc or Nisku area, where the prospectus shows Cordasun has a 5 percent interest in certain properties, an $80,000 drilling which went down to 6,000 feet was abandoned, according to the prospectus.

In the Speedon area, where Cordasun has only a one-fifth interest in a 50 percent of a co-participant, the prospectus shows there has been little drilling near Cordasun's property, according to the trial examiner's finding.

In fact, the closest well which was drilled 5 miles away was abandoned. In the Campbell area, Cordasun has only a percent interest in the net oil produced after all expenses for drilling have been paid.

The trial examiner commented that in some areas where Cordasun has an interest there are producing wells, but they have not been pumped steadily because there is no market for the oil produced.

In a letter to the SEC dated May 27, 1949, the chairman of the Alberta Province Board of Public Utility Commissioners wrote:

"This company (Cordasun) is not registered in this province and is not entitled to sell its shares in this province.

"The whole literature is completely objectionable and would never be authorized by us for publication. It is not so much what is said but what is unsaid that makes the literature misleading.

"Perhaps I should mention that all these Ontario companies carefully avoid coming to Alberta for registration.

"The whole literature can be described as misleading, high-pressure sucker bait."

Trial Examiner Haynes concluded:

"The evidence before me in this case shows, and I find that the business conducted by J. D. Cullingham & Co., through the United States mails, is a scheme for obtaining money by means of false and fraudulent pretenses, representations and promises."

One Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the Brass Industry in Naugatuck Valley

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, the year 1802 marked the founding of the brass industry, as we know it, in the United States. In this year the manufacture of buttons from sheet brass was undertaken by the firm of Abel Porter & Co. in Waterbury, Conn. Here was the first American use of the direct fusion of copper and zinc to make brass as invented by James Emerson in England in 1781. This also involved the first rolling of brass in this country.

To mark the occasion of this great event, I propose that a postage stamp commemorating the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the brass industry be issued, and am introducing today legislation to that effect. Provision is made for the sale of the postage stamp at the post office in Waterbury, Conn., 1 day preceding the general sale of these stamps.

The brass industry provides employment for an untold number of our citizens. Its production makes life more inviting for all our people. Our defense effort would shudder to a halt without the full participation of the brass industry. Throughout its 150-year history the contribution of pioneer workmen and manufacturers in the Naugatuck Valley have made possible its tremendous expansion to the industrial giant of today.

I hope that the anniversary celebration will not be marred through congressional neglect to suspend the present import tax on copper which is tying the hands of the industry in these critical times. An unprecedented effort is being made by the brass industry to cooperate in defense mobilization plans, but success is not readily attained when obstructions such as this tax are placed in the path.

It would be most appropriate for the Federal Government to acknowledge the sesquicentennial of the brass industry through the issuance of a special commemorative stamp next year.

Statement Prepared by Hon. Daniel J. Flood, of Pennsylvania, for the American Hungarian Federation in New York City, Sunday, March 11, 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a statement prepared by me for the American Hungarian Federation which met in New York City on Sunday, March 11, 1951:

MY DEAR MR. FALUSSY: I had hoped very much to be able to speak to you in person this evening, but unfortunately unforeseen exigencies prevent me from doing so. I am extremely glad to have at least the opportunity of sending to you and the members of your organization these few words of friendly greeting and of encouragement in your useful work and purposes. I regard this occasion as especially felicitous in view of the approaching Ides of March—a truly inspiring date in Hungarian history, which marks the anniversary of the beginning in 1848 of the Hungarian war for independence under the leadership of that remarkable apostle of democracy, Louis Kossuth, against the foreign oppressors of the Hungarian people at that period.

It is a notable fact that, over the past century, hundreds of thousands of persons of Hungarian origin have come to this great land, and while not forsaking their splendid Hungarian cultural heritage, have become loyal American citizens. These good people, together with their descendants, have creatively and productively enriched American life and added to its achievements. Now, in the critical period in which we live today, I find it most satisfying and reassuring to observe that this patriotic community, as an integral segment of our people, continues with exemplary alertness and a clear sense of civic responsibility to contribute effectively to the preservation of those principles and institutions which have made this country both great and free.

I believe we are all quite aware at this juncture that in preserving our American way of life against the threat of Communist totalitarianism, we cannot remain unconcerned at the suppression of human rights and freedoms and the extinction of democratic principles elsewhere in the world. This fact has a direct application to Hungary because of the tragic situation which has befallen the liberty-loving people of that country. Theirs is a culture and a national history which extends back into the first millennium of the Christian era. Through a thousand years, amidst a sea of peoples of unrelated tongues, they have maintained their language and culture, and, while sharing fully in a common Western European civilization, have yet preserved their own essential qualities and their entity. This is a significant achievement and provides a sound historical basis for confidence—indeed, assurance—that the Hungarian people, possessed of this spirit, will never accept the domination of foreign tyrants but will continue successfully, whatever may be their temporary difficulties, to assert their independence.

The aspirations for independence, freedom, and democratic institutions, which have found clear expression in both Hungarian and American history and traditions, are lasting elements in the ties which exist between the peoples of Hungary and the United States. These firm bonds cannot be broken by the present Soviet-dominated Communist regime in Hungary despite its practice of systematic repression and its efforts to isolate the Hungarian people from friendly intercourse with the American and other western peoples. I submit that this is a fact which no amount of false Communist propaganda and forced "re-education" can alter or expunge from the hearts and minds of the Hungarian people. I also suggest to those of you whom, happily, I can address on this occasion, that you and those whom you represent are in a peculiarly advantageous position as loyal American citizens of Hungarian descent to maintain an intelligent and sympathetic interest in the plight of the Hungarian people, to give them encouragement in their spiritual and moral resistance to Communism, and to assist them, despite their present subjection to a foreign control which is exercised through a subservient Communist minority, to look and work with perserverance toward ultimate liberation and the fulfillment of their democratic aspirations within the organized community of free peoples. In these endeavors, the Hungarian people will assuredly have the greatest sympathy and support from all of the American people and from other free peoples throughout the world.

A Proposed Blueprint for Victory in 1952—Extracts From Address by Senator Mundt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. BRICKER
OF OHIO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD excerpts from an address on the subject A Proposed Blueprint for Victory in 1952, delivered by our colleague, the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], before a meeting of the executive committee of the National Federation of Young Republican Clubs, as contained in a release dated February 25, 1951.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Extracts from address of Hon. KARL E. MUNDT, of South Dakota, before meeting of executive committee, National Federation of Young Republican Clubs]

A PROPOSED BLUEPRINT FOR VICTORY IN 1952

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 25.—Senator KARL E. MUNDT, of South Dakota, a conventional Republican from one of the strongest Republican strongholds in the country, today proposed an unconventional blueprint for victory in the Presidential elections of 1952 to a national meeting of Young Republican leaders assembling in Washington from approximately 40 States of the Union, last night. Senator MUNDT suggested, "the way to save freedom and protect individual and property rights in this country is to develop an election formula whereby the people of both political parties on each side of the Mason-Dixon line can join their forces and their votes in a great national effort to elect a President and a Congress dedicated to restoring the Federal Government to its proper sphere of activity and thus putting a permanent end to today's direful drift toward the shoals of national socialism under the banners of fair dealism."

Tracing the process by which individual freedom and private ownership has been losing ground all over the world, Senator MUNDT said, "For 20 years the areas of human freedom and the functions of free men have been growing sickeningly smaller all around the globe. Even Britain has succumbed to national socialism. In the United States we have been moving steadily and sadly in the same direction although not to the same degree as many of the European powers. Unless we can stop this drift—unless we change this direction in America, it is only a matter of time before we, too, shall be added to the casualty list of free peoples who have surrendered their individual rights, their property rights, their States' rights, and their rights of decision to the all-powerful state. Here, too, we are finding Federal politicians today pushing around more private citizens by executive action than in any era of our history. Only an informal, inadequate, and intermittent coalition of southern Democrats and northern Republicans in the Congress has protected our precious individualized and community rights from being destroyed in America. Such an unorganized and leaderless defense line cannot permanently protect this country against those whou would magnify the Central Government and minimize the rights of individual citizens and their respective State governments in this Republic."

MUNDT urged the National Federation of Young Republican leaders to "give serious study to the fruitful possibilities of saving our freedom formula in America by developing a blueprint for victory in the presidential elections of 1952 so that those who think and act alike in America—whose Senators and Congressmen vote alike—can vote victoriously for the same presidential candidate be he from the North or the South."

Reducing his theories to practical proposals for procedure, MUNDT outlined a six-step program for "harnessing together in a victorious presidential campaign those in America who place principle above partisanship and those who hold fast to the Constitutional principles which have for so long so well protected our community and individual rights."

1. The Republicans should for the first time since the turn of the century hold their National nominating convention after the Democrats rather than before them. The melancholy record of five successive Republican defeats should indicate that such a change in procedure does not represent a very dangerous Republican gamble.

2. In all likelihood, the Democratic National Convention will nominate President Truman for another term "or somebody to the left of Truman—somebody who actually believes in the programs of nationlization and socialism (medicine, health, housing, education, farming, power, banking, insurance) that Truman has rendered lip service to support." The Democratic Convention will also most certainly include planks and programs moving toward the socialization of the foregoing services—and perhaps others. This seems inevitable because in the 1936 convention when the southern Democrats lost the two-thirds rule which enabled them to direct the destinies of their party they fell off the back of the Democratic donkey and under its heels and there seems no likelihood that they can ever again wrest control of the party away from its left-wing elements, its city machine bosses, and the leaders of various pressure and propaganda groups.

3. Let the study southern Democrats who approve States' rights and abhor State socialism then "walk out and go home" as they did 4 years ago. Let them send emissaries to the Republican Convention to "talk turkey" about the desirability of nominating candidates and writing a platform acceptable to the South and consistent with its historic concepts.

4. If the Republicans will nominate such candidates (for example, TAFT, of Ohio; BYRD, of Virginia; Eisenhower, of New York; or RUSSELL, of Georgia; and others who could be suggested), our Jeffersonian democratic friends could then hold State or regional conventions to place these same candidates on the ballot as the regular democratic nominees where that is possible and as "coalition Democrats" or "States' rights Democrats" in other southern States. At the electoral college "these votes could all be merged together to elect the candidates supported by many Republican States in the North and by the Southern States delivering their votes to them as Democrats or as dissenting partisans."

5. Once such a team of candidates is elected by coalition efforts of the North and the South, the Senators and Representatives from the cooperating areas would be pooled in the Senate and the House, their seniority rights would be interwoven with each other, and committee chairmen selected from whichever group had the ranking legislator. Federal patronage could temporarily be handled on the same basis.

6. A few months after such coalition candidates had assumed office in the White House and the Congress, a National convention could be called to select a name, a symbol, and a set of principles for the coalition forces. Suppose they chose the name of Freedom Party and the Statue of Liberty as a symbol with a careful definition of the appropriate scope and function of the Federal Government as basic party doctrine. Those out of power would then be forced to form an opposition party and with two new political parties, each with a definite set of principles, we would have an honest, meaningful, party realignment in this country. Party labels would mean something again; individual voters would know what they were voting for in supporting public officials; county and State officials would change their allegiance from Republican or Democrat to one or the other of the two new parties.

MUNDT called attention to the fact, "In this country we have changed party designations several times. Each time it has been a good tonic for America and we have moved forward into a new era of progress. People have renewed their interest in Government. With such a new alignment of parties, now, it is a safe assumption that the discouragingly small number of voters now going to the polling places would sharply and continuously increase. Voters could then vote for a principle rather than a party label."

Drawing upon the experiences of Great Britain as an example, MUNDT said, "I have made a careful study of the manner in which inadequate and unworkable political alignments in Great Britain have contributed to its collapse into the pitfalls of National Socialism. Both the Conservative and the Liberal party members oppose Socialism as indicated by the vote of a fortnight ago when all Liberal and Conservative Members of Parliament voted unanimously against the nationalization of steel. What would have happened if in the last general election in Britain those voting for losing Liberal Members of Parliament had voted for the Conservative candidates? The results show their own parallel with our American predicament. Had there been no Liberal Members of Parliament candidates and had the voters voting for losing Liberal Members of Parliament voted Conservative, the Conservative Party would have gained 71 seats in the House of Commons. Added to the 272 they actually won, this would have given the Conservative Party a majority of 343 or 29 more than needed to control the House of Commons. Thus, Socialism prevails in Britain because in the last election the British people were divided by artificial barriers and unworkable political alignments just as today those in the South and North who oppose "'Big Government' are divided by historic, semantic, and artificial party labels. We can most surely avoid the fate of Britain where private ownership and individual initiative have been taken over by the palace politicians by meeting the issue head-on in America and placing behind one Presidential candidate the voters of both political parties whose legislators in Congress have joined together repeatedly to prevent Socialistic programs from being adopted here."

Using the 1948 presidential election as an example, MUNDT said, "Had we been able to merge the votes behind the men who have fought together in Congress into a great national effort to elect a President in 1948, the Fair Deal would have been routed in our last election. Add to the four States where Dixiecrat candidates won the electoral votes of Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, and Virginia where voters have steadfastly and emphatically supported anti-New Deal, anti-Fair Deal Senators, and Harry Truman would have received 93 less electoral votes than he did in 1948. Deduct 93 from the 303 which he received and you have 210 votes or 56 less votes than needed for election. Thus it can be seen that if those whose votes in this country have clearly demonstrated they do not want reckless extravagance, a breakdown of States' rights, complete domination by the Federal Government and a whole catalog of socialistic experiments in America had an available political formula whereby they could merge their strength and marry their votes in the electoral college a conservative, business-minded, constitutional adherent can be elected in 1952."

"Who better than our Young Republicans have the progressive spirit and the energetic vision required to breath new hope and life and strength into the cause of freedom in America?" asked Senator MUNDT in conclusion. "After all it is the youth of our land who will lose most if the present trends toward top-heavy, arrogant, socialistic government continue. It might well be the youth of America who should take the lead in breaking with past formulas for political defeat. For too long our Republican Party has been a sectional party operating effectively in less than three-quarters of our States. Let it become the vehicle for conducting a great national drive to unite its force with those in the South who share our affinity for freedom, private enterprise, individual initiative, the dignity of the individual citizen, the protection of States' rights and the necessity to stop socialism from making further inroads in the world's last citadel of liberty, independence, and opportunity. Let it never be said that false political labels, a problem in partisan semantics, and an imaginary boundary line between the freedom-loving people of the North and South were successful in combining to bring catastrophe and collectivism to this Republic."

The Tidelands Fight

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER E. ROGERS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

House Resolution 137

Whereas the Dallas Morning News on yesterday, March 14, 1951, carried a front-page editorial straight to the point on what the tidelands fight really is; and

Whereas said editorial reads as follows:

"The tidelands fight has been defined as many things which it is not. It is high time to start describing what it really is.

"It is a fight for property rights that have existed since this Government was born.

"It is a fight for the honesty and integrity of the pledged word of the National Government against specious phrase twisting to cover legalized chicanery.

"It is a fight for the honest returns of investment in risk and commercial venture against the sure-thing speculators who would reap where others have sown.

"So far as Texas is concerned, it is a fight for the school funds and school future of the children of a State that voluntarily ceased to be an independent Nation and cast its lot with a government whose word it believed it could trust. So far as Texas is concerned it is a fight to see that no false reasoning or time-serving pretense by an inept Federal Supreme Court shall set that word aside.

"In the striking series of nine articles by Allen Duckworth concluded in the Dallas Morning News on Monday, the case of Texas and the other tideland States has been made crystal clear. You have seen official conspiracy to seize these lands for the Federal Government in defiance of a concept of ownership that was born before the Constitution and endured with it. You have seen the evidence that this is a national grab to benefit private spoilsmen.

"What the tidelands issue has never been is either an effort to assure the naval oil reserve or to benefit the people of the United States.

"It has made no difference to those responsible that they have written on the books a Supreme Court opinion that places in jeopardy every square foot of privately owned or State-owned property in this country. For the Court in its labored effort to justify its grossly unfair decision has asserted that the United States has the right in its own interest and regardless of its pledges to seize the tidelands without compensation.

"The tidelands today—your home, your business, your person tomorrow.

"An act of Congress can stay the progress of that unhallowed theory, fundamentally identical with the concepts of Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin.

"Get Congress to act": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives, That the Dallas Morning News, be commended for its outstanding public service in publishing the plain truth about the Federal grab of Texas' tidelands under color of legalized authority delivered up by a willing United States Supreme Court; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk be directed to forward copies of this resolution to each Member of the Texas delegation in Congress, House and Senate.

REUBEN E. SENTERFITT,
Speaker of the House.

I hereby certify that house resolution 137 was adopted by the house on March 15, 1951.

[SEAL] CLARENCE JONES,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Toronto Stock Frauds

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, congratulations to the St. Louis Star-Times for the splendid series of articles it has been publishing exposing a stock-promotion group in Canada which has been systematically defrauding American investors for several years. Under leave to extend my remarks, I herewith include one of the series which merits the gratitude of investors:

(By Richard S. Lewis)

TORONTO, ONTARIO.—"Sheer, undiluted nonsense" was the way United States Trial Examiner James C. Haynes, Jr., characterized the promotion of Bison Petroleums, Ltd., when he issued the first of four fraud orders against its promoter, A. Garfield Heyes.

Bison was literally promoted in reverse. It told suckers it was going to set up a refinery before it had struck oil. It prepared to drill for oil before making a geophysical survey to see if any oil was there, according to the investigation of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission and the United States Post Office.

The trial examiner issued the first of four fraud orders against Heyes August 2, 1950. But Heyes turned out to be a slippery customer, changing his address three times. Each time, though, the Post Office nailed him.

The firm of A. Garfield Heyes, Ltd., is still doing business here. It is currently listed by the Ontario Securities Commission as a broker-dealer and it is in good standing with the Broker-Dealer Association.

Heyes, the United States probe showed, sold Bison as another get-rich-quick opportunity in the western Canada oil boom. His literature told the suckers the boom had hardly scratched the surface.

Not only did Bison Petroleum propose to give the United States citizen a chance to participate in oil product, but in refining as well. The deal simply couldn't miss, according to Heyes.

But it could when SEC investigators took a close look at it.

Canadian postal authorities advised American postal authorities that Heyes' literature was "a very obvious attempt to sell shares on the strength of Saskatchewan properties which are in nowise related to the Alberta light-crude discoveries."

"Bison Petroleums," the Canada Post Office added, "is designed to offer the investor an opportunity to participate in two profitable phases. The two can be profitable, but not with the properties and the suggested refining facilities of the company."

The Canada postal authorities said that Bison's claim it held favorably located leases and participation in the Redwater, Lac La Biche, and White Mud areas is completely deceptive.

Literature issued by Heyes speaks enthusiastically of drilling contracts signed by Bison, "with work scheduled to commence immediately."

Characteristic of this literature is the persistent word picture that the promoters use to convey the idea they are toeing the mark and ready to go. They are always "commencing" or "ready to commence" some operation which shows "favorable indications" of "rich rewards" or "interesting possibilities" of "remarkable profits."

The Bison prospectus, on file with the Ontario Securities Commission, shows that Bison closed contracts for drilling, or said it closed them, ignoring the advice of its own geologist, who recommended that a geophysical survey be made before trying to drill the wells, according to the United States trial examiner.

Bison got this advice on March 9, 1950, and executed the drilling contracts shortly afterward, according to the trial examiner.

"The evidence before me also shows that the refining plant which is to contribute so substantially to the value of Bison stock will most certainly not produce anything in the way of profit," said the trial examiner.

"The plant is to be a skimming plant. The margin of profit which can be secured from such an operation is quite narrow. To talk of building a refinery until you have an assured supply of at least 1,000 barrels a day is sheer, undiluted nonsense, and can only be deceptive."

Postal fraud order 43739, issued August 2 against A. Garfield Heyes, Ltd., did not deter the promoter from sending his literature to United States suckers. In order to bypass it, Heyes enclosed a self-addressed return envelope with the address, A. G. Heyes, 9 Adelaide East, Toronto 1, Canada.

Since the first fraud order did not cover this designation, another was issued to cover it on October 2. But this still did not stop the resourceful Heyes.

He sent a return envelope self-addressed to Heyes, Ltd., Suite 1, Bank of Toronto Building, Laird Drive and Eglinton Avenue, Leaside, Ontario.

In his letters was an explanatory postcript: "P. S.—Use the stamped, return envelope, addressed to our branch accounting office for extra prompt attention, which is enclosed for your convenience."

On November 17, a third fraud order was issued covering this dodge. But Heyes continued to operate.

His latest return envelope is inscribed with this address: A. G. Heyes, president, 7 Adelaide Street East, Toronto 1, Canada.

A fourth fraud order, covering this designation, was issued December 6. But Heyes is still operating here under other aliases and he is getting his mail delivered.

Another promotion of the same caliber of fraud is Maidstone Oils, Ltd., promoted principally by Donald F. Bryans & Co., a concern connected with another swindle called Lashburn Petroleums, Ltd.

Bryans and a colleague, William G. Chipp, sold Maidstone stock in the United States by advertising through the mails that Maidstone holds a total of 128 well sites in the Lloydminster area, where successful wells are frequent.

Examination of Maidstone's holdings by the United States Securities and Exchange Commission geologist showed that Maidstone had only 32 well sites within 3 miles of area, and that the remaining acreage is 12 miles away.

The SEC geologist also found that Maidstone's claim its acreage was located in "proven and semiproven sectors and/or sectors deemed to offer oil- or gas-bearing possibilities" was false.

None of this acreage could reasonably be considered proven and semiproven oil land, the geologist found.

The promotion circulars also asserted that all doubt had vanished regarding the profitability of Lloydminster wells. But the evidence showed that even better wells in this area were not particularly profitable, according to the findings of United States Trial Examiner Daniel J. Kelly.

Kelly said there was no reasonable possibility that the wells in the area would produce enough oil to enable investors to secure a return of the purchase price of the stock.

Another promoter of Maidstone, Cordasun Petroleums, Ltd., and a third enterprise called Docana Oils and Mines, Ltd., is J. B. Dow & Co. of 9 Richmond Street East, Toronto. This concern is listed currently as a licensed broker-dealer and a member in good standing of the Broker-Dealer Association.

Dow represented to suckers in Minnesota that he had discovered a junior oil company with holdings in 10 areas of western Canada, but could not disclose the identity of the company lest premature publicity might result in a sudden upsurge in the market price for the shares.

The mysterious company turned out to be the old swindle, Cordasun, which has been promoted by more Bay Street pirates than almost any other oil stock in the moose pastures.

Dow, according to the United States postal investigation, represented there was an established market for Cordasun, Maidstone and Docana. There is no market, the post office reported.

Dow is subject to cease and desist orders in Missouri, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Ohio, and California, while New York and New Jersey have obtained injunctions against sale of Maidstone stock.

Still another promoter riding the crest of the Alberta boom is L. B. Scott & Co., a licensed broker-dealer here and member of the Broker-Dealer Association. Scott sold Capitol Petroleums, Ltd., and a mining promotion, Eastwebb Mines, Ltd.

Scott became the subject of a postal fraud order last April. A second fraud order was issued against this concern in December when it tried to dodge the first order by using Terminal A, Box 293, as its address here.

In his oils brochure, Scott told suckers that 87.5 percent of all wells drilled in Lloydminster field were successful. The SEC found no such percentage of success had ever been heard of in the area.

An employee of the SEC talked over the telephone with L. B. Scott & Co. and was told:

"A situation has come up that prompted telephone calls to our customers. This stock became very active owing to some news that came in on the property. They are down 1,500 feet. There is an adjoining well causing quite a lot of activity. They are drilling a deep test well now, down 1,500 feet."

The SEC man, whom the promoter took to be a sucker, asked what size was the adjoining well.

A $5,000,000 well," was the response. "The original investment was $80,000. It is considered a $5,000,000 well right now."

SEC said such statements were "inexcusably vicious, highly fraudulent and have no factual basis."

Imposition of Controls—Address by Alan H. Valentine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. BRICKER

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on the subject Controls: By Whom and for What? delivered by Alan H. Valentine at the thirty-first annual luncheon of the Associated Industries of Cleveland, at the Statler Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio, on March 14, 1951.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONTROLS: BY WHOM AND FOR WHAT?

When in January your officers invited me to speak today, they thought they were going to get the Economic Stabilizer. So did I. But instead you get only a private citizen, only another Republican fired by a Democratic President. If you feel short-changed, how do you think I feel?

Actually I feel relieved. It is nice to know I have no responsibility whatever for the words and actions of the officers of Price Stabilization and of the members of the Wage Stabilization Board, if any. They have my good wishes, though not my envy. May they succeed, or at least survive.

Though relieved at my freedom, I did not seek it. I took on the job of Economic Stabilizer aware of its difficulties and dangers, and was prepared to see it through. But any man not supported by organized labor, or by the White House secretariat, or by the Democratic National Committee needs to watch his step, and I was unpopular with all three. The President gave me support for some weeks against heavy odds, and finally gave me the distinction of being Washington's finest example of what inventory accountants call "Last in, first out." My personal regard for him remains.

There is nothing more unstable than the job of an Economic Stabilizer. It is easy to talk stabilization but not to stabilize, and it is possible to appear to stabilize our economy but actually to impair it. But if one tries to act the economist and the statesman, he is moving against the crowd. Perhaps it is wiser to be like the demagog of the French Revolution, who, hearing in the small hours the noise of a riot in the street below, leapt from his bed and announced to his lady: "There go my people. I am their leader; I must follow them."

Paris has no monopoly of such leaders. In its milder form that kind of leadership is now called rolling with the punches. I am glad that some of our business leaders now serving in Washington have learned how to roll with the punches, for we need badly their continuance in the top councils of our Government. I do not know where our defense program would be without men like Charlie Wilson, Bob Lovett, and Bill Harrison. Hoping that my praise is not the kiss of death, I want you to know that in my observation one of the finest jobs of production ever done anywhere, and against heavy odds, is being done by General Harrison.

But there are issues too important to compromise; sometimes one must refuse to roll with the punches. One cannot compromise one's basic economic judgment especially when it is supported by the wisest advisers one can assemble. I have always believed that free enterprise produces best when it is most free and that its mechanism is delicate and should be adjusted only after the most careful consideration. I knew we could not in any case, for want of staff, arrest inflation for a month or two, and believed that during that period it was better to endure inflation and not risk impairing production, than to impose a regimentation which would not, in any case, hold down prices of most consumer goods about which the complaints centered. Therefore I would not impose general controls until Government took certain other deflationary steps—mostly still not taken—to help make controls workable. My judgment may have been wrong, but events since February 1 have not changed it. My judgment was not shared by most of the powers in Washington. As prices rose it became increasingly difficult for me, and for the President who supported me, to resist the pressures of those whose opinions were seldom tempered by any knowledge of the complications of price regimentation and wage regulation—to resist the sincere and vocal people who had all the popular arguments on their side—to resist those who cared more about placating the public than helping the public.

That was an economic issue, though it became a political one. But there was another. It was one I had been promised would not be allowed to impede my work, I was forced to choose between being a participant in large-scale partisan patronage or of being a victim of it. I chose the latter; forced the issue; and do not regret my choice. Perhaps it would have happened in any administration; it did happen in this one.

There are few men more boring than he who wants to tell you about his recent operation and how much it hurt. There are few figures more pathetic than the defeated football coach who spends all winter explaining how all he needed was more good material. I shall try not to be an Ancient Mariner either. What happened to me is unimportant—except to me—unless it brings some clarification to matters of greater importance. The times are too crucial to permit any of us the luxury of destructive criticism or personal tirades. Our Government needs our support. We owe support, with all the largeness of spirit and generosity of judgment we can muster, to that Government and to a President whose honesty and devotion, whose difficulties and problems, we never can belittle. Any further references to my own misadventures will be purely illustrative. I came to bury Valentine, not to praise him.

I want to give my remaining time to two considerations.

First, are Government efforts toward stabilization succeeding, and if not why not?

Second, what does that tell us about the future of our democratic Government?

If in 15 minutes I can answer either of those I shall not have died politically in vain.

Can our economy be stabilized? That depends on what we mean by stabilization.

If we mean bringing our national economy wholly under the control of Government; if we mean arresting and freezing our productive organization within some predetermined framework; then our economy cannot be stabilized, at least short of complete dictatorial socialism. Such regimentation would reduce personal incentive and impair production; it would strait-jacket initiative and destroy free enterprise. If that be stabilization I am against it, for the essence of our economy is its flexibility; the merit of our system is its relative freedom.

But if by stabilization we mean eliminating the extremes of booms and busts; ameliorating the worst effects of inflation and deflation; and spreading more fairly the profit and the pain of our defense program—if that be stabilization it is desirable and possible. Are we on our way to it? I think we are on our way, but with more noise than efficiency, more disagreement than unity, more cooks than consistency, more contumely than courage, more politics than progress.

Whose fault is that? The fault lies in many places and has a long history. I can suggest a few factors, but I shall try to name no names.

One trouble has been an overemphasis in Government circles, in press circles, and in the public mind, upon the price-control aspects of economic stabilization. This was natural and perhaps inevitable. Prices are of immediate concern to the public; prices are news to the press, price control can provide legislators with an excuse for not voting unpopular taxes or troublesome government economies. This over-emphasis has led to too little emphasis—and too little action—upon other and more basic deflationary measures absolutely essential to stabilization.

Allied with this error was the widespread fallacy that to control prices one had only to issue a few orders. Actually price control is one of the most complicated, delicate, and difficult aspects of economic endeavor—a field really understood as a whole only by a few professional experts, and really understood in detail only by a few specialists in Government and business. Last week Walter Lippmann wrote that even Mr. Charles Wilson "seemed to accept the notion that prices could be frozen by decree without taking any serious measures to stop the inflation." If Mr. Wilson did accept that notion it was despite several hours of conversation, right up to the eve of my resignation, in which I endeavored to convince him to the contrary. Perhaps he did recognize the difficulties and dangers of the course which he then approved, but did not feel he could afford to take the risk of supporting a policy and a man so politically unacceptable. He had and has my sympathy and support.

Another fault lies in the terms of the Defense Production Act, which by various conditions makes it difficult and perhaps impossible to achieve effective price and wage control. Parity protection of agriculture is one of these hurdles, but there are others.

Then there are many areas of our economy in which controls of prices and wages are for practical reasons extremely difficult. How can one enforce price controls in many unorganized small-unit trades; how can one enforce a wage freeze among thousands of tiny groups of unorganized workers? In industries like motorcars or steel, when the units of management are large in size, few in number, law-abiding, socially responsible, and very much in the public eye, the problem of enforcement is a minor one. But there are many other industries, each with thousands of small operators, where that description does not apply, and where there is no medium for internal leadership or external control. Mr. DiSalle has yet to demonstrate that he can do—without rationing and without a Pearl Harbor psychology—what Messrs. Henderson, Bowles, and Porter could not do; control the retail price and quality of meat and men's clothing. Yet they were two of the items which both Congress and the public apparently expected any understaffed stabilizer could roll back in price by the simple issuance of an order.

But the greatest weakness in our stabilizing effort has been the failure of Government to take strong, prompt, and fundamental steps toward deflation—including Government economy, a wise and fair plan of increased tax revenue that would draw off excessive spending power, greater credit restrictions, more intelligent policies on interest rates, increased personal savings and purchase of Government bonds. Most of these remain undone, and meanwhile the ship of state drifts with the vagrant pressure-tides and stabilizers flounder.

If war becomes so near or inflation so devastating that we Americans are lifted by patriotism or by fear out of our normal selfishness and inertia—if that happens then the difficulties described will be promptly overcome. But even then we will still lack a major essential to effective stabilization—an efficient Federal Government.

That essential we do not now have. It cannot be quickly created or recruited for it is a matter of spirit and purpose as well as talent and experience.

Some 50 years ago Henry and Brooks Adams warned that American democracy might descend from mediocrity to mediocrity until it became too mediocre to survive. If they feared that in 1900, what would they think of the quality of American politics and society today? The problems which currently face our Government are more complicated and difficult than ever in our history. More than ever before we need many men of fine mind and character in Government, and an atmosphere in Government in which they can work happily and effectively. As the task of our Government has enlarged so has its size. It has multiplied in numbers, cost, and power. Has it increased proportionately in the wisdom and character of its leaders? Were our social gains of the 1930's, for example, accompanied by comparable improvements in standards of public propriety? Has the power, for example, which leaders of organized labor have gained since 1932 been balanced by an added sense of responsibility on their part for the welfare of all Americans? Indeed, do the American people any longer even expect to see Washington set an example of high-mindedness? Is our public now so inured to improprieties of public conduct that it is no longer offended by them? Are we, also, satisfied so long as our Congressmen or Federal officers do nothing actually illegal?

This brings me to my final question:

What does the current state of affairs in Washington tell us about the future of democratic government? I do not even suggest the possibility of any political corruption. I do not even suggest that many of the reported improprieties have seemed improper to the men who so acted, though that makes them doubly frightening. After all, let us gladly recognize that Washington does contain many men exceptional in ability, vision, and political integrity with whom any man should be proud to associate.

A government in which even men of Cabinet rank are advised to ingratiate themselves at regular intervals with certain members of the White House staff is an inefficient government.

A government in which thousands of Federal employees are strongly influenced by fear they will lose their jobs or their promotions if they offend the party political watchdogs in their department or agency is an inefficient government.

A government in which, in a declared emergency, top officials pursue various courses in matters of crucial financial, economic, labor, and manpower policy is an inefficient government.

A government which leaders of business and professions hesitate to join, even in a national emergency, because of the frustrations, defeats, compromises, and personal lacerations they know they must endure is an inefficient government.

A government in which leading Senators and other public servants are obliged to spend much time, in a crucial year, investigating the propriety and even the integrity of other public servants is an inefficient government.

A government in which thousands of Federal employees have forgotten that the function of government is to serve the people is an inefficient government.

It is said that democratic government must be in some respects inefficient; that that is the price of democracy. But the inefficiencies I have described do not derive from democracy; are not inherent in its working or essential to its welfare.

So I conclude that a government so inefficient is inadequate to our times.

Too mediocre to survive. Are we approaching that stage? There have always been some men of third-rate ability in our Government, and our Nation has survived them. But never, I suggest, have such third-rate standards and objectives flourished so openly or been more generally accepted and more loyally defended. This tolerance of the mediocre began long before the present administration, and Mr. Truman thus inherited a downward trend in political morality. That trend would have been difficult to reverse. It was not reversed but augmented. The moral ground on which contemporary Washington now rests is so low that mists of contagion can rise quickly and spread far.

Surely our President fails to realize how many and how large are the spots on the fabric of his Federal mantle. If he did realize, surely he would act.

The heart of this contagion is patronage whenever and wherever it can be got away with. We cannot, of course, have democratic government without political parties, and political parties cannot live without patronage. But patronage has become not a means to life but an end in itself to a political machine which has been too long at the trough. That patronage has become an excuse for the creation of a government within a government.

Our official Government is headed by an honest, well-intentioned, industrious, and likable President.

But there is a second government, nominally headed by the President but with activities of which he can be only vaguely aware. That government is largely unofficial in its standing, anonymous in its membership, undercover in its operations, undefined in its functions, and nebulous in its actual leadership, with few records, few scruples, and little or no sense of public responsibility.

Nominally a creature of the Democratic National Committee, in practice it appears to include men not officially connected with that committee, who are primarily in pursuit of personal power or personal wealth. Perhaps no single person knows all that is said and done in the name of this nameless government, but let there be no doubt of its influence. There is perhaps no complete record of its membership or of its plans, its promises, and its proscribed victims, but some of us soon learn to feel its power. I do not even hint at any illegality, for these are all, all honorable men. I merely suggest that this obscure and irresponsible power is a danger to the defense effort, and if long endured could become a menace to free government. The Fulbright commission has come upon some revealing traces and some familiar names.

Such a situation could not exist unless the leaders of our Government had become a little too tolerant of mediocre political ethics and a little too complacent about their own. How else can one explain an apparent willingness to be satisfied with public servants so long as their actions are not clearly illegal, and to be unconcerned about actions which, though legal, are highly improper?

These factors are not remote from my discussion of stabilizing our economy, for they are major hazards which our stabilizers must overcome. Sound economics and partisan politics simply do not mix. Even a Charles Wilson cannot successfully organize our production and oversee our stabilization if he must also cope with an undercover government as well as a legally constituted one.

Only one man can repudiate and demolish this second and unofficial government. Only one man can raise the level of our political morality; only one man can drive the money lenders from his own temple. That man is the President of the United States. If I do not misjudge the American people, they know the time has come for the President to undertake a major house cleaning. They admire his loyalty to his supporters; they like his good nature. But he, who has himself declared a national emergency, must recognize this situation as one aspect of that national emergency. He must not let loyalty or good nature blind him to the fact that his loyalty is being imposed upon, his faith is being misplaced, his friendship is being betrayed by some whom he has thought to be his friends. They are no friends of his or of the Nation. In their own ways they are saboteurs of our defense program.

Only the President can act now, and by his action lift his administration from moral mediocrity. Only the President can act now. If he does not; the people can act later, if it is not too late.

Results of a Poll on Public Questions—Editorial From the Sacramento Union

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "So Congress Can Know," which appeared in the Sacramento Union on Sunday, March 11, 1951. This newspaper has conducted a poll on a number of questions of interest to the people of the United States, and the editorial deals with the answers received. I call this to the attention of the Members of the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sacramento Union of March 11, 1951]

SO CONGRESS CAN KNOW

Last week we invited readers, in the interest of good citizenship, to express their opinions on 10 important questions before the Nation. More than 800 responded, with the following result:

1. Are you for or against our representatives taking action right now to eliminate the waste, the unnecessary jobs, inefficiency, and extravagance within each major department of our Government? For, 584; against, 10; don't know, 6.

2. Do you think our Government should stop giving and lending money and materials, other than military matériel, to foreign countries, until we can do so with a reasonable tax load, and a diminishing national deficit? For, 501; against, 52; don't know, 52.

3. Do you think our representatives should take action to correct legislation that requires our Government to buy farm products and other commodities in huge, unusable, and unsalable quantities, with taxpayers' money? For, 461; against, 31; don't know, 14.

4. Are you for or against admitting Red China to the United Nations? For, 59; against, 502; don't know, 41.

5. Are you for or against legislation that will prevent the President from ever again committing our Nation to undeclared war, or to any other unusual foreign duty, without consent of Congress or congressional committee? For, 517; against, 57; don't know, 31.

6. Do you think the UN should impose an embargo and blockade against the Chinese mainland, and encourage Chiang Kai-shek with moral and material support against Communists? For, 481; against, 51; don't know, 59.

7. Do you think our State Department needs a good overhauling, beginning at the top? For, 551; against, 30; don't know, 28.

8. Are you for or against legislation to stop all trade, direct or indirect, with Russia, and forbid entry to people, ships, and goods from Communist-dominated countries into this country? For, 517; against, 54; don't know, 33.

9. Are you for or against an immediate and all-inclusive clean-out of Communists and fellow travelers from every department of the Government, and airtight steps taken to keep them out? For, 567; against, 21; don't know, 16.

Air Power Indivisible for National Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. J. BRYAN DORN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, a friend of mine—a friend who is a military man, which I am not—has called to my attention an old Training Manual of the War Department, dated December 23, 1921, in which the principles of war are listed. These principles are the principles of objective, offensive, concentration or mass, economy of force, movement, surprise, security, simplicity, and cooperation. They are the ancient principles of warfare, from the time of Alexander, and earlier; and they are the principles on which every successful general has based his campaign, right up to the present.

The same friend has called to my attention an article in the latest issue of the Air University Quarterly Review, called Air Power Indivisible. In this article two experienced Air Force officers, Col. Dale O. Smith and Maj. Gen. John DeF. Barker, apply these ancient principles of warfare to the newest form of military power—air power. Their conclusion is that the principles are still sound, and that air power, if it is to be effectively applied, must be applied with reference to them.

Secretary of the Air Force Thomas K. Finletter has truly stated:

Tactical air and strategic air are merely handles which have been developed to identify different functions, each of which is indispensable and each of which fits into the over-all integrated structure of air power.

The authors of Air Force Indivisible conclude:

There should be no rigid adherence to the predetermined priorities ascribed to certain elements of air power when a crucial issue is at stake affecting the whole of national security. Then, without regard to theoretical priorities, total air power must be thrown into the gap which threatens the very structure of our civilization. This will always be the first priority.

The air organization must be designed to advance the national objectives with indivisible air power.

Using the ancient traditional principles of war as guides to strategic and tactical conduct more firmly based than conclusions drawn from incidents of the Korean struggle, General Barker and Colonel Smith have presented their case for the employment of air power in a clear, readable, and convincing fashion.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the article entitled "Air Power Indivisible" from the fall 1950 issue of the Air University Quarterly Review:

AIR POWER INDIVISIBLE

(By Col. Dale O. Smith in collaboration with Maj. Gen. John DeF. Barker)

Professional magazines have recently published several articles arguing the employment of air power in support of troops. One school of thought holds that more control of air should be vested in the ground commander who is directly affected by the kind of close air support he receives. The other school maintains that the current mode of air control, developed in World War II, permits more effective all-round air employment and, in the final analysis, better ground support.

The intellectual controversy thus stimulated is usually documented with authoritative statements from both sides and often supported by one-time incidents gleaned from the Korean struggle. Certainly there must be a firmer base upon which military thought may establish greater agreement.

The substantial acceptance of the traditional principles of war by all people wearing uniform might be one such starting base. These ancient guides to strategic and tactical conduct present a ground of basic harmony from which shoots of further military agreement might grow.

One of these principles is referred to as economy of force. It is, of course, self-explanatory. We want the most military return possible for any military force expended. When we go duck hunting we don't want to carry along a rifle in case we should run into a moose, or if we should hunt moose a shotgun would simply be a burden. On the rare occasion, however, when we want to hunt both duck and moose on the same trip, we'd like to have both types of guns along. But at other times it would be most uneconomical to buy and carry the extra firearm. Wouldn't it be better to borrow the extra gun from a trusted friend rather than to buy it and lug it around for years with slight occasion to use it? For those who hesitate to borrow, it might be pointed out that the borrower is just as often lending his gun to help out the other fellow.

That seems to be a fair exchange. It is simply cooperation—another principle of war. Cooperation also can be considered one of the fundamental tenets of the American system and a secret of our great material and moral success. We trust our fellow man; we rely on his help. We abhor waste of any kind—even waste of time. By working together we make the most of our resources and never let them stand idle when they can be put to work in someone else's hands.

In war isolated situations or campaigns may make us forget or brush aside accepted principles which may not seem to apply at the moment. Yet a broad perspective of the whole history of warfare shows these principles standing up, again and again, under the acid test of combat. Why do we see more meaning in retrospect than in the heat of today's battle? Can it be because more of the relevant facts of the past are known than are the facts of the immediate situation? And cannot those more numerous facts be weighed and analyzed more dispassionately without our being swayed by personal involvement?

We are presently engaged in the Korean campaign, and we have yet to benefit from a comprehensive analysis of it. Our professional observers and correspondents provide separate accounts of one individual, viewing a limited number of isolated actions. Such reports often provide conflicting observations and we are prone to be emotionally affected by those we read. All these valuable experiences must be put together, with many more, and soberly evaluated for safe conclusions.

As a volume of evidence builds up, for example, the first somewhat hysterical accounts of jets being too lightly armored to be effective have been to a large extent disproved. True, jets can't be employed as well on some support missions as F–51's, but on other tasks jets have been found superior. Furthermore, had there been air opposition and accurate antiaircraft artillery, perhaps F–51's would have been knocked out of the skies.

The Air Force has maintained that a warplane must be fundamentally designed to live in the air. No matter how effective it might be under unopposed conditions, a warplane is of slight value if it fails to show up when needed. Recent engagements of our jets have discouraged enemy air attacks and have made it more possible to continue ground support. Economy of force would hardly be attained should we construct a Stuka or a Stormovik purely as airborne artillery, yet so vulnerable to air attack that another aircraft would be required to protect it. (A German and Russian experience that can hardly be ignored.) If we can, on the other hand, build an airplane which not only can protect itself but can perform adequate ground support, we have then what is tantamount to twice the force we might have had with a Stuka-escort combination. It might even be desirable to accept some slight reduction of our "air artillery" capabilities to gain this twice as large force. Fortunately this is not necessary, however, for as more reports pile up we find that jets, employing tactics to suit their unique capabilities, tend to provide an air support comparable to that of the propeller aircraft.

Had we fully accepted the first despairing and fragmentary reports regarding jets we might have gone all out for piston-driven fighters. Could that policy not have encouraged the enemy to employ his jets more vigorously? Would we now have control of the air? Surely we must consider the situation anomalous when the enemy concedes us air superiority. We cannot assume he will always react in that unusual manner. And his current reaction might have been somewhat due to the mere presence of our jets. It is possible that we are getting an economic return from our jets not readily apparent.

Whether we talk of aircraft or tanks or warships, pistols or rifles or artillery, no weapon can be considered of full value unless we employ it with economy of force. Each weapon possesses certain characteristics, singular strengths and weaknesses. We use each weapon so as to take advantage of its capabilities and allay the effects of its limitations. One of the greatest strengths of an airplane is in its flexibility (still another principle of war). The airplane can be used for many military purposes, and it has a mobility that surpasses any other man-carrying weapon. To tie this versatile instrument of war down to a few specific tasks and thus deny it other objectives which at times might be far more productive toward eventual victory would seem to be a profligate waste of force. Would it not be better to organize our forces for optimum flexibility and hence be more able to practice economy of force?

If an air force is organized to take advantage of the great material versatility inherent in the airplane, the commander can be in a position to skillfully apply all the principles of war. He can launch his force from a carrier at sea, from an airfield 20 miles behind the lines, or from a different continent, thus employing it with extreme flexibility. He can take the offensive and concentrate his force against the most critical objective with maximum economy. He can do so even though today's objective is a thousand miles from tomorrow's objective. Rapid movement of large forces over vast distances will permit surprise. Should he be attacked at home, most of his force can be quickly diverted for defense and the security of his and other military bases. Simplicity is the essence of such concentrated air actions, since the very speed of aircraft prohibits operations of excessive complication. But unless his air force is so organized and habitually trained to perform these varied functions, he will not likely be as able to follow the principles. Specific local tasks may deter a more fruitful employment.

The overwhelming advantage of flexibility provided by air power has sometimes been mitigated by an unfunctional organization which seems to divide available air strength into small parcels, each parcel tightly wrapped and labeled "For tactical (or other) use only." Paradoxically, such a piecemeal commitment of air strength is not now, nor has it ever been, a true doctrine of the Air Force.

With some justification, however, the Air Force has been accused of packaging its aviation into such mutually exclusive bundles of "strategic," "tactical," and "air defense" forces. Many airmen have too literally accepted these terms by regarding the over-all strategic picture in too narrow a light. Yet the actual employment of air forces in World War II and in the present Korean conflict should dispel any fears that Air Force policy tends toward compartmentation. Repeated evidence of the use of all air weapons against every kind of target, depending upon the immediate crucial objectives, should amply indicate the fundamental doctrine of air employment.

So-called strategic heavy bombers were employed in Europe before D-day, and after, to attack coastal gun emplacements and other front-line objectives. A quarter of a million tons of bombs were dropped on transportation targets by every type of Eighth Air Force craft, which was nearly one-third of the grand total expended. For the breakthrough at St. Lo a veritable carpet of bombs was laid in front of our lines by waves of big bombers. The tactical efficacy of this operation is attested to by comments from German commanders who asserted that it was this type of air action which was most detrimental to defending a position.

In the Pacific all kinds of aircraft were concentrated on critical objectives regardless of the terminology covering their organizational assignments. Cape Gloucester, for example, was so effectively pounded by every available aircraft that our surface invaders walked in standing up. Bombers and fighters from all sorts of air organizations were later set to interdict the water approaches to Rabaul and with cooperative surface action completed Rabaul's isolation.

Japanese air units had been built up in New Guinea at Wewak where massed Allied air struck them in August 1943. The enemy recoiled to Hollandia, but the sustained bombardment and strafing there by all types of craft wrote the ultimate end to Japanese air strength as an effective force. No piecemeal efforts were attempted in these great air offensives, but rather concentrated, massed operations were undertaken with every available airplane deployed by the theater commander. Air superiority was achieved, and from Hollandia on the possibility of our continued advance was assured.

Later, when the insane "diving wind" flyers streamed down on our invasion forces off Okinawa, B–29's were diverted from their attacks on industrial centers. Destruction of Kyusku airfields and kamikaze forces on the ground became an immediate primary objective. For 24 days kamikaze bases were bombarded, and vicious enemy reactions claimed 22 B–29's. But most kamikaze establishments were knocked out, and attacks on our invasion forces started falling off.

Recently, in Korea, the B–29's not only attacked factories, ports, depots and marshaling yards but bridges, troop concentrations, and strong points. This carpet bombing effort near Taegu was another example of the extreme flexibility of air power. Fighter-bombers and mediums poured fire on many of the selfsame targets. The objectives for the day were those felt to be most urgent at that time by the theater commander, and he was able through his flexible organization to launch his entire force, directing every available air weapon at the sensitive spots.

It has long been held as Air Force doctrine that air superiority should be the primary mission of air power. This premise has gained quick support from Army leaders who have suffered air attacks. Most Army leaders who have been harassed by enemy air would far rather have the enemy air kept off their necks than have integrally assigned aircraft for use as extended artillery. These leaders have no misconceptions about retaining, say, divisional, corps, or army aviation, in the face of superior enemy air. The fate of the German Stuka, which was ruthlessly swept from the skies when the Allies achieved air superiority, is too fresh in the memory of the experienced ground commanders.

Students of warfare are apprised, as well, of the relativeness of air superiority. It is never gained in finality, but only by degrees. The enemy may husband some air power, even though he is driven from the skies, and mount this saved force at a critical time, as the Germans did during the Ardennes offensive and the Japanese did with their kamikaze. Under such conditions we must always be prepared to concentrate and strike with overwhelming energy, even though at any one period our air superiority seems well assured.

Moreover, to achieve air superiority, we cannot hope to indulge exclusively in air combat over the front lines. If we defeat the enemy in this narrow area, we may achieve a local superiority as long as our aircraft are present. The enemy will then merely refuse to commit his air while ours stooge around, but he will strike when we leave. Since a constant air umbrella is wasteful of force, the obvious necessity is to wear down the enemy air force through attrition of every nature. Pilots, crews, planes, fuel, training establishments, aircraft manufacturing and storage center, and communications facilities which interconnect the many elements of his air power—all should be our targets. Seldom can any one element be fully destroyed. Some elements are more exposed to attack than others, and our emphasis should be influenced by those sore toes sticking out, inviting us to step on them.

Before we engage in air battle, however, we must be assured of a certain security for our own air bases, for our own communications, and for all the other elements of national strength present in our territory. Air defense is an impelling responsibility, and because it is seen at first hand by the lawmaking populace, air defense may be given inordinate stress.

As General Lee, through his threatening advances toward Washington, succeeded in immobilizing tens of thousands of Union troops in the nonproductive defense of the Capital, so did the Doolittle mission freeze much of Japan's aviation to the defense of its homeland. The battle of Britain put a premium upon air defense, and it was sometime after our fighters extended their range with drop tanks that the RAF fighters began to follow our lead and not sit at home waiting for air attacks that seldom came. In using nearly all of our aviation every flyable day, the AAF suffered some surprises and many local defeats, but the aggregate of our efforts compared with those of the enemy turned the tide of air victory. Enemy aviation was then largely pinned down to defend the homeland.

A striking example of Germany's failure to exploit the versatility of aircraft is illustrated by her air policies. Because Britain did not fall after a few months of aerial bombardment during 1940, Hitler lost faith in offensive air power. Specialized aviation, essentially under Wehrmacht domination, became the order of the day. The close-support Stuka had paid good dividends when air superiority had been easily attained. But pitted against Allied fighter bombers in Africa and elsewhere, Stukas were knocked down like tenpins. RAF bombardment put a priority on German air defense, and Stukas were left without an escort. As the AAF added its strength, home defense became Germany's No. 1 strategic consideration.

Fighter production was stepped up repeatedly at the expense of other classes of aviation, and over 70 percent of Germany's air force was earmarked exclusively for home defense. At no time was this huge force concentrated to strike offensively at Russia or to back up the retreating Wehrmacht on the eastern front. Nor did the crystal-pure mission of air defense permit the Luftwaffe to be assembled for tactical cooperation with hard-pressed Panzers at Normandy or to make concentrated strikes at overloaded Allied supply points and lines of communications. They were organized to perform but one mission and no more.

The glaring errors made by Germany in her failure to exploit the versatility of air power are apparent to all. Overstrict interpretations of specific roles and missions, particularly those of close-support and air defense, left Germany not with a true air force capable of strategic employment but with a restricted and specialized weapon of doubtful value.

On the other hand, United States Air Force doctrine from its inception has stressed the use of air as a national force capable of performing innumerable strategic missions. Air power has been organized with some specialization, but the long-range objectives have not been prostituted by the need for this specialization. For example, Tactical Air Command was organized to develop ground-support tactics, but included also in its directive was a mission for gaining and maintaining air superiority, while a third specified function of Tactical Air Command was interdiction of the battlefield.

Interdiction—the squeezing off of communication arteries to the battle zones—is merely a phase of the strategic bombing mission. In the latter, not only the battle zone is interdicted, but the whole enemy war-making potential is attacked. It is interdiction of all enemy strength. Hence the interdiction mission of tactical aviation is essentially a part of the long-range mission of strategic employment.

Keeping in mind the three primary objectives of tactical aviation (air superiority, interdiction, and front-line support) let us examine their fulfillment in the Korean War during November 1950. Our forces had driven past the thirty-eighth parallel to within a few miles of the northern border of Korea. Down from Manchuria streamed a vast army to oppose our advance. But, contrary to the concepts of orthodox warfare, we were denied the opportunity to stem this advance. The territory north of the border was declared inviolate, and our aviation could not fly across that artificial barrier. What, then, happened to our air superiority? The air superiority, for example, that we had (by default) over the Pusan pocket?

North of the border, which was just a few minutes by air in front of our ground troops, we generously granted the enemy absolute air superiority. We refused to venture beyond that arbitrary boundary, and the enemy marshalled and directed his divisions with impunity in that sanctuary. The only air superiority we retained was in that thin strip of space between our forces and the Manchurian frontier together with the area behind our lines. Our superiority thus became essentially defensive in nature, since we could not exploit it offensively. Unwarlike restrictions caused us to cede to the enemy the most fruitful harvests of air superiority.

How did these restrictions effect the interdiction mission? Hundreds of communications bottlenecks behind the frontier could not be touched. The stores, warehouses, supply dumps, and depots were safer than if they had been thousands of miles in the interior during a more orthodox war. Railroads, marshalling yards, bridges, and rolling stock were immune from our attack. Roads could be filled bumper to bumper with enemy vehicles of war, and we were even denied air reconnaissance of these myriad movements. We could block the advance only in a pitifully narrow strip of land where a finite number of supply bottlenecks could be repaired by concentrated enemy construction units, permitting his forces to sweep into the battle zones at night, relatively unhandicapped. Interdiction of the battlefield became a vain hope for our air forces under such gross limitations.

The final aim of tactical air, that of front-line support, was unhampered by the anomalous character of the Korean War. Only this last objective remained. Air could be used, like artillery, to blast enemy strong points directly in front of our troops. The decisiveness of this single employment of air was learned to be non-existent when the enemy overwhelmed our positions during the latter days of November.

The use of air strength for direct front-line support of ground forces, although necessary and valuable, can hardly be considered decisive, nor can exclusive employment in this fashion be regarded as economy of force. The most lucrative targets for air appear farther from the front, where the enemy is not holed-up, dispersed along a battlefield many miles wide, and well hidden in natural cover. The best return from air fire is gained when the enemy can be caught jammed up, behind the line, with his guard down, and when the bottlenecks over which his concentrations must move are destroyed and kept destroyed. The striking flexibility of air strength is only exploited to its fullest when its speed, range, and firepower are employed to surprise the enemy where he is most vulnerable.

It is undoubtedly true that slower propeller fighter-bombers can supply a more constant front-line cover than jets, and that their longer orbiting of front-line positions inspires the fighting troops with greater confidence. But by the same token, a battery of corps artillery would also be a comforting addition to an infantry regiment. Hard-hitting, long-range weapons like the 155-mm. guns, 8-inch guns, and 240-mm. howitzers are assigned to higher echelons, however, in order to allow them greater mobility and to permit their concentrations where most needed. The announced mission of corps and Army artillery is to reinforce division artillery and to lend depth to the battle. Only incidentally is its purpose to raise the morale of front-line troops.

Some experts would have tactical aviation assigned to the same army headquarters as is heavy artillery, for employment in a similar manner. This concept makes good sense from a restricted point of view, but a broader analysis may cast doubt upon it.

The capabilities of heavy artillery are obviously not the same as are the capabilities of tactical air. The essential role played by artillery is to further the clear objective of defeating the opposing army, and the range and mobility of artillery does not permit many other objectives. Hence it is logically assigned, in the main, to Army, corps, and division headquarters. Because it may take days to move heavy guns from one sector to another, it is logical for units as small as divisions to have some organic artillery. But the range and mobility of air force far exceeds that of artillery. Each single fighter-bomber can cruise far beyond the vital Army and corps areas in a matter of minutes and can support divisions at opposite ends of the battle line in a matter of hours. All operational fighter-bombers can be concentrated at one sector of the front in a period of time which would be unthinkable as the time required to mobilize artillery at that sector. With such physical flexibility would it not seem reasonable to assign such forces organically to the headquarters most able to exploit the advantages of the weapons? And would not this headquarters logically be the theater command?

A still further argument for assignment of aviation to the highest echelon is presented when considering the air-superiority objective. It is possible, as at Dunkirk, to achieve a local air superiority for a limited time. But such a condition is tenuous and not likely to be much more than an emergency measure to permit an isolated operation. Little hope can be held for a general offensive without a general air superiority in the theater of operations.[1] This theory is widely held by both ground and air specialists. How, then, must aviation be employed to achieve superiority?

The principles of war would be nullified by parceling out aviation to armies, corps, or divisions for their exclusive use when the air is controlled by the enemy. In the Napoleonic tradition the enemy would then defeat our aviation in detail. We would not be organized in such a way as to quickly assemble our air forces at the decisive time and place or to range far beyond the surface battle zones to strike enemy aviation where it would hurt most. By the same logic, if command of air were relinquished to those having paramount interest in a mere phase of air operations, such as close support, the more decisive roles of air power would doubtless be jeopardized.

[1] When this principle appears not to hold as in Korea, it can be accounted for by the fact that air superiority is not fully exploited.

For the purpose of securing air superiority, "tactical" and "strategic" aviation are employed in an identical manner. It is all one air force with one major objective. The same fighters used to support front lines are used to escort bombers which stimulate enemy air opposition. Precisely the same F-47's that escorted B-17's to Berlin were strafing the beaches at Normandy. And the next day the self-same craft were defending the communication zone by chasing buzz-bombs approaching London, or sweeping far into France and Germany to keep enemy air subdued and immobile.

Innumerable examples in World War II can be cited where "tactical," "strategic," and "defense" aircraft performed in the same struggle for air superiority. The heavy, medium, and light bombers struck at hostile air forces on the ground, inflicting severe damage to manufacturing plants, fuel production, and transportation. Our fighters caused enemy attrition in the air. Finally the air campaign won the degree of superiority which permitted our aircraft to roam over all of Europe and make possible the Normandy invasion.

For the most part our air forces were based in England, where fighters were available for air defense in periods of emergency. It would have been a gross violation of economy of force to have attempted setting up restrictive missions for separate air forces, one packaged to defend Great Britain and another to obtain control of the air over the Continent.

Combined use of all available air strength was earlier demonstrated in northwest Africa. We needed to halt the flow of German supplies to Tunisia. Heavy night bombers based in England struck at the port of Genoa, where enemy supplies were loaded. Bombers from the Middle East attacked the ports of Naples and Palermo. Others based in northwest Africa hit the same targets and added Bizerte and Tunis to the list. Fighters blasted trains and trucks en route from the ports to the front lines. All were concentrated against that objective deemed most important by the supreme commander.

It became apparent that the more sensitive the supply point we hit, the greater was the air opposition encountered, and hence the more enemy aircraft we could destroy. Thus our attacks fulfilled a twofold purpose: air superiority and interdiction. Later when Montgomery's and Eisenhower's armies began to press the Wehrmacht between its pincers, the identical aircraft used on interdiction and air superiority missions provided close ground support.

It was not possible for us to concentrate against any one objective until that job was wholly completed, then forget it and proceed to the next. In World War II it was necessary to organize so that we were able to mass our air against one objective or another as the need arose. The ability to do this was actually contingent upon the kind of organization we employed. It permitted us from time to time to concentrate on getting air superiority, to concentrate on the destruction of the means with which the Germans were carrying on the war, to concentrate maximum air strength in direct support of ground forces in periods of emergency, as at Salerno or at Leyte.

Which air operations were purely strategic? Which were tactical operations? Which were air defense operations? It becomes apparent that all such operations are conducted concurrently by all air forces. The operations have a broader scope and a more varied application than the traditional terms imply.

When a nation finds itself at war, its objective is to enforce its will on the other. This is the ultimate end product of war. To do this, a nation must force the other to quit fighting. This may be done by destroying his will to fight or by depriving him of his means to fight. Those are the significant goals of all national power, whether it is deployed on land, at sea, or in the air.

The military is essentially concerned with carrying out the shooting phase of the conflict. Always confronted with insufficient means to insure success, a Nation must rigidly compel economy of force. The United States can never afford the luxury of compartmented military services, or branches within a service, each sufficient within its own framework to carry out certain over-all roles and missions.

Without in any sense denying the need for unity of command at the top, it must be admitted that a misconceived application of the idea of unity of command has sometimes worked to the detriment of economy of force. If unity of command be carried to an extreme, the Navy would have its ground force and air force; the Army would have its own surface fleets and air force; and the Air Force would have its own navy and ground force. Each service might justify its requirements on the grounds that these additional forces would be essential to executing assigned roles and missions. Unity of command would be extolled in a general way as a necessary factor in military operations. But the need to rigidly apply economy of force prevents this. The principle of cooperation must be substituted. Fortunately the National Defense Act of 1947 and its subsequent amendments have provided the framework around which to build an effective military force with that economy which is indispensable for a Nation with finite resources.

It must be obvious that the large naval air forces operating in support of the naval mission in the Pacific during World War II would have been idle for weeks on end if used only for naval roles. As it was, they were effectively used to hit at the Philippines and Japan to supplement the tactical and strategic air force operations and to erase from the skies a large proportion of Japanese air power. It must be equally obvious that to have set up sufficient air forces to support the landing operations in Normandy would have been just as wasteful if used solely for that purpose. Nor is it possible to separate and identify all the air operations mounted exclusively for the Normandy invasion. Similarly the provision within the United States Air Force of sufficient aviation to do the long-distance job only, or the short-range Army support job only, or the air defense job only, would again violate the principle of economy of force.

Maximum air power seems possible only when air weapons are organized as one force, thus permitting air power's potential flexibility to be utilized more in accordance with the other principles of war. To those unfamiliar with the extensive communications, logistical, and other requirements for the employment of large air forces, another solution may seem simple and appropriate: Give to each army, air force, or fleet that amount of aviation needed to carry out normal missions. Then when the need arises to concentrate all forces against certain objectives, take these air forces away from their parent unit, attach them to the appropriate headquarters, and send them on their way. This solution is an oversimplification of a complex problem. The hard facts of experience have shown that it seldom works out as pat as the logic would imply.

The coordination demanded by any air operation requires an integrated, closely knit organization for communications, logistics, intelligence, and command. It must be well oiled and not allowed to get rusty during normal operations. Training in concentration, in flexibility, and in surprise types of offensive operation must be a continuing process even during combat. These massed activities of air power cannot be achieved by quickly forming a one-task organization. The degree of teamwork that permits rapid concentrations requires routine functioning with a resultant broad base of knowledge and skill. Thus can simplicity and swift movement be assured.

It can be concluded that, if the principles of war are to be most effectively applied, air power should habitually be organized as one unified force. In the words of General Vandenberg, "Tactical and strategic air power is part of the same ball of wax * * * you can't separate [it] and put [it] in neat compartments."

A recent speech by Secretary of the Air Force Thomas K. Finletter epitomizes this point and leaves slight doubt about Air Force policy in this regard. "Tactical air and strategic air are merely handles," he said, "which have been developed to identify different functions, each of which is indispensable and each of which fits into the over-all integrated structure of air power."

Furthermore there should be no rigid adherence to the predetermined priorities ascribed to certain elements of air power when a crucial issue is at stake affecting the whole of national security. Then, without regard to theoretical priorities, total air power must be thrown into the gap which threatens the very structure of our civilization. This will always be the first priority.

Air power must act promptly, not in terms of weeks, but hours. Surprise demands speed and makes mandatory the tactical control by skilled air leaders of supporting operations. The air organization must be designed to advance the national objectives with indivisible air power.

Complaints About Conditions of Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter written by a Missourian to the editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, a leading newspaper in Missouri.

This letter was printed in the issue of March 8, 1951, and was clipped from the newspaper and sent to me by Mrs. Paul Kippenberger, of St. Louis, Mo., with the remark that "this letter expresses the opinions of many." I am sure it does.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TIRED OF MANY THINGS

TO the EDITOR:

As an average American citizen, I am sick of a number of things in the American picture today.

1. I'm sick of being told we must be taxed and taxed until we're broke, when our highest officials are tax-free.

2. I'm sick of picking up the newspaper day after day and reading about the scandalous dishonesty and misuse of public funds in so many Government offices and agencies. I'm for impeaching any public official found dishonest in his duties—that is, if there are enough honest men left in Government to start an impeachment.

3. I'm sick of reading about namby-pambies who are trying to establish price controls and are having a hot-foot dance to keep from stepping on any influential group's toes. By the time they get any decent controls, high prices will long since have depleted people's pocketbooks and bankbooks, so it won't matter.

4. And I'm sick and tired of the President's tenacious loyalty in his attitude of "my friends, right or wrong before our country." If my husband, for the second time in his 30 years, is expected to put his wife and children second and his country first by leaving for the service, it seems little enough to ask of our country's highest official to put his country before his friends.

More power to you and your sentiments expressed in your editorial, Immorality in Government. A crusade for a return to God, the Golden Rule, and the Biblical laws of right and wrong is sadly needed today.

The St. Lawrence Waterway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD MARTIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "The St. Lawrence Delusion," published in the Philadelphia Daily News of Thursday, March 15, 1951.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ST. LAWRENCE DELUSION—PROJECT'S COST WOULD RUN INTO ASTRONOMICAL TOTALS, WITH VIRTUALLY NO BENEFITS

Public hearings now in progress before the House of Representatives' Public Works Committee on the feasibility of the proposed construction of a seaway along the St. Lawrence River from the Great Lakes to the sea are bringing a mass of new data to light that only accentuates the folly of this proposal. For 30 years the proponents of the seaway have been hammering periodically at Congress to enter an agreement with Canada to assist in the building of this project.

But it is now revealed that the original estimate of cost, ranging between $1,048,000,000 and $1,750,000,000, provides for only a 27-foot channel, whereas oceangoing traffic would require at least a 35-foot channel (a 40-foot channel always has been the goal of Army engineers for the Delaware River). To dredge the St. Lawrence to that depth would require at least another $1,000,000,000, competent authorities declare.

The project usually is broached in times of stress. In the early 1930's the argument was that it would provide work for many men. Now when labor is scarce, its proponents want to draw manpower from vital plants and projects to construct an improvement, the value of which is questionable in the national defense program.

Certainly, concentration of shipping in one spot, as it is proposed for this seaway, would make it particularly vulnerable in time of war to enemy bombers or submarines. During the last war, a German U-boat managed to get far up the St. Lawrence River, sink a ship and then escape.

Dispersing shipping to the Atlantic coast ports, as is done now, is a much safer method. It is hardly believable that any foe would immobilize every one of these ports at the same time, either through direct attack or sabotage. Transport by railroads, as it was shown in England and Germany during the last war, is more desirable in that railroads can be repaired quickly, or bypasses can be utilized and supplies kept moving.

But a well-placed bombing attack could knock out a project such as the St. Lawrence seaway, put its 18 locks out of commission, and make its entire 1,700 mile route a nightmare, impossible of repair for a number of years.

Diversion of freight traffic to such a seaway not only would injure the economy of the coast port cities, it would strike a heavy blow at the railroads, cost thousands of persons their jobs and generally disrupt the business in a hundred other cities that are dependent on this business.

And as far as the increased power output promised from it is concerned, the only State in the Union to benefit would be New York. In addition, the production of electricity from any hydroelectric plant along the river would be only a drop in the bucket compared with the current total produced in the United States now.

On the whole, the project is a waste of time. The money it would require could be put to far more effective use in developing concrete defensive measures and the sooner this proposal is put on the shelf again, the better it will be for the United States.

Racial Discrimination in the Armed Forces

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial entitled "Complaint Against the Army," appearing in the March 9, 1951, issue of the New York Herald Tribune, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD:

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPLAINT AGAINST THE ARMY

Against a background of rapidly dwindling racial discrimination in the Armed Forces, the charges just made against the Army by investigators for the Minneapolis branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People come as disturbing news. The NAACP group says that of 15 men shipped out of Fort Dix, N. J., recently, one was classified on his overseas movement orders as a Puerto Rican and one as an American Indian, and that on induction orders issued in several States Negroes are denoted by asterisks on the notation "col."

It is not yet clear whether these manifestations are to be regarded as typical of Army policy, or as representing individual evasions of President Truman's Executive order of July 26, 1948, which forbids discrimination in the Armed Forces. But it is striking that the charges are leveled only against the Army, while the Navy and Air Force are regarded by the investigators as pursuing satisfactorily the integration policies supposed to be practiced by all service branches.

Conceivably, there may be valid reasons for including all of a soldier's characteristics, physical and mental, on his basic record. But the Army has an obligation to explain why racial and similar information should be included on other documents, if this is actually being done. Segregation and discrimination die stubbornly, in the Armed Forces as elsewhere, but the task of eliminating them has progressed so far that we must be on guard against attempts to back-track. It is important that we deprive Communists throughout the world of the opportunity to manufacture propaganda ammunition by magnifying our lapses into bad practices. It is still more important that we keep faith with our own ideals.

Addresses by Attorney General J. Howard McGrath, Hon. Dennis Chavez of New Mexico, and Hon. Jennings Randolph Before the American Road Builders Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, the American Road Builders Association held its annual meeting at Milwaukee, Wis., last week. The Attorney General of the United States, Hon. J. Howard McGrath, former Representative Jennings Randolph, and I addressed the gathering. I ask unanimous consent that these three addresses be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. J. HOWARD MCGRATH, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Chairman, gentleman, I am grateful to the American Road Builders' Association for your invitation to take part in this annual convention.

My very good friend, Jennings Randolph, insisted on my coming here in spite of my great protestations of complete lack of knowledge concerning the immediate problems of your great industry. Nonetheless, I have ventured to come and speak to you about some of the common interests we have as citizens of this great Republic in whose immediate service I happen to be engaged.

We do live in the greatest country on earth. Our physical needs of food, clothing, housing, highways, and transportation are better taken care of than in any other country in the world. But, more than that, the individualism which is the cornerstone of our democratic edifice has made us great; our precious heritage of freedom has been an inspiration to the peoples of the world.

As our President pointed out in his state of the Union message delivered to a joint session of the Congress, we can be assured that our country at this critical time is in a healthy condition. We have by far the greatest productive capacity ever attained by any nation of people. Our people are skilled and vigorous. We are a people of great technical skills and knowledge that are constantly expanding our control over the natural resources of the ground, sea, and air that God has placed in our hands.

After the most devastating of wars we have continued to maintain standards of living approximating, in many ways excelling, our prewar levels. Since World War II we have had no such unemployment as followed World War I; in fact, we have more men and women at work than ever before. Strong heads and practical minds have been behind advances in production which have made it possible to report, for the year 1950, the production of the greatest abundance of goods in our history. In the year just past, our industries have created gigantic new standards with which to measure our industrial might.

Much of the know-how which has made this record possible was learned during World War II. Consequently we are prepared to meet the most recent challenge to modern democracy—the third in the lifetime of most of us—with greater resources, more armed might, and more inflexible determination than ever before. Against the challenge of the Kremlin, the people of the United States, together with all free peoples, will be prepared to pit formidable military strength, if necessary. I join with the President and all our people in a prayer that it will not be necessary. But, if it becomes necessary, we are pledged to produce all the weapons and equipment that our increased Armed Forces will need, no matter what their ultimate active strength. That strength must be measured by the demands of our security. We must all make great personal sacrifices to achieve this goal.

I do not minimize the present serious state of world affairs, or the enormous problems which confront our United States in this latest crisis. To do so would be foolish and dangerous.

We Americans are not fools. We recognize the nature of the challenge. Earlier challenges have been answered by us with a showing that we were prepared and able to defend our country's honor and its freedoms. Let there be no mistake. Any new challenge will be met equally well.

We Americans are no fair-weather friends of liberty and democracy. We have practiced democracy, we have lived it through the decades, we have a deep awareness of its intrinsic values. No slanders, no bullying threats from Kremlin propagandists will change our faith in the future of our American promise, or of our American democratic ideal or our belief in the future of the free nations of the world.

Nor will the American people need to be goaded into the sacrifices necessary to accomplish the great tasks which are imposed by our responsibility to ourselves and to our position of world leadership. We have vast objectives which cannot be gained by Government alone. The task must be shared by the whole American people, 151,000,000 strong. We know that all-out effort and all-out measures are required. Preparedness means careful planning and careful control over essentials which will prevent the nonessential use of vital goods. We don't like controls, yet we know we must endure them.

We will have need for substantial controls to divert goods from civilian to military use. That is the reason that credit has already been tightened on many items of trade and commerce. Other restrictions are daily being found necessary. We will have to convert plants. Materials in short supply will have to be allocated. There will be shortages in certain consumer goods. The burden of the enlarged defense program must be borne by all of us, and for that we must also expect heavy tax increases.

These are sacrifices, but they are a part of the price we are willing to pay for liberty and democracy. The quality of the zeal with which we defend our freedoms is a measure of the sacrifices we are willing to endure. I know that the American people will welcome the sacrifices made necessary by our defense effort.

With foresight born of his intimate experience as a Senator, and chairman of the Special Committee To Investigate National Defense Activities during World War II, President Truman is gathering in Washington a defense mobilization organization that will be fully able to meet the difficult problems that lie ahead. The lines of authority in this organization must be clear and straight. It must be an organization that merits the full confidence and cooperation of every American. With such confidence and cooperation, I am sure that the mission of the defense mobilization organization will be successfully accomplished. At the top of his organization, the President has placed, in the post of Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, Mr. Charles E. Wilson, formerly the president of General Electric Co., and Vice Chairman of the War Production Board during World War II.

During World War II our role was emphasized as the arsenal of weapons to defend freedom in the world. Today, however, we are the arsenal of democracy in a much greater sense. We are not only an arsenal of material weapons; also we are an arsenal of the moral and spiritual values which are the basic elements of true democracy. By our way of life, we shall show the world that we do not give up our democracy in our mobilization effort to defend it.

In our defense effort it is important that we bear clearly in mind that there is no need for us to abandon the aspirations around which our lives center. In periods of emergency it is natural that some of the rights and privileges of peacetime must be temporarily abridged or restricted in the interest of national survival. But the restrictions should be, must be, limited to the minimum. We cannot afford, by any yardstick of wisdom, to plan a wholesale discarding of the democratic processes and institutions which this Nation has developed during its decades of experience. The maintenance of both the structure and the spirit of our civil liberties is essential to the country's well-being.

In a period of emergency such as this, the undivided loyalty of all our people to the Nation and its institutions is essential. President Truman, early in his administration, foresaw the need of assuring that no disloyal persons should be employed in the Government, and, to that end, in 1947 instituted the Government employees loyalty program. Under that program the records of well over 3,000,000 employees have been checked by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. These investigations have been conducted in a manner consistent with our principles of fair play and in accordance with the provisions of the President's Executive order establishing the loyalty program; and they give us the assurance that your Government is making every effort, and successfully, to see that no disloyal person is working for it.

But many sins have been and may be committed in the name of loyalty. There are men in this country—in both private and public life—who have indicated a dangerous willingness to use this emergency as an occasion for discarding much of our carefully constructed edifice of human rights. I am frankly concerned about those who would smear every opposition sentiment with the label of communism—men who would penalize the thinking of unorthodox thoughts, or the writing of nonconformist words. Those who pose as the saviors of our Nation by seeking to abridge beyond reason our tradition of democratic freedom are as dangerous to American liberties as the Communists themselves. For, in destroying that fabric of democracy and reason, they play directly into the hands of the Kremlin's agents. In the struggle against our enemy we must be aware of the danger of losing our freedoms for the sake of victory.

In his state of the Union message to the Congress, President Truman asked the Congress for unity. But he made clear what he meant by unity. He said:

"Make no mistake about my meaning. I do not ask, or expect, unanimity. I do not ask for an end to debate. Only by debate can we arrive at decisions which are wise and which reflect the desires of the American people. We do not have dictatorship in this country, and we will never have it.

"When I request unity, what I am really asking for is a sense of responsibility on the part of every Member of this Congress. Let us debate the issues, but let every man among us weigh his words and deeds. There is a sharp difference between harmful criticism and constructive criticism. If we are truly responsible as individuals, I am sure that we will be unified as a government."

What the President requested of the Congress is just as applicable to all of the people of the country. Unity we must have. But unanimity is not expected. Responsible constructive criticism is healthy; it is not subversion or disloyalty. We must be ever alert and on guard to protect the rights of the constructive critic. We must be careful to use the words "disloyal" and "subversive" with caution. They should not be used as synonyms for "critical" and "unorthodox."

There is not any magic formula yet discovered upon which we may rely for the sure preservation of our freedoms. To the contrary, danger lurks in the recourse to catchy name calling and the easy methods of those advocates of extra-legal conduct who would justify their actions in glib phrases such as "putting down the Reds." Our best resort is to the application of common sense standards.

We have the Communist fifth column under control. We have an efficient Federal Bureau of Investigation to prevent sabotage and to keep track of Communist espionage, maneuverings, and conspiracies. But Mr. J. Edgar Hoover and I are determined that there will be no Gestapo witch hunts—that the basic civil rights of the individual will be securely protected and defended as guaranteed by the fundamental law of the land. The free America that we have inherited must be handed down in like manner to the future generations. It is, indeed, for this very reason that we are mobilizing our resources.

There is no more precious possession today than that of United States citizenship. The enslaved peoples of the world look upon our citizens as the guardians and the possessors of those moral, spiritual, political, economic, and social values which alone can bring to them the peace and freedom they so sorely need and pray for.

In the world today, where there is much chaos and confusion, we in this country have demonstrated that the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens can be respected and protected regardless of nationality, or racial or religious affiliations. It is our responsibility to recognize and meet the challenge that the free world is faced with today, for it is a real challenge.

I have never found it wise, nor will the American people find it wise, to take advice which counsels abandonment of our friends in Europe. To quote again from the President's state of the Union message: "All free nations are exposed and all are in peril. Their only security lies in banding together. No one nation can find protection in a selfish search for a safe haven from the storm * * *. If (the free nations) * * * should fall apart, the results would be fatal to human freedom

* * *. We are the most powerful single member of * * * (the community of free nations) * * * and we have a special responsibility. We must take the leadership in meeting the challenge to freedom and in helping to protect the rights of independent nations."

I have faith, our great President has faith, and the overwhelming majority of the American people have faith in their own strength, in their intelligence, and in their ideals.

As I travel about this country I gain constant faith in our people and in our institutions. I have faith particularly that we will keep our heads out of the sands of isolationism and hysteria. Alert to our problems, cherishing our great traditions, secure in the knowledge of our material and spiritual strength, Americans can face the future with quiet determination to fight the challenge of the hated dictatorships. The spectacle of our twentieth-century America is an object of pride and inspiration, and the source of spiritual strength.

To be sure, the Soviet Union has machines, and men, and mountains, and rivers; its assets, real and potential, are sizable. But no one who seeks to appraise the limits of Soviet strength can for a moment ignore what the Russian people lack, and what we have in abundance—the power of the democratic way of life, the tradition of free institutions, the respect for the individual.

We must never underestimate the power of our liberty. In the final analysis, it is the bulwark of our defense against the imperialism and brutality of communism. It is our democratic way of life that gives America the power and the inspiration of a free people. And, in this contracting world of ours, it is the example of our freedom rather than the example of our wealth which gives us a measure of spiritual and moral leadership among the people of other lands.

My friends, today our way of life is put to the test—the supreme test of whether our free country can endure—whether our people can remain free. We have met and survived other such tests—from the very first one of which our country was born—when we were only a scattered handful, but we resisted and we survived—a nation of freemen.

In the days that lie ahead we will gather our strength and mobilize our resources under the leadership of our great President. United with the community of free nations we shall be prepared to meet the challenge of any enemy, and we shall emerge once again with our heritage preserved—secure in our dignity as individual human beings.

I have tried to state briefly what I deem to be our faith and our strength, and in conclusion I wish to quote from a recent editorial comment in one of our national magazines. I believe this more clearly states the message I deliver tonight than anything I have read since the beginning of the present crisis.

"It is the aim of everyone these days to speak very distinctly. And it should be the duty of speakers and writers, at any rate, to put things in their proper place in relation to the natural world and to avoid preoccupation with sudden, dark events that are only a small part of a very great picture. A man can search his morning paper in vain for a crumb of comfort, yet no man should forget that most of the strongest assets are on our side, many of the heavist liabilities are on the Soviet Union's. The burden Russia carries is the simple burden of wishing to conquer and rule the world by guile and by strength. This is an ancient dream that has in every instance thrown the dreamer. Our own dream is not to rule the world, but to save and fortify the free men in an atmosphere of freedom. This, too, is an ancient dream, and although it has been a very costly one, it has never let anybody down yet. Even if it should now prove costly beyond all ability to pay, it is still worth following and there can never be a valid reason to deviate, to hesitate, or to compromise."

ADDRESS BY HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ, UNITED STATES SENATOR, CHAIRMAN, SENATE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Good afternoon, friends in the American Road Builders. I am getting to be a regular at your meetings. This is the fourth time I have attended. I have enjoyed each and every one of them.

I have a feeling that most people don't go to the convention to listen to speeches. But a Senator or a Congressman always has a few remarks to deliver. I am no exception. But the few things I have to say this afternoon do not represent a speech. I only want to talk with you, and give you some ideas of mine about public works in this accelerating defense period.

You are principally interested in roads. But construction of any kind draws your interest, too. I'll start out on roads.

I think there is one thing that must be unmistakably clear to all of us in the Government and to those charged with the highway program in the States. This is—the maintenance of the highway plant of the United States should not be confused with new construction at any time.

Roads and the contributing industries and services represent about one-seventh of the total national economy. It's big business.

When the Nation began its modern road-building program following World War I, there was continued expansion of activity. Each year, with the exception of 1923, the accomplishment was greater than in the year before. This continued through 1930. Thereafter the depression produced some slight recessions, but peak performance was reached in 1938 and a high level of performance was maintained in every year through 1941. In this period a network of main highways covering the entire country was created.

In the same period the passenger car was converted from the model T to the powerful, smooth-running car of today. The truck was developed from a light vehicle of uncertain utility to the dependable vehicle now used in every form of production. The economic and social life of the Nation was expanded and rearranged in a manner made possible only by highway transport.

By 1940 it was evident that the road building that had preceded was only a pioneer effort, that the types of road built for the volume and kind of traffic of the 1920's and early 1930's would not be adequate for the kind of highway service the Nation must have. The main highways needed strengthening, widening, and straightening to accommodate the large movement of people and goods. Conditions on the main arteries through cities had become intolerable. Accidents, congestion, and delay were resulting in costs far greater than that of providing the needed expressways and arterial routes. At the same time there was need to construct a large mileage of secondary or farm-to-market roads to give us a completely balanced system of highways in both rural and urban areas.

A highway program on a scale much larger than any that had preceded was an urgent requirement. It was recognized that the cost would be great but it was well within our means. It did not loom as an insuperable obstacle as did the cost of the Federal-aid system when it was first designated.

There was general agreement as to the character of improvements needed and that they should be built but attempts to carry out the plan have met many vicissitudes.

World War II began almost immediately and general highway construction was stopped. In the aggregate a large amount of work was done in building highways to serve war installations and to reach raw materials. A few improvements were made on main highways to keep traffic moving but the condition of the system declined. Thousands of miles of highway surface reached the end of economic life and were not replaced. At the end of the war there was the greatest accumulation in history of old surfaces that could not be maintained in use with any reasonable expenditure.

It was expected that highway construction would start in a big way at the end of the war. The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1944 had been enacted providing $500,000,000 for each of the first three postwar fiscal years. The States were in excellent financial positions with motor vehicle revenues accumulated during the war. It was expected that men and equipment released from war operations would find employment on highway work.

Things did not work out as expected. High prices and shortages of men, equipment, and materials slowed action. Many readjustments were necessary before we could return to normal peacetime conditions.

Highway work did begin in 1946 but it gained momentum slowly. Progress was better in 1947 but nowhere near the desired pace. We have had good years in 1948, 1949, and 1950. In 1950 the State highway departments awarded contracts for 55,467 miles at a cost of $1,500,000,000. Federal-aid projects accounted for 23,429 miles at a cost of $820,000,000. Work actually completed during the year was not far below the rate at which contracts were awarded. Since the end of the war 82,000 miles of highway have been completed in the Federal-aid program.

Highway improvement has reached a high level but it has not yet grown to the size necessary to produce an adequate system within a reasonable period of years. Estimates of the cost of making all needed improvements range from $42,000,000,000 to $47,000,000,000.

If we decide to eliminate these deficiencies within a period of 15 years and also replace those highways that wear out or become obsolete within the 15 years, we shall have to make an expenditure of $3,800,000,000 each year for the 15 years. Of this amount, $1,443,000,000 would go on the Federal-aid system in rural areas, and $755,000,000 on the Federal-aid system in urban areas. An additional $732,000,000 would go on the Federal-aid secondary system, and $480,000,000 on rural highways not on the present Federal-aid systems.

The annual expenditure actually being made for highway construction is approximately $2,400,000,000, including expenditures for toll roads. Our expenditure falls short of what may be considered a minimum desired figure by $1,400,000,000.

For at least 10 years the gap between existing highways and the kind of improvements needed has continually widened. At this juncture when it appears that we may prevent further widening of the gap and possibly make some progress in closing it, a disturbed international situation brings on the prospect of checking or stopping the program through controls over equipment, materials, and manpower.

I have had close contact with highway matters for a number of years and I can see serious danger in the thought that our highway system can be kept in its present condition by what are ordinarily called maintenance methods alone.

Highway interests are likely to suffer because of the narrow scope of the work that is commonly included under the heading of maintenance. Light work of the kind that can be done by patrol crews with hand tools and small machines is all that is commonly included. If an entire surface is to be relaid or if a 2-inch layer of bituminous mixture is to be placed, it is called construction mainly because such work is done by contractors rather than by State or county-employed maintenance gangs.

Each year a large mileage of highway reaches the end of its economic life and can no longer be kept in use by a reasonable expenditure of funds. Often a badly worn surface is associated with narrow width, sharp curves and steep grades wholly unsuited for the present volume and speed of traffic. Replacement of such surfaces is just as much maintenance as is the replacement of ballast, ties, and rails on a railroad. Also it is just as important to the country in accomplishing its main objective—war production.

The motor vehicle almost overnight changed the utility of highways from local to Nation-wide scope. The boundaries between counties and States for travel purposes disappeared. It became necessary to think of the highway system as a national problem.

Congress, when it framed the basic legislation, recognized the nature of road improvements. The following is quoted from the original Federal-Aid Road Act of July 1916:

"The term 'construction' shall be construed to include reconstruction and improvement of roads; 'properly maintained' as used herein shall be construed to mean the making of needed repairs and the preservation of a reasonably smooth surface considering the type of road, but shall not be held to include extraordinary repairs, nor reconstruction."

In 1949 our State highway departments completed 22,425 miles on primary State systems outside of cities, including the work done on the Federal-aid highway system. Of this mileage 17,288 miles was resurfacing of existing pavements. It was maintenance of such character that it had to be done by contractors. Of the remaining 5,137 miles a very large portion consisted of construction to replace worn surface where the location was so poor that it was best to abandon it and build on new location.

In reconstructing an old highway it is almost always necessary to do something more than replace the worn facility in kind. Most often a greater width of surface is required to make the highway safe. When an old bridge is about to fall down it is almost always necessary to replace it with a bridge having a wider roadway and greater strength. It would be a great mistake not to modernize as facilities are rebuilt. Our construction program for several years has been almost entirely a maintenance operation if we consider the term "maintenance" to mean the keeping of existing highways in a condition satisfactory for use.

The gravity of the international situation has increased constantly since the end of the war. No one can say with assurance what the future holds in store. The only safe assumption to make is that the necessity for a build-up of strength for defense may continue for a number of years. The degree of the build-up is unknown and unstable.

I do not consider it intelligent preparation for defense to permit highway transportation to deteriorate in any degree. The main highways are the assembly lines of a large portion of our defense plants. Raw materials move over the highways to plants. Parts for weapons and machines move from one plant to another for processing. Plants assembling airplanes, tanks, trucks, and electronic devices receive a daily flow of parts from a great number of smaller plants making parts. The highways are links in the assembly line that may extend for hundreds of miles. Speedy conversion from raw material to finished product would not be possible without these links.

We must feed, clothe, and house our war workers and all the rest of our population. Usage of highways must continue for these purposes. Recent studies show that highway usage follows very closely the trend in national income when corrected so that each dollar represents the same purchasing power. Omitting the period of war restrictions it has been found that for nearly 20 years there has been 1 mile of vehicle travel to every three and one-half to four dollars of national income expressed in dollars having the purchasing power of the dollar during the period 1935–39.

There is no question that national income will continue to be large throughout the period of defense activity however long it may last. It will be possible to check recreational travel if that becomes necessary but transport for defense production, movement of workers to and from their jobs, and supplying workers with the necessities of life must continue. It will be a serious blow to preparedness if highways are permitted to decline so that transport can be accomplished only with increasing effort.

We should not permit our highways to decline in any degree below their present condition. This will require a substantial replacement program as well as continuation of normal maintenance operations. Men, machines, and materials should be provided in sufficient quantity for this purpose.

Ordinarily, I would lean heavily toward State authority and responsibility in programs. I am a firm believer in the Federal Government being cooperative, but not dictatorial. Bureaucracy at the helm is a slow and devious path. But side by side, it is a dandy team. These are not ordinary times, however.

In the fields of roads and rivers and harbors and flood control, these activities must go on unless our struggle for freedom reaches such a pitch that it is a deadly matter of life. A third major activity of the Committee on Public Works—that of public buildings—is more in direct conflict with the war effort than roads and the activities of the Corps of Army Engineers.

Into public buildings such as office buildings, post offices, and United States courthouses or custom houses, we have to put structural steel, copper, a lot of aluminum, and we reach into the brass field. There is also the manpower situation. This is also true of any private construction of buildings. Any program of new post offices or office buildings can well be postponed. The Government can put off its work. The less we do, the more essential private industry can do. Public buildings are out for the time being.

Right now we are feeling a severe pinch in construction materials. Big slices are being diverted into defense work. I don't believe there is a good program involving the diversion. We create brand-new agencies to take over materials and work handled previously by established agencies, and it doesn't make for an orderly program.

Right now, our production of aluminum and steel and other essentials is being stepped up greatly. In the meantime, national defense production is grabbing a big cut of present output. I firmly believe that in another 12 months we will reach a balance on steel and several other items. That means more will be available for civilian needs than now.

In 2 years, at the present stage of defense preparedness, and in view of the ceilings placed on military personnel and equipment, our increased production will not only carry the defense equipment but also come back to near present-day levels on materials.

In the meantime, there is some question of whether the military ought to have blanket authority to take over material output wholesale. The military effort has needs, and these needs can be arrived at. What is left can be distributed to carry on civilian work in nearly every field. I am not arguing against cutting back what the military needs. I am saying let the military arrive at efficient needs, and then what is left we will parcel out in an orderly and sensible program.

We have criteria established by which we judge whether or not irrigation and river and harbor and flood-control work can go on. What the Congress and the President ask on each project of the Corps of Army Engineers is:

Will it develop hydroelectric power for a needed area? Will it provide a water supply in critical areas? Would stopping work on the dam or reservoir projects make them useless? Is it an important harbor or waterway? Is it to protect important industries or major food-producing areas? Can it be finished economically during the present working season? Does it involve almost entirely earth movement, and will it use critical materials? Then, of course, we always ask if it helps in the national defense directly?

There is no doubt in my mind but what Gen. Lewis Pick, of the Army Engineers, and Commissioner Thomas MacDonald of the Bureau of Public Roads know what they are doing and they know what can be done and what shouldn't be done on a national scale. General Pick has a voice through the Army and the defense needs.

I would like to see Commissioner MacDonald have a powerful voice in this materials picture and regulation. I think, after defense and certain civilian needs in other fields are determined in Washington, that share which might be used in roads should be under the direction of Mr. MacDonald. Knowing what he has, he could set up criteria, and the States could then plan and build with a solid program and a real knowledge and certain definite thinking.

The Bureau of Public Roads, looking at all States, could allot strategic materials which it has on a priority-order basis. Certain roads and certain bridges would be built. On others, the roadway would be repaired or built, but bridges might be omitted, in a stage construction program. Unless we have something like this, we are going to have costly bidding, confused authority and contractors, and a darned good mess in just a short time. I think we could avoid black markets of any kind in the construction picture, insofar as public works is concerned.

There must be some clear thinking and programing at the top level in Washington, or no one will know what he is doing in the States. If we have a sensible program, then we can go along in the States in public works as materials and manpower will allow, and we can keep going forward. As the materials picture changed, so could the program on roads and rivers and harbors. It would make sense to everyone concerned, and there would be a clear explanation. Unless we get something modeled like this, I am afraid a lot of your activity is going to stop. It would be short-sighted, and dangerous, to stop.

Some of you out there are perhaps wondering whether I am advocating Government control. Well, the Selective Service controls your young sons. There are wage freezes and price freezes, and this and that. That is controls, and they are for your benefit—our mutual benefit. I am advocating some Government controlled planning in Washington, for the defense needs and stimulated production. What is left after defense needs should be allocated. Such controls—if you want to call them controls—would be to your benefit.

Let me give you a very graphic example. During World War II, the Public Buildings Administration was engaged in erecting some office space for defense workers in Washington. One early afternoon a certain group of the military swooped down on the job waving a priority order and whisked away the cement. The carpenters and skilled workmen were left standing there and the confusion was terrific. The military used the cement to build some sidewalks at a military installation very near Washington. A return to something like that is not only ridiculous, but intolerable.

Thanks for listening to a few ideas. It was a pleasure to talk with you. When I step down from here, I am not going away. Mrs. Chavez and I will still be around, and we will see you at the banquet tomorrow night. Thank you all.

ADDRESS BY HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH, TREASURER, AMERICAN ROAD BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION, ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT, CAPITAL AIRLINES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE FIGHT FOR FREEDOM

Americans, regardless of religious creed or political party, must be awakened to the terrible truth that communism threatens Christianity and democracy in practically every part of the world.

Time for compromise is over, if that course was ever the one to pursue, with the Red rulership of Russia. The Kremlin's orders demanded, and direct today, the aggression into South Korea. We now know that Stalin plotted the control of all of that strategic peninsula of the Pacific, even though a pretense of cooperation was being pledged within the United Nations.

With perverted propaganda and the power of armed might, the Communists have set forth on a conquest which is aimed at control of all the earth. That statement is not too drastic a one to make, for the facts prove that Red Russian leaders are determined to achieve, by whatever means necessary, the domination of the peoples of the world.

Let us look at the record, not through the eyes of partisanship, but as men and women who believe in personal freedom and the practice of Christian citizenship. The sooner all of us realize what is happening, the better for mankind. Let us devoutly resolve to end our confusion here at home, and replace appeasement policies of the past with courage and power—as we use the righteous sword to turn back the evil force bent on making slaves of men and women.

Communism, directed from Moscow, today controls 40 percent of the world's population. This tragic truth must be faced. In a little more than 11 years the bluff and the bloodshed, caused by the Red aggression, has given to communism country after country. In 1939 Russian dictatorship embraced 171,000,000 persons while today it controls at least 850,000,000 men and women across more than 11,000,000 square miles of the earth's surface.

In every direction—north, east, south, west—the Reds have been on the march. In 1939 Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania were caught in the web of communism. A year later Bessarabia and Bukovina were being absorbed. For a few years (during World War II) Russia fought to protect its own homeland and people, but in 1945 its tentacles were reaching out again. Finland fell, as did Czechoslovakia, Poland, East Prussia and the Kuriles. Into the dragnet in 1948 went Rumania and Bulgaria. Soon it was Albania and parts of Germany. Then Yugoslavia and North Korea followed, and Manchuria and China collapsed within the Red circle of communism.

Red Russia is not concerned with its own security. A carefully calculated conspiracy and conquest is under way. Americans, and free people everywhere, abhor war. But we believe that the souls of men and women are more precious than mere physical bodies. Now, not later, is the time of testing. The United States, and other free nations that stand with us, must be ready for any emergency.

In our Nation we resolutely manufacture equipment and mobilize manpower and resources in a determined drive to prevent a possible all-out world war III.

In the highway and airport fields, we can and will make an important contribution. We are here in convention assembled to merge all our efforts to the end that they will materially aid the common cause of freedom.

Postal Workers' Pay—They Receive Less Than Day Laborers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein an article published by the Redford Record on March 16, 1951, at Redford, a part of Detroit, Mich.

This paper has as its editor and publisher Mr. Floyd McGriff, one of the most prominent newspapermen in the entire metropolitan area of Detroit:

POSTAL WORKERS PAID LESS THAN DETROIT DAY LABORERS

With very few exceptions, there is no large group of public servants who have evidenced more loyalty to the service they represent than the postal workers. This loyalty has been maintained in the face of continually mounting adverse conditions which currently are decidedly prevalent.

The working conditions of the postal employee are continually worsening because of economy cut-backs by Executive orders, and because of failure to expand and equip post offices proportionately to the expansion of business.

His compensation has lagged far behind that provided in private industry for many years; so much so, in fact, that he is unable to live on a plane with his fellow men. If he chooses to house, clothe, feed, medicate, and insure himself and his family at a standard currently existing, he must seek outside employment, thus reducing, by long working hours, his efficiency for both employers. Inefficiency brands him as one unqualified for advancement, and his lot, and that of his family, is fixed at a standard far below par.

DON'T GET DAY-LABOR RATE

Loyalty has repeatedly been exemplified as honorable, but the loyalty of the postal worker, to the service he represents, appears to be an act of dishonorableness to his wife and kiddies.

His salary status is summed up briefly by the following: In 1944 he started at a salary of $1,700 per annum and graduated to $2,100 per annum—$40 a week—after 5 years of service. By gradual upgrading since 1944 his entrance salary is now $2,670 per annum or $51 a week (about $1.31 per hour), in 7 years. He may upgrade himself $100, or 4.9 cents per hour, each year for 10 years by diligently applying himself to his work and becoming skilled in several of the many operations connected with mail handling. This is less than common day labor wages in Detroit. These postal salaries have been, and still are, far below Detroit salaries provided in private industry, and far too low to cope with present living costs. Day labor in the building trades—helpful but unskilled—is $1.90 an hour in Detroit today.

POSTAL WORKER MUST STUDY

In but few trades or professions is it more difficult to gain perfection for advancement than in postal operation. The postal worker must qualify on two or three, and sometimes four, of the several operations of mail handling. These operations involve schemes of separation, necessitating months of study and qualifying by examination. The schemes involve separation of mail to all cities served by certain railroads and all other railroads connected therewith; separation of mail for an entire city to respective delivery stations; separation of mail for all carrier routes out of a given delivery station; and many other complicated separations. His qualifications for advancement also require a knowledge of classification of mail matter, rates of postage, amounts of fees, courteously serving the public, and assuming responsibilities of finances. The letter carrier, in addition to knowing his route thoroughly, must start his day at an early hour, and in any kind of good or miserable weather serve his patrons faithfully.

The present plight of postal workers is, and always has been, in the lap of Congress. Adjustments can only be made through legislation by our Senators and Congressmen in Washington.

UNITED STATES EXAMPLE UNWORTHY

As legislators for the greatest and wealthiest country in the world, Congress advocates and sets standards for the rest of the world to follow. When strikes occur, and when differences of opinion arise between management and labor, Government with mediation and conciliation officers often steps in and effects adjustments at standards far in excess of that provided for postal and other Government employees.

Adjustments in private industry usually result from deliberations by representatives numbering 3, 4, or 5, from each faction, with possibly some one or two representatives of Government. Postal and other Government employees have no similar bargaining rights, nor are they privileged to enter into deliberations in equal strength with Congress. They must appeal to and gain favorable support of a 24-man Post Office Civil Service Committee in the House and a 13-man committee in the Senate, in connection with legislative bills. Following this, the bills must be presented to the whole Congress, and appeals for a favorable majority vote must be made to 435 Congressmen and 96 Senators. If legislation is successful up to this point it must be signed by the President.

Many pitfalls occur in this procedure, and even though a favorable majority sentiment is manifested; parliamentary procedure, failure of committees to meet, filibusters, and many other stumbling blocks result in no action. When no action is taken and Congress adjourns, the employees concerned can only sit back for another year and wait until the next session of Congress. If Congress adjourns sine die, the proposed legislation dies with it, and the procedure must be started over again.

This has occurred over and over again, and is the principle reason why salaries of postal and other Government employees are always lagging behind that provided in private industry.

The United States mails is a service intended for business, social, and general economic purposes. Its efficient existence is an absolute necessity for the betterment of every single activity from coast to coast, and border to border. Its efficiency, however, is rapidly diminishing because of low salaries being paid to employees engaged in handling the mails.

People qualified to perform the necessary work are unobtainable because of the low salaries and lack of other inducements, and steer clear of working in the service which is the very bloodstream of our country.

Women and Civil Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, on the evening of March 17 the distinguished Representative from Utah, Mrs. REVA BECK BOSONE, delivered an able and informative address to a joint meeting of five women's civic clubs in Washington, D. C. In my opinion, this address, which is entitled "Women and Civil Defense," has national significance. I therefore ask that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WOMEN AND CIVIL DEFENSE

I have been asked to speak to you tonight on the place of the American women in our civil defense.

I have not given my talk a title but if I did, maybe I would adopt the newspaper style and call it "The Bomber Brings the War to the Woman." For today the front line is closer to the clothesline than at any time in our history.

Let me begin my talk by repeating a statement made at a recent meeting of a congressional committee. The witness, discussing some of the terrors of Bataan and elsewhere, said, "Among the first of our troops to cave in under the hardships and the cruelties were those who had nothing to come home to".

Now, ladies, I ask you to take that thought home with you and ponder over it. "Nothing to come home to"—"Something to come home to." There is a challenge. There is a responsibility. There is a duty. You will have other challenges, other responsibilities, other duties but you will never have a more important one than keeping America something worth "coming home to".

We on the home front are facing many situations we have never had to face before—situations which a few years ago we would have thought impossible.

But we are beset by a myriad of things which will demand answers. They cover every field of life.

There are the many problems of our organized civil defense—and those of you who take an active part in that will learn just how many.

There are the problems which are vital to civil defense but which are not listed as such.

There are the many things you patriotic women can do and will do—in addition to whatever regular duties you have.

There are so many things to do that I shall not presume to lay out any program for club women and will not attempt to set up any target at which you can aim.

Rather I will give you some of my ideas on women's responsibilities in times like these and try to point out a few of the many things which must be done.

I ask myself, "What is civil defense?"

To me "civil defense" means many things.

It is that vast program now taking form in our Federal, State, and local civil defense administration.

It is that vast program of the production line with women turning out the materials needed for peace and war.

It is that vast program of keeping our moral fiber strong and healthy under adverse conditions.

It is that vast program of nurturing our youth and preparing them for tomorrow.

It is that vast program of keeping a home a home in spite of "Hades and high water."

Yes, and even those women who go forth with their market baskets on their arms and stubbornly refuse to buy meat and thereby do more to make an effective price control than Congress has done are engaged in an important phase of civil defense.

So, with civil defense meaning all that, just where do you fit in?

Bombers might make you homeless—but you are still a woman.

The factory might call you from your kitchen or from your office—but you are still a woman.

Events may make you the top hand in the office, or might move you into the executive spot in the firm—but you are still a woman.

You might be clerk or carpenter, artist or author, laborer or legislator—but you will still be a woman. And being a woman you will have responsibilities which you could not shirk even if you would.

For that same Creator who decreed that woman would carry the child from embryo to birth also decreed that it was woman's responsibility to protect the human race and the family home against the ravages of war and pestilence—and that same Creator who heaped all that responsibility on the female of the species also gave her the strength and courage and fortitude to carry all those burdens and still have something left for times of greater emergency.

I shall touch only lightly on the part women will play in our organized civil defense program for the doors are being opened wide for you to get your knowledge along that line from experts. But I urge all of you who do ally yourself in any civil defense group to learn well the fundamentals of your job, for when crises come they come with unexpected suddenness and from unexpected angles and the good civil defense worker is the one who can quickly adapt himself to any shift in a situation.

In World War I we had no civil defense as we know it today. We did not have the problems. There was some sabotage, but that was the Army's headaches. Rolling bandages, passing out candy and cigarettes, keeping up the morale of the soldiers and sailors—those were the chief aspects of civil defense at that time. Then, too, the value of or the need for women in heavy industry was hardly even considered.

World War II saw women come to the fore in industry. And World War II saw America getting uneasy for the first time about the possibility of an enemy striking our cities and towns. Yes, World War II saw the birth of civil defense and, believe me, that baby has grown in the past 5 years.

Developments during the closing year of the war and in the years since the war indicate that America can be hit from the air. Developments of undersea craft call to mind that even with the subs of World War I, a daring German pig-boat crew crept into New York harbor and the men took turns at looking through the periscope at the harbor lights of our greatest city.

The adroitness of the present day saboteur and the many weapons with which he has to work—poison for drinking and ventilating systems, germs, plant infestations, explosives—in fact, chemical and biological material of many types and descriptions—make us aware that eternal vigilance is necessary.

The success of enemy attack, no matter what kind, will be in the inverse ratio to the efficiency of our civil and military defense.

Rather than catalog the many, many things for which the organized civil defense is responsible, let me give you a rough example. Because I am more familiar with the activity in the West, I shall use my home city of Salt Lake City and its neighbor, Los Angeles, as an illustration.

Should there be an attack on our west coast, Los Angeles and the cities in the vicinity would have, among other things, problems of exodus. Salt Lake City and Utah, on the other hand, would probably have problems of influx. Goodness knows how many people in southern California—I know several myself—who each have 20 and 30 gallons of gasoline buried in their backyards. They fear that if there is an attack, there will be a big traffic jam around filling stations and they plan on getting on their way early.

Utah believes that in case of an attack on the coast there will be literally thousands of persons who will make a hurried departure from the target area and head for high mountains. Accordingly, Utah is preparing one camp in the southwest corner of the State which will accommodate 10,000 refugees for a night or two. Then there will be at least two more camps of 10,000 capacity not far away. In the center and eastern portion of the State will be some more camps. Not only must there be plans and a considerable amount of actual material for these camps but arrangements must be made to keep the expected heavy traffic off the roads which would probably be jammed with either war or relief material. Obviously camps to house thousands of refugees who might never come cannot be fully constructed but such fundamental things as potential water supply, sanitary facilities, streets, roads, shopping centers must be far beyond the planning stage and there must be enough personnel and readily available equipment to handle such a load when and if it hits.

Should storms or road failures or some other things stop the refugees short of the regular camps, there must be preparations for field kitchens, field hospitals, field repair shops, and so on. And these things will not be of any value unless there is a communication system over which to order the proper things to the proper place and unless there is a transportation system to get them there. The age groups of the refugees, their physical and mental health, and the amount of their physical belongings will vary those problems of civil defense and woman's part in it.

Thus, while Los Angeles civil defense would be busy fighting fire, protecting health, preventing looting, guarding against sabotage, housing the homeless, allaying panic, fighting traffic jams, Utah would have a different type of problem. And if Salt Lake City and its military installations, its big copper and steel mills were to be the target, its civil defense would have to handle the problems of catastrophe and some other area would have to handle the problems of flight.

One could go on and on, thinking up not only possibilities, but probabilities. Each situation would be different and would call for a different approach. That is why I urge you who get into civil defense to learn well your task, for problems will be thrown at you from all sides.

But let us not in our discussion forget the fundamental thought of this talk—that no matter if a woman is filling a man's job, she is still a woman and has responsibilities which she will not shun.

It may be the school in your neighborhood; it may be your church; it may be the girl at the next desk, or the young fellow who is sick because he has to go to service, or the boy who is sick because he can't go; it may be the father who fears that he will lose a son, or it may be the mother who has, or it may be a girl whose hope for a home of her own and a family is out there somewhere facing only God knows what—but all around you, you will find small but important areas of civil defense—things which are not in the book and things which you don't know just how to handle. But you'll handle them. You'll handle them because that's the woman in you.

In the years ahead you are certain to have new challenges from such things as juvenile delinquency, and I consider the successful meetings of those challenges a very definite part of civil defense, not only for our times but for our children's times.

Defects of one period have a habit of slapping us in the face in a later period. I am especially interested in the report of Senator LISTER HILL on draft rejectees. According to Senator HILL, 46 percent of the young men who have been drafted since 1948 were declared unfit for military service. These young men were in the age bracket of 19 to 25 years. Whether the malnutrition of the big depression—these boys were just babies then, many of them underfed and poorly clothed—whether their deficiencies today are traceable to their difficulties of 20 years ago, I cannot say, but I certainly believe that it might be the case.

Figures also indicate that in areas where there are good schools the number of boys found unfit for military service is much smaller than in those areas which have poor schools. That, to me, is another angle of civil defense which might be explored, for it seems to follow that those who fail in their duties during peacetime fail in their duties during war, and to me civil defense requires the best there is in all of us all of the time.

High taxes inspire demands for reduced expenditures, and it is surprising how often the suggestion is to reduce the expenditures for the most important but less tangible things we are doing for ourselves and our future. One of the places usually hit, or at least hit at, is our educational system. To me our educational system is even more important in war than in peace. For as war takes the man away from the home, and as economics force the woman to go to work, the school and the school teacher must fill some of the void in the life of the growing youngster. Maintaining our school systems at a high standard is a matter of civil defense at all times, for if we weaken our educational institutions 1 year, we shall pay for it dearly 20 years later. Today in our schools are the youngsters of the boys who fought in Asia and Europe for us, and unless we provide the best possible education for them we do a double wrong—we fail the soldier parent and the girl who makes America something to come home to and we do irreparable damage to the America of the next generation. Then there are the diseases of tension—a whole category of nervous conditions which show up in times of stress—and there is alcoholism which still defies solution and which could add to the problems of civil defense.

One of the big problems is going to be filling the jobs in the armed services that women can best perform and filling the jobs in industry that women will have to perform.

During the last war women did a magnificent job in the services and in industry. They may be called upon to duplicate that effort. But whether the job be in the armed services or in industry, the first consideration should be given to the women between 45 and 60 years old. Youth will still demand and get its own consideration. These older women have already reared their children and usually have a lot of time on their hands. My court experience has shown me that the woman between those ages is lost without her children and is hungry for something to do but exceedingly timid about going out of the home for training or to fill the position. There are many places which these women could fill admirably and I see no reason why the first call should not be for them. I am quite sure that the recognition would give them a great deal of satisfaction and happiness and would rebuild the ego of an age group that is apt to lose it.

There are seven or eight million women in this age group who are engaged in housework, and I am certain that from this reservoir a great number of capable persons could be brought into the services of industry.

The Department of Labor, which will have the responsibility of recruiting labor for industry, is already giving considerable thought to ways and means of getting women back into industry should the need arise.

Ten years ago there was a big pool of unemployed—more than 7,000,000 able-bodied men—who were ready and eager to get to work. In addition to that group was another huge pool of women workers who had not then given serious thought to getting into a job away from home. But things have changed. We have more persons employed now than ever before; our pool of unemployed labor is practically nil and the women who 10 years ago came to the rescue so to speak are either listed among the 60,000,000 who have jobs, or have passed into an older age group or have started raising a family of their own.

The problem of recruitment is going to be more serious as we get into the job of producing both guns and butter. According to reports the people in the public employment offices are already making plans to have the clubwomen of the Nation help them in some of their recruitment problems—sometimes actually filling some of the jobs, sometimes helping others fill the jobs.

But there is still another approach to job-filling which I shall pass on to you.

During World War II industry was on a 48-hour week a good bit of the time. Actually, however, the average workweek for that period was 45 hours. Just think of that! With millions and millions working in industry, an average of 3 hours a week per man was lost through absenteeism. Millions of days of production lost! This absenteeism was due to illness, accident, faulty transportation, crowding of nursery schools, time to catch up with home duties, and often just too much partying the night before.

Some of you women who want to make a real contribution to the war effort, look into that matter of absenteeism. Many of those millions of days lost might have been saved.

The problem can be approached from any number of angles. True, you can't just overnight stop accidents in industry, but you can see that you and your associates observe all the rules and regulations aimed at preventing accidents—not only on the job but in your home and in your automobile. You perhaps can't help someone from getting sick, but perhaps you can help them get better more quickly. You cannot take over the household duties for your neighbor, but maybe you can do some shopping for her or otherwise do things which will permit her to stay on that job that extra day. There are so many things, not part of your daily task, which you can do to help in the defense effort.

As I look at the educational films showing how to survive an atomic attack, I cannot believe that anything can be so fantastic and yet so real. It does not seem possible that atomic disaster—or even the disaster of a full-sized air blitz—can hit any city in this great country.

But fantastic as it might appear, such a catastrophe is entirely possible—cruelly and absolutely possible.

Somehow, awful though an attack would be, I do not fear for America. The American man has always done his job well, and the American woman will be standing right by his side sharing his tragedies, if there be any.

There is no difference between the modern American woman and her pioneer grandmother. The present-day woman may have finer clothes and softer hands but she has that same intangible thing called courage—the same urge to carry on and do her part to make America a home.

If a bomb spreads ruin, the American woman will be there to help remove the debris.

If there be sickness or accident, she will be there to nurse.

If the hand that guides the machine falls, she will step into the driver's seat and carry on.

Everywhere I look I see a task to be done and a woman moving quietly to do it. She knows a job need not seem important to be important. It need not be far away, it can be right at hand; it need not be heralded by a trumpet—it might be murmured by a heartbreak.

In this talk tonight I am not sure that I have told you anything you did not already know. I only hope that I have touched upon the things you feel. I know that each of you has already— nd in your own way—probed the field to see just where you could best fit into the task ahead. I know each of you will fill your niche and fill it well.

But if I were to presume to give you executive women advice, I would merely ask that you let your mother instinct—and what woman does not have that instinct—set your course for you. It will not steer you wrong. Let's keep America something to come home to.

Hospitals for Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have an editorial, published in the February 22, 1951, issue of the Dodge County Independent, printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. This newspaper is published by Mr. Philip S. Duff, Jr., a very energetic and able young man in our State who has just recently been elected to the State legislature.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOSPITALS FOR DEFENSE

A nurse in St. Paul's Ancker Hospital was quoted as follows after the recent tragic explosion at the Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company plant:

"Look at the terrible confusion which this blast has caused here. What would we do in case of an air raid?"

This exclamation dramatized the need for adding to Minnesota's total of 10,000 general hospital beds, not only to better meet the peacetime needs of our people, but also to provide facilities which will be urgently needed in case of war.

The particular need, it appears to us, is for more small hospital facilities in communities throughout the rural areas of Minnesota.

Should atomic bombs fall upon Minneapolis, St. Paul, or Duluth, most hospital facilities there will almost certainly be put out of action, for city hospitals tend to be located in or near the industrial areas which make prime targets for bombers. Then first-aid workers would have to fall back upon Minnesota's rural hospitals.

The Federal Hospital Construction Act is already a going concern. Several Minnesota communities have already received up to 50-percent aid under this program in the construction of small hospitals.

But appropriations for this hospital program are now awaiting congressional action, and there is some danger that these funds may be caught in the general rush to cut out nonessential domestic spending during this emergency period.

We heartily endorse this domestic economy—indeed, we believe that those governmental programs which merely allow us civilians to enjoy life a little more should be slashed to the bone—but we would think it a tragic mistake if something so essential to defense as rural hospitals should be included in this pruning operation. We commend Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY and others who are endeavoring to obtain adequate grants for rural hospital construction.

Lax Security at Argonne Atomic Laboratory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED E. BUSBEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of the radio broadcast of Mr. Paul Harvey over the American Broadcasting System on Sunday evening, March 18, 1951, respecting the lack of security at the Argonne National Laboratory at Lemont, Ill.:

Good evening, Americans, last night I talked to a banquet of Legionnaires. Afterward, during the parade past the speaker's table, one said, "Thank God, Mr. Harvey, for your fearless defense of Americanism." For a moment I was taken aback.

For a long moment I wondered what Tom Jefferson or Dan Webster or Patrick Henry would say if they knew that in 1951 a man had to defend Americanism. And that he would be called fearless for doing it. But I know what the gentleman meant. It's not easy. But I'll tell you something, the credit is not rightly due me. The praise is not due the Harveys because it happens we have a secret weapon.

I've been attacked, smeared, and threatened by experts. They'd have silenced these broadcasts a long time ago except for one thing. It's the Harveys' secret weapon. You see, I come from a prayin' family. So we've got Stalin outmaneuvered. And, counting all my wife's prayin' relatives, we've doggone near got him outnumbered, too.

Now once before in history a lone little individual named David was underestimated, because his enemies judged his strength by the caliber of his slingshot. And a chap named Goliath ended up with a hole in the head.

I have only one voice.

But I have a rock called the truth in my slingshot. So look out, here it comes.

I have heard, unofficially, that a grand jury has been summoned for tomorrow in Chicago to weigh the evidence regarding Paul Harvey's recent midnight visit to the supersecret Argonne National Laboratory near Lemont, Ill., on last February 7.

There has never been any mystery about the purpose of my mission. But a congressional committee hearing which my friends and I have repeatedly requested has been put off and put off week after week.

I want the facts known. I was willing to do this quietly. But I want the facts made known. I'm tired of sitting on one of the biggest stories of my life and getting smeared in the process, just to keep from revealing the negligence with which our security regulations are administered.

But I can tell you this much:

Whoever gets the facts is going to learn, not just from me, but from many—I said many—witnesses—I said witnesses—how absurdly lax is the administration of those vital regulations in the hands of civilian scientists.

They're going to learn—now sit down for this—they're going to learn that one man entered the highly secret tech area, an area where not even guards are permitted without special credentials, was inside buildings in that vital area, telephoned his identity to the central switchboard to establish his presence, then after an hour left undetected.

And believe me this is just the beginning. There are those persons just waiting for me publicly to reveal secrets so they could pin my ears back and draw attention away from their own red faces. I am well aware that there are those persons who would like to see a grand-jury indictment hung over my head, then postpone indefinitely bringing the matter to trial.

They figure they can intimidate and frighten away my sponsors and my friends.

Well, let's understand each other.

It just happens that I have some of the finest sponsors you'll ever come across.

And they figure if this country is already totalitarian, then we might as well find it out now.

But we don't think so.

And another thing, this happens to be the American Broadcasting Co., where a man is innocent of wrongdoing until you prove differently.

I am satisfied that no grand jury properly apprised of all the facts will even bring an indictment in this matter, because my purpose, established with authorities in advance, was to protect our security.

Congressmen and others were apprised months ago of my plan and purpose.

But I want a congressional hearing now.

And if there is no congressional committee hearing even on the basis of what I have to say tonight, then I'm going to place this entire file in the hands of the Americanism committee of the American Legion and somebody's going to get mad.

You fellows should have learned by now that the American people can do anything, if they get mad enough.

If nothing else ever proved that, Pearl Harbor did.

It is unfortunate that in 1951 we've become so accustomed to a namby-pamby approach to everything and everybody, including our worst enemies, that when somebody comes along with a healthy circulation folks think he has a fever. Well, I think being an American is worth working at.

I didn't initiate this investigation, but I helped carry the ball, and for now I can take care of the tacklers.

And another thing—the investigator of the Office of Naval Intelligence and the guard who participated in this demonstration—when this investigation is over I want you businessmen across America who have been telling me for years that we stand for the same kind of an America to stand up and be counted, and offer these men the really good jobs they deserve.

This is not intended as a carte blanche indictment of Chicago University. I have made cash gifts to that university's school of medicine. There are many fine individuals on its faculty. But this Argonne installation operated by Chicago University scientists already has been the subject of congressional investigation when priceless uranium was misplaced out there. But that investigation got no place. Now, I have conducted an investigation of this same Argonne installation to prove security is lax and I have proved it lax.

The results of my investigation were intended only for official ears. With patriotic Members of Congress aware of my purpose, my plan, and my objective.

But if the scientists who run this laboratory want to explain this laxity in enforcing security regulations, they are welcome to use this microphone at a mutually convenient date. Here, gentlemen, you can talk to the "grandest" jury in the world—the American people. Either what you're doing in that area is secret or it is not. If it is not, then let us quit wasting taxpayers' money even going through the motions of guarding it.

But you know better. So, for now, I respectfully recommend that a military guard be placed around Argonne until we are sure this situation has been remedied and this can't happen again. Next time your midnight visitor might not be a friend.

Yes, Americans, my motive was and is to protect our security. I did enter the Argonne Laboratory. A loyal employee of that installation has been suspended because he put patriotism above his job. An investigator of the Office of Naval Intelligence has been fired because somebody's sensitive jurisdictional toes have been stepped on. Well, I risked getting shot purposely to focus attention on our insecurity. And I want something done about it. As Merlin Griffith, business agent of the guard's union, said: "If Harvey and his friends had been saboteurs, there would be no Argonne Laboratory left. Harvey should get a medal for what he did."

I neither expect nor want that. But I do want somebody to quit whitewashing and I want a congressional committee to get to the bottom of this maladministration of security regulations before we lose what few atomic secrets we have left.

I have pleaded for and waited for an investigation, by Marquis of Queensberry rules. Now let's get out into the middle of the ring where everybody can see and slug this out.

The public may have had the impression that my mission was not successful. Well, now you know differently. Now you know that one of the men with me, one of three unarmed men, spent a midnight hour inside buildings, inside the top-secret tech area—he could have carried a bomb in or secret papers out, because he left as he entered undetected.

Now you know this.

Now I'd like to give the rest of the facts, and the facts will be startling.

I want a subcommittee of the joint Senate-House Atomic Energy Committee to come to Chicago.

I recommend this procedure rather than a Washington hearing, because at a recent meeting of the Argonne Guards Union every guard—now get this—every single guard present voted yes, he wants to testify before a congressional committee as to laxity of security at the project.

And let's stop trying to do it quietly. Let's just do it.

Bring the whole committee if you want. Bring the whole Congress if you like.

Because, I'll tell you something: It isn't going to make any difference how many troops we send to Europe or how much budget we vote or how many more men die in Korea if our big secrets continue to slip though our fingers or our big weapons go off in our own back yard.

Medicine in Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN O. PASTORE

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two more articles in the series entitled "Medicine in Crisis," by Mr. Selig Greenberg, writer for the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, published in the city of Providence, R. I.

While these articles do not conclude the series, I feel that these, coupled with those previously published in the RECORD, present the high lights of the survey made by Mr. Greenberg that will be helpful to the Members of the Senate in their consideration of S. 337, which bill provides an emergency program of grants and scholarships for education in the medical fields.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Providence Evening Bulletin of March 8, 1951]

MEDICINE IN CRISIS—PHILANTHROPISTS MADE POSSIBLE 1910–30 ADVANCES—GOLDEN AGE'S PASSING POSES PROBLEM OF FINANCING RESEARCH, EDUCATION

(This is the tenth of a series of articles on the problems of medical education within the context of the broader issues of medical care and practice.)

(By Selig Greenberg)

If you should mention the late John D. Rockefeller to an average group of Americans, what idea would the name evoke in their minds?

The chances are they would think of a wizened, crochety old gentleman giving away shiny new dimes to people. Probably not one of them would associate the name with the unparalleled achievements of medicine during the past few decades, with the conquest of many deadly diseases, with the remarkable application of hormones, vitamins and antibiotics to the control and treatment of illness.

And yet, many of these dramatic advances would not have been scored if it had not been for the generosity of Rockefeller and, to a lesser extent, other philanthropists. If it were not for the vision of these men of great wealth, American medical education—with all that it involves in top-notch research and practice—would not be what it is today.

UNPRECEDENTED PHILANTHROPY

A combination of unprecedented philanthropy and fundamental discoveries in the medical sciences, of money and ideas, between 1910 and 1930 gave American medicine what might be called its golden age. We are still reaping the harvest of the seeds planted during those years.

That era is now over, and its passing confronts us with a problem of the first magnitude, namely: How are we going to pay for the kind of first-rate medical education and research without which it is impossible to have high-quality medical care?

In 1910 the education of doctors was a largely self-supporting enterprise. Tuition collected from students was the main source of support of medical schools, investment in faculty and plant was small and teaching standards were low.

Then came the study of medical education by Abraham Flexner which exposed the inadequacy of most schools. Out of it emerged new patterns of medical training and of its financing through large philanthropic foundations. The succeeding 20 years constituted, as one authority has described it, "a unique and sheltered period, a kind of hiatus during which dependence upon the community dollar was reduced to practically zero."

It was lucky that realization of the need for a new level of medicine came at a time when holders of great wealth began to become conscious of their responsibility toward society. These men sought competent guidance in their philanthropy which made for selective giving.

Between 1910 and 1930, about $200,000,000—which is the equivalent of half a billion in terms of today's purchasing power—was poured into the Nation's medical schools by philanthropic foundations in endowment and gifts for construction and maintenance of plant.

USUALLY OVERSUBSCRIBED

Eighty million dollars of this was Rockefeller money. This money was given on a matching basis. The only string attached to it was that at least an equivalent amount be raised from other donors. The resulting drives for funds were usually oversubscribed. Johns Hopkins, for instance, got $8,000,000 from the Rockefeller Foundation and raised $12,000,000 more.

Much of the money was given to the better schools to develop them as pace setters. This gave tremendous impetus to medical research and education. Medicine is now taught in an entirely different way than it was before John D. Rockefeller had his vision. If your sick child recovers quickly because of a dose of aureomycin, if you can be fairly sure of excellent medical care when you call a doctor, it is because Rockefeller and a few other men paid a large part of the bill.

But now we have to start thinking about paying much of the bill ourselves.

The age of fabulous wealth is over. High income, inheritance, and corporation taxes arising out of a changed economic and social philosophy now preclude the accumulation of individual wealth on a large scale. The medical schools can no longer expect many large gifts and additions to their endowment. The philanthropic foundations remain an important source of support. But they are no longer contributing toward endowment and are confining themselves instead to the financing of specialized research and of experimental teaching projects.

This development has reached its peak at a time of inflation and increasing medical school costs resulting from ever-expanding functions. It has come just when the lower interest rate on invested funds has reduced income from endowment. It has coincided with increasing obsolescence of plant and equipment.

NO SUCH GIFTS IN SIGHT

According to an exhaustive study of medical finances whose findings were reported yesterday, the schools need an additional $40,000,000 a year in operating funds and a great deal more if they increase enrollment. Forty million dollars is the annual return on an endowment of a billion dollars at an optimistic interest rate of 4 percent. There are no such private gifts in sight.

This leads to the conclusion, in the opinion of experts, that we will have to turn to the tax dollar for a large part of the bill.

What concerns many authorities are not so much the political implications of such a step as these questions:

Are the American people prepared to pay the cost of educating doctors and supporting research of the caliber which philanthropy has shown to be possible? Is it possible to finance top-flight medical education and research on a broad base requiring popular consent? Or will the transition from private to public support lead to a lowering of standards?

What many of us have failed to realize is that neither the doctors themselves nor the patients have paid the full cost of medical training. For years this function was subsidized by the largesse of multimillionaires. But now Santa Claus is gone.

American society faces a fateful decision at a time when new horizons are beckoning in medical science. We are on the threshold of great new discoveries. Major advances in chemistry, physics, biology and psychology remain to be translated into terms of medical progress. Heart disease, cancer, polio and other enemies of mankind are still to be conquered. Preventive medicine is in process of changing the whole concept of health care. Are we to go forward or backward? We will be answerable for our decision to our children and grandchildren.

MEDICINE IN CRISIS—UNITED STATES MEDICAL SCHOOLS LOOK TO TWO SOURCES FOR HELP—HOPE CONGRESS WILL ENACT SUBSIDY LEGISLATION DESPITE AMA OPPOSITION; EXPECT TO PRESS CAMPAIGN FOR CORPORATION GIFTS ALREADY UNDER WAY

(This is the eleventh of a series of articles on the problems of medical education within the context of the broader issues of medical care and practice.)

(By Selig Greenberg)

The Nation's hard-pressed medical schools are looking forward to possible financial relief from two sources.

First of all, they hope Congress will enact subsidy legislation this year, despite the opposition of the American Medical Association.

Secondly, they expect the wraps may soon be taken off a campaign for corporation gifts for medical education which has been quietly under way for nearly 2 years. This drive, sparked by President James B. Conant, of Harvard, and headed by former President Herbert Hoover as honorary chairman, aims to raise a minimum of $5,000,000 annually.

Top medical educators are aware of the danger of becoming overdependent on Government funds and are eager to develop untapped private sources of support. But they have reached the conclusion that philanthropy alone cannot do the job.

FIRST FORMAL SPLIT

This conclusion has led the Association of American Medical Colleges to its first formal split with the AMA, whose opposition killed the Federal aid bill last year. The measure was reintroduced early this year, and medical school deans are working vigorously for its passage.

The new bill, which recently won unanimous approval of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, calls for a 5-year aid program for medical, dental, and nursing schools at an annual cost of $50,000,000. Of this, $40,000,000 would be spent to help the schools maintain their present enrollment and admit additional students and $10,000,000 would go to toward the cost of construction and equipment.

The medical schools would get a subsidy of $500 a year for each student they now have and of $1,000 for every new student. Scholarships for needy students also would be provided.

ORIGINAL BILL IN 1949

The original bill was introduced in the Senate in 1949 under bipartisan auspices. Its early draft set a ceiling of 50 percent on the proportion of the budget of any school that might be met by Federal grants. AMA representatives held out for a ceiling of 30 percent, and the figure was finally reduced to 40 percent. Other changes also were made in the measure at AMA insistence before the Senate passed it by a unanimous vote.

When the legislation went to the House, its passage was generally considered assured. In December 1949, the AMA house of delegates approved a report by its council on medical education and hospitals which said that while the council was "not entirely satisfied" with the bill, it contained "safeguards that should protect the medical schools from unwarranted interference in their affairs by the Federal Government."

But several months later the AMA suddenly changed its tune and announced its opposition to the measure. Proponents of the legislation compromised further and gave in on the AMA's demand for a 30-percent ceiling. But this failed to mollify the AMA. As a result of its lobbying, the bill was finally tabled by a House committee by a one-vote margin and never reached the floor of the House.

SUMS UP OPPOSITION

Dr. Donald G. Anderson, secretary of the AMA Council on Medical Education, sums up AMA opposition to Federal subsidies as follows: "We do not believe the possibilities of securing adequate support from voluntary sources have been thoroughly explored. Nor are we convinced that any of the legislation so far proposed insures the freedom and independence of the schools."

Among those who strongly dispute this assertion are Dr. Alan Gregg, director of the medical sciences division of the Rockefeller Foundation, and Dr. George Packer Berry, dean of Harvard Medical School and president-elect of the Association of American Medical Colleges.

Dr. Gregg told this reporter that he could see no alternative to large-scale Federal aid. "The medical schools," he said, "are on the danger list and in desperate need of a transfusion, much of which can come only from public funds."

"We now spend more than a million dollars a year in Federal funds at Harvard Medical School," said Dr. Berry, "and it has come to us without any strings attached or any effort to control us. I see no ground for apprehension if the schools maintain a proper balance between their own funds and Federal grants."

DISPUTE IS ACADEMIC

Dr. Dean F. Smiley, secretary of the Association of Medical Colleges, commented that "this whole subsidy dispute is academic, as the medical schools already are getting millions of dollars a year in Federal grants for research and teaching in certain specialized subjects which have been neglected."

Qualified observers believe that, aside from its distaste for too much competition, the AMA dreads Federal subsidies because they would establish the principle of Government responsibility in medicine and might be a stepping stone to compulsory health insurance. These observers nevertheless feel that the AMA, in view of the threatened serious shortage of doctors as a result of the national emergency, may reverse itself again and abandon its opposition.

The AMA voted last December to contribute $500,000 to help bail out the medical schools and is now urging its members to donate $100 annually for this purpose. In view of the fact that the schools have a deficit of $10,000,000 a year and would need millions more to expand, this action was described by the dean of one leading medical college as "a fancy but futile and utterly inadequate gesture."

BANKER IS DIRECTOR

Leaders of the drive for corporate gifts for medical education have withheld public announcement of the campaign because they want to satisfy themselves first that substantial amounts can be raised. It is reliably reported that many of the country's biggest corporations already have pledged sizable contributions. The list of sponsors of the appeal is studded with some of the top names in American industry and finance and also includes the presidents of the A. F. of L. and CIO.

The campaign is under the active direction of S. Sloan Colt, president of the Bankers Trust Co. of New York. Among the men on its board of trustees are Owen J. Roberts, Robert P. Patterson, Winthrop W. Aldrich, Albert P. Sloan, Jr., Ernest T. Weir, Thomas J. Watson, and Winthrop Rockefeller. Its prospectus, which has been sent to leading corporations throughout the country concedes the need for Federal aid and asks for private gifts to create "a balance between two great sources of support."

Pointers on Point 4

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask that an editorial entitled "Pointers on Point 4," published in the Washington Post of March 13, 1951, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD. This is a discussion of the point 4 program as presently developed, and with emphasis upon the Rockefeller report, recognizing and pointing out the need for greater expansion of our economic assistance to underdeveloped and underprivileged areas.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POINTERS ON POINT 4

Since the President launched his concept of point 4, the times have changed and the free world is now engrossed in an emergency calling for speedy and ramified rearmament. This of necessity governs the average man's approach to point 4. The Rockefeller report, recognizing the intervening event, would enlarge, not contract the over-all program so as to handle certain defense requirements. The defense needs scheduled to be so absorbed are highly significant. One is the encouragement of raw material exploitation for the service of our defense effort, another is the kind of preclusive buying that was done in the last war by the Board of Economic Warfare.

Some doubts will arise over this organizational plan that the Rockefeller board suggests under the aegis of an Overseas Economic Administration. We don't see how defense development could be dovetailed into the comprehensive job which the Rockefeller committee has outlined. There are several reasons for keeping apart defense and nondefense operations; for instance, the idea of point 4 might get adulterated in foreign particularly nonwestern, minds if they were lumped together. Surely defense enterprises should fall within the domain of the ECA and the military working together.

The idea of an over-all agency may have some merit in respect of nondefense work. Those who have watched with respect the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, for instance, will doubtless put up a case for separate existence. However, the central agency would have a sort of federation-like framework, providing for regional work and making provision for autonomy of the institute. Indeed, the set-up of the institute would be copied elsewhere. Another problem in respect of organization: Authority in foreign parts would doubtless come from centralization, but it would be at the expense of the good name that has been won by ECA.

On our part we would like to see criteria set up ahead of organization. With criteria fully accepted by Congress and Executive, the organization problem could easily be solved. Yet there is little attention to criteria in the Rockefeller report beyond the twin need of combating subversion and doing away with hunger, poverty, disease, and illiteracy. This is a millennial task, not a criterion.

First among the criteria in lifting the lot of "the 1,075,000,000 inhabitants of the so-called underdeveloped areas" should be that any specific project must be viewed in the light of what it will do to relieve population pressure. Puerto Rico is a hideous example of what "meddling with death" has done to make the inhabitants more rather than less miserable. Many of the areas put within the orbit of point 4 operations have a similar population problem. All Asia, except the Philippines, is, indeed, pullulating with breeding, and our occupation policy in Japan has accentuated the population problem in respect of Japan. Health experts have been welcome in Japan, but Mrs. Sanger, though free to visit in pre-MacArthur days, is barred. It would be the height of folly to make Asia a gigantic Puerto Rico.

On this point the emphasis on the eradication of human disease has other limits. An example will suffice. India is said to have the highest incidence of tuberculosis, but if you go to India and set up an anti-tuberculosis station in, say, Travancore, the station would be relatively worthless. For there are not the doctors in Travancore to man it.

Perhaps the second criterion may involve something of the chicken and the egg attitude. But projects of the nature outlined in this report require as a sine qua non to be politically integrated in the recipient country. It is simply making matters worse to saddle a country still in the dirt-road stage of development with the industrial equipment of modern America. All nations, to be sure, want that equipment; no country any longer thinks of itself as fit to hold its head up unless it has a steel mill. Is this, however, the way to build up a spirit of interdependence? Another consideration is the need for awareness that the burden of repayment is not crushing, as in the case of development works in being in Afghanistan and in the case of those in prospect in Iran.

Nor is there any point in making a showcase out of part of a country which is torn in civil strife. There are those, for instance, who think that the North Koreans were encouraged to fall on South Korea by the spectacle of economic improvement that the United States had introduced. By political integration, too, we mean receptive administration. In India a deadweight of superstition is basically responsible for the food deficit, and, till this is relieved, no effort of the outside world can solve the Indian problem. Elsewhere it is imprudent to put up works in a country where the administrators have been habituated to pocket the petty cash.

The attitude of mind of the affected country is all-important in this great economic offensive. It will make the difference between success or failure—whether or not a venture will be "operation rathole" to the American taxpayer and the people aimed at. To put a premium on peculation, on reliance, on making the rich richer and the poor poorer, on economic top-heaviness, or on political strife is no business to indulge in. To be sure, the Rockefeller board recognizes this, but we should like to see some insurance by way of criteria.

Now a fine and noble idea is enshrined in point 4. It is the idea of spreading our know-how, and tendering our show-how, to other countries that want it. This country has grown rich in part upon the plants and other things that our agricultural and commercial explorers, beginning with Jefferson and his rice, have brought back to America. A reciprocal service is due now that we have grown into a great world creditor. There are a hundred ways in which our technology can benefit the world, including ourselves. Much of it lies in the files of the Department of Agriculture. The world should be encouraged to come and get it; a roster of experts should be compiled whose services the underdeveloped countries could draw upon. The central idea should be to enable underdeveloped countries to do better what they already do, and to shake themselves out of the toils of the planter economy associated with colonial development.

Enough has been done already in this respect to be impressive. We have seen what ECA has accomplished in Greece, as, for instance, in converting swamps into rice paddies, in preventing spoilage of olive oil. Technical assistance this is called, and it is technical assistance that lay at the root of the President's bold new program. It is untrue to suggest, as could be deduced from the Rockefeller report, that you need roads and medical service to install badly needed tube wells in India.

On top of defense work and point 4, the report, which almost defies absorption in a single gulp, recommends that the Overseas Economic Administration should be empowered to encourage public works and private enterprise. Here a link with the World Bank is proposed. For public works an International Development Authority would be established in a management contractual relation with the World Bank. A finance corporation is also provided for, also relation to the World Bank, and tax and other incentives to American investors are mentioned as part of this scheme to use American dollars for development. It is to be hoped that Congress will not be affrighted by this ambitious report, but will set to work and hammer out criteria and the machinery for the realization of the idea back of it.

Who, Other Than General MacArthur, Is Capable of Giving Us a Complete and Authentic Story on Asia Equal in Fullness and Authenticity With the European Story of General Eisenhower?

REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, months ago I called to the attention of Congress and the American people the necessity of Gen. Douglas MacArthur returning immediately to the United States for the purpose of reporting to the Congress and the American people of our true situation in Asia. But no action has been taken in recalling the general.

In the meantime, what has happened? General MacArthur in a recent interview with American newspapermen flatly stated that in his opinion we are destined to be tied down indefinitely to a stalemate in Korea, while we continue to spend men, money, and munitions against puppet troops of the Kremlin thrown at us by Mao Tse-tung, Chinese Red leader. General MacArthur issued this warning when he said:

> This situation can wear us down and weaken us by costing Communist Russia very little.

The general pleaded in his interview for the right to fight a winning war, which is denied him by a United Nations debating society in which so-called allies who place their Asiatic trade interests above the fight against communism, outvote us, road-block us, and circumvent our diplomats.

We all know that during the next few weeks this Congress will be asked to implement national defense spending to the extent of $40,000,000,000 or more, and some say this is just the beginning. This is a huge sum of money which must come from the hard-pressed taxpayers of America. To continue to spend this money with the knowledge that we face an indefinite military stalemate in Korea would certainly indicate the imperative need of appraising the military situation in the Far East, in the same manner that we surveyed the military situation in Europe through the eyes of Gen. Dwight Eisenhower.

We are told that the military needs of Europe will require many American divisions, and billions of American dollars will be necessary to provide arms for the defense that Europe finally decides to establish for herself.

At the same time we read repeatedly of British, French, and other North Atlantic Pact nations letting steel, jet engines, rubber, and other vital war materials and fabricated products go behind the iron curtain.

While all this goes on in Europe, the major military strength of the United States is now tied down in Korean areas on what the President calls a police action, but which General MacArthur tells us is rapidly developing into a military stalemate which has to date cost us more than 52,000 casualties and a merely estimated cost in money and military supplies.

In other words, we are so far committed in Korea that we cannot withdraw and at the same time maintain our prestige in the Orient.

General MacArthur in his interview with representatives of the American press stated flatly that our forces cannot win a decisive victory in Korea unless they are permitted to fight an all-out war north of the Yalu River or wherever military necessity demands. At the moment General MacArthur and our forces have been refused that right and are literally fighting the Korean war with one hand tied behind their backs.

Why should not Congress and the American people be given the story of the Asiatic situation from the lips of General MacArthur just as the administration with a lot of fanfare gave us the European story through General Eisenhower.

Who, I ask, other than General MacArthur, is capable of giving us a complete and authentic story on Asia, equal in fullness and authenticity with the European story by General Eisenhower.

If General MacArthur could leave Tokyo to confer mysteriously with President Truman at Wake Island, why is he denied the opportunity to come to Washington temporarily for the purpose of telling the Congress and the American people what they are entitled to know.

How can the Congress intelligently appropriate tax-raised dollars to finance military strength or discuss the allocation of American military power without knowing the truth about what is needed in Asia as well as in Europe?

In all fairness, I ask, why does General MacArthur get only lip service from the White House whether it be in Washington or Key West, instead of the military divisions and solid effort by United States representatives in the United Nations to untie the General's hands and let him fight?

In my opinion, the administration is afraid to let General MacArthur come back because he would tell Congress under questioning what the American people want to know and what they are entitled to know.

Yes; if General MacArthur were to come back to the United States and tell Congress and the American people the true story on Asia, he would neutralize the Truman administration's concept that world war III can only be won in Europe even though it is the belief of many top-ranking military men that Russia will never attack in Europe until Asia is secure. What concept is right?

There is no doubt from General MacArthur's statement that we are being blocked and bled white in Korea.

Therefore, let General MacArthur come back here and give us a first-hand report of what our job is in Asia and what it is going to cost us in manpower and money to break this military stalemate and win a decisive victory.

Where Are Our Ships?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RUSSELL B. LONG
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, March 20 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the March 1951 issue of the American magazine, written by Mr. Theodore Brent, president of the Delta Line. Mr. Brent has very ably reviewed the status of our merchant marine and has called attention to the necessity of Congress taking immediate action to put it in shape for service in the event of a national emergency.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHERE ARE OUR SHIPS?

(By Theodore Brent, president, the Delta Line)

In recent months we Americans have watched the threat of another war grow daily more ominous. At this writing the world seems about to fall around our shoulders. Our taxes have been increased. Our credit has been curbed. Our use of certain materials has been limited. Grudgingly, but necessarily approvingly, we have watched Congress appropriate billion after billion for a war which may never come but which might strike us tomorrow.

Our billions—all from our new taxes—are going into the training of armies, the building of planes, the buying of guns, the manufacture of bombs and bullets and supplies. Belatedly, but at last, we are trying hard to catch up.

But ever since we began this new build-up one unanswered question has been nagging me: If we get our men and our planes, our guns and bombs and supplies in time, how are we going to transport them over the thousands of miles of seas to wherever our next theater of war may be?

The only answer I can come up with is this: We aren't. The Navy hasn't enough ships of the type necessary to do it. Certainly our woefully inadequate merchant marine can't do the job, although in every war in our history we have depended on our civilian ships to do it. But our Government is doing next to nothing about rebuilding our merchant marine as an essential arm of national defense. It is passing the buck and ducking its responsibilities.

Even if war were not a threat, this bumbling, unbusinesslike attitude on the part of the biggest business in the world may lead us to further tragedy, one which could tumble us from our present eminence as a world economic power, and consequently affect millions of us individually through a decrease in employment, a lowering of wages, a necessary cut-back in production because of our inability to market our surplus products at prices guaranteeing reasonable profits to those who operate under our free-enterprise economy.

America's shipping industry today is inadequate—in contrast with that of several foreign nations—for five reasons: (1) The majority of the merchant vessels operating under the American flag are too slow to outrun submarines of our potential enemies in time of war; (2) the number of ships which can compete with foreign vessels and which can serve efficiently as troop and supply transports in time of war is too small; (3) at least one-third of the life of our good merchant ships is already spent and before long they will become obsolete together; (4) the huge fleet of World War II cargo vessels now in mothballs comprises ships uneconomical to operate and therefore virtually worthless to commercial shipping companies in peacetime; and (5) any suggestion of development or expansion with the assistance of Government funds—in the manner of virtually every other nation in the world—is pooh-poohed by Government authorities as "unrealistic and unnecessary."

Twice within the past 33 years we have plunged into war without sufficient ships to transport our men and arms and supplies to the areas where they were needed. Frantically we built huge fleets of uneconomical emergency-type ships. In World War I, few, if any, were completed before the Armistice. In World War II, hundreds of them were used, but few of them were worth more than their sale price in scrap when the war was over.

Today we are following the pattern drawn after World War I. Then we depended for years solely on our war-built ships to service our merchant marine. Few new ships were constructed. Consequently, when all of them began to fall apart at once—in the early 1930's—we were caught without sufficient ships to carry our exportable goods. We're approaching again that same situation.

Every attempt to improve this situation by shipping operators has been stymied by a vacillating foreign policy, by congressional confusion, by complacency and ineptness in Federal bureaus and departments, by a lack of understanding of maritime problems, and by the lack of a well-founded and publicly stated maritime policy that would help us drag ourselves out of the minor role in foreign trade into which we may soon sink.

There are two reasons why we must have a powerful merchant marine: national defense and internal economy. The need of a fleet of transports capable of carrying our armies and their weapons and supplies is obvious. Without such ships we might just as well sit back and wait for some other power to attack us. But the effect of an inadequate merchant marine on you and me individually is a much more obscure, complex problem.

America is a power in any association or agreement of nations into which it enters, primarily because of the abundance of everything that it possesses—our abundance of manpower, of materials, of skills. America bears the greater load of the Korean War and of the occupation of Japan and Germany because we have an abundance of money, men, and machines. America's voice is powerful and respected in all international conferences on any subject or situation because of the abundance with which we can back up our diplomats. In the eyes of other nations America is affluent, fertile, generous, but—vulnerable.

Many of us, I think, don't realize that America's export and import industry is dependent not only on America's abundance, but on the respect which other countries accord us in certain international shipping conferences which set the rates for the haulage of every type of commodity from one area of the world to another. Every country engaged in carrying certain goods has a voice in the rates, but, naturally, those nations which haul the most carry the heaviest voice when it comes to a vote. If you want a voice you have to carry the goods. You can't carry the goods without ships.

If our merchant marine is permitted to deteriorate—as it seems to be now—our stake in all these conferences will be thrown overboard automatically, as it was during the First World War, when our foreign competitors increased rates on our exports as much as 1,000 percent, and those nations which can continue to operate vessels in strength will once more gain control of the shipping rates. Their votes will strike first and foremost at shipping rates on commodities exported from America, in which they are in competition with American lines and American products.

If Great Britain, for example, can sell her automobiles in South America at a price greatly under that of American machines, she has a good chance of cornering the market. If Great Britain—through superiority in ships—can control the rates on the shipping of American-made cars to South America she can increase those rates to the point where an American manufacturer will be unable to make a profit on a sale. British-made cars—shipped cheaply—could be sold at a profit for prices less than ours.

Production at Detroit factories, let us say, would have to be cut, because the market for American-made cars would be sharply reduced. The British could refuse to carry American-made cars even at prohibitive rates and could take only their own makes into South America. Employment in Detroit—in a dozen other cities which supply that city with parts and assemblies—would be cut. Wages, too, would drop. A man in Indiana who runs a lathe that makes a part that is used in a certain sedan could be laid off because there would not be enough demand for that part.

It's complicated. But it's logical. A dwindling, inadequate merchant marine could hurt us individually and on a national scale as much as a strike in major industry affects a single city.

As an example of Government interference in industry's attempt to rebuild an adequate merchant fleet let me tell you about a ship which the company that I represent—the Delta Line—wanted to build in 1947. Delta operates cruise-cargo ships between New Orleans and South American east coast ports, runs on routes which the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 designated as "essential" and, therefore, to be served at regular intervals in the best interests of the United States.

Our ship, as we planned her, would carry plenty of cargo along with about 250 passengers and would make 16 or 17 knots. We asked the Federal Maritime Commission for approval of the plans—necessary because she would be built and operated under Government subsidy. The Commission approved these plans. In fact, we were ordered by contract to build the ship because she would provide an essential service as determined by law.

Then the Navy stepped in. Twenty knots, said the Navy. Two feet wider to improve damage stability. Two more bulkheads. Increased size of auxiliary machinery. With these and a few other alterations the Navy could convert our ship into a fast attack-transport capable of carrying 4,000 troops, their munitions and supplies, anywhere in the world, and sustain them for 30 days. The Navy was looking ahead.

We didn't object. In fact, the whole idea was great. The new ship would fill a gap in our service and provide a superb weapon of offense and supply if the threat of war should materialize.

We went ahead and spent $250,000 for plans, secured construction bids, quietly cheered when Congress appropriated $16,000,000 for her. It looked as if the American merchant marine might finally come back into its own, that we would play an active part in the renaissance.

The keel of our ship has never been laid. She is still only a dream. The $16,000,000 has been allowed to lapse, and there is little prospect that we or the Navy will soon get the ship which could mean so much to our national economy and to our national defense in these critical days.

The fact that this ship isn't available today can largely be attributed to the General Accounting Office and its penchant for assuming the right to make policy decisions. While we were going through the always prolonged preliminary throes of trying to start building our ship, the GAO questioned the amount of construction subsidy authorized for two other ships already being built by another line. GAO demanded an investigation. GAO got it, both of subsidies and of the Maritime Commission. The almost immediate result was the complete cessation of new construction of any ships under Federal subsidy, including ours.

These subsidies, controversial and misunderstood as most subsidies are, are necessary to the life of our merchant marine.

Only once, in time of peace, has any attempt been made to assure the American people that they would be served by an adequate merchant marine on a par with the needs of the Nation. That was following 1936, when the Merchant Marine Act was passed.

Two of its important provisions involved subsidies—one for construction, one for the operation, of ships. It was logical and, as I see it, necessary. For many, many years it has been possible to build a ship in Europe, for example, much more cheaply than in the United States, due primarily to lower labor costs. Under the 1936 act the Federal Government would pay the shipyard the difference between the cost of construction of a similar vessel in a foreign yard and the actual cost in an American yard. The buyer of the ship received none of the subsidy, simply contracted to buy the ship at the price based on foreign costs and operate it on an essential line for at least 20 years under the American flag. At the end of that time he would have repaid his mortgage to the Government.

American seamen live in the finest crew's quarters afloat. They are fed the best food. They are the best paid. In contrast, those of other countries are little better off than their predecessors of a half-century ago. So the 1936 act also provided that an operating subsidy be paid to ship operators who would run their ships on government-declared essential routes on predetermined schedules. The subsidy would amount to the difference between American and foreign costs in wages, subsistence, cost of stores, equipment, insurance, and repairs not compensated for by insurance.

No profit was guaranteed the operating line. In fact, any amount earned annually by the line over 10 percent was placed in a fund which, at the end of 10 years, was divided equally between the Government and the company, with the object of repaying, so far as possible, the subsidy to the Government. During the first 10 years, after 1936, of the operation of these essential routes, over 75 percent of the entire operating subsidy was paid back to the Government. Not a penny of the millions of dollars paid out annually in agriculture and other production subsidies is ever returned to the Government.

Another shipping line just recently rebid to charter three Government-owned vessels which it has been operating on a specific run. In accepting, the Maritime Commission said, "Fine, that's acceptable. But if you operate those three ships you must build two more 23-knot cargo-liners carrying 700 passengers each for the same route. Otherwise, no deal."

These new ships will have to receive both kinds of subsidy—construction and operation. But, in the present state of confusion, it is unlikely that any subsidy will be approved for some time.

The current mess, started by the General Accounting Office, was accentuated when Congress, at the urging of the administration and a report by the Hoover Commission, abolished last year the Maritime Commission, which had operated since 1936 and was under congressional rather than administration control, and replaced it with a three-man Federal Maritime Board reporting to the Secretary of Commerce. A 90-day temporary board was appointed. The appointees, not knowing if they would remain as such, did nothing. After their tenure, a new board of able men was gradually named. So far it has done nothing but batter its head against varied opposition from every other Federal department concerned.

As this article is concluded, the new Congress has made a beginning by reintroducing the enabling bills for the long-range program and has authorized a start on the construction of part of the proposed defense cargo-ship program.

Boiled down, the situation amounts to this: Every attempt since World War II by the shipping operators to expand, replace, or improve their fleets through new construction has been stymied by a vacillating foreign policy and by a lack of respect for the law which in 1936 authorized a shipbuilding and operating subsidy program, and by the lack of a well-founded and publicly stated maritime policy.

This, despite a law passed 15 years ago which definitely states:

"It is necessary for the national defense and development of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine (a) sufficient to carry its domestic water-borne commerce and a substantial portion of the water-borne export and import foreign commerce of the United States and to provide shipping service on all routes essential for maintaining the flow of such domestic and foreign water-borne commerce at all times, (b) capable of serving as a naval and military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, (c) owned and operated under the United States flag by citizens of the United States insofar as may be practicable, and (d) composed of the best-equipped, safest, and most suitable types of vessels, constructed in the United States and manned with a trained and efficient citizen personnel. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to foster the development and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine."

That's the law. But our operating merchant marine is no more capable of handling the requirements of a major war than it was in 1917 or 1941. At the time of Pearl Harbor we had little more than 1,100 cargo, tanker, and passenger vessels. Today we have about 1,150—plus 150 or so uneconomical Victory ships which were hauled out of mothballs for the Korean action. With few exceptions they are incapable of outrunning the fast submarines reportedly being built today by our potential enemies. (A recent survey estimated Russia's undersea fleet will number more than 1,000 by the end of 1951.)

I maintain that this course—our present governmental attitude toward our merchant marine—can lead only to disaster. If we are to consider the great number of vessels which we have tied up in mothballs, plus 80 Liberty ships which we loaned to Russia, we possess numerically the greatest merchant fleet in the world. But in actual fact the United States operates only 8 percent of the 13,000 merchant vessels in the world. England has in operation many more than double what we have. Norway, Sweden, France, the Netherlands, Russia, and Panama all operate fleets which may soon outstrip us in size and regularity of service and which eventually can take from us the relatively small percentage of our own export and import business which we now handle.

Since World War II the United States Government has sold 1,113 ships to foreign nations. Only 700 have been sold to companies operating under the American flag. Yet we spent something like $15,000,000,000 to build all our wartime merchant fleet and we have received or been promised less than $3,000,000,000 in return.

Most of our wartime merchant fleet of vessels probably will remain tied up, beam-to-beam—more than 2,000 ships—in the rivers and harbors of New York, Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, Texas, California, Oregon, and Washington. There they have been coated with preservatives, are inspected frequently by maintenance crews, and are running up an annual bill of $8,000,000 to no purpose. Most of these vessels are slow, uneconomical Liberty ships built in the rush and confusion of the last war, ships that could more profitably be sold for scrap than stored as costly reminders of our last unreadiness. Yet this is the fleet on which we must depend in war.

Unless we begin immediately to build up our merchant fleet, by the end of the present decade all of our ships will be approaching obsolescence. They will be too slow to compete with foreign vessels. They will need increasingly more costly repairs. They will be impossible to operate at a reasonable profit. Then we shall be forced to turn over the transportation of our exports and imports to foreign ships.

Today the United States has the greatest export-import business in the world. We export huge quantities of raw materials and manufactured goods resulting from the excellence of our industrial system. Fifteen to 25 percent of all goods manufactured in the United States are exported.

Several ship operators, including my own company, would like to keep this business and, consequently, our merchant marine alive by acquiring many new ships for use on essential routes as the nucleus of a fast, efficient transport fleet in time of war. But, as I have already outlined, we are being thwarted by the fumbling of our Federal Government.

If it were within my power to implement a workable program for the reestablishment of our merchant marine as a world power essential to both our national defense and our national economy I would recommend the following steps:

The executive branch of the Government—preferably through the President—should definitely state that we need a strong merchant fleet capable of fulfilling our needs in peace and war as contemplated by the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, and that its construction and operation should be subsidized with Federal funds where necessary.

We should embark on a 10-year construction program of defense cargo ships costing approximately $8,000,000 each. At least 50 of these vessels should be started each year under a Government subsidy program. This program would cost approximately $400,000,000 a year—a mere nothing compared with our other defense expenditures—and from past experience there is an almost certain guaranty that half of that amount—$200,000,000 annually—will be returned by the operators through purchase.

We should immediately start the construction of at least 15 cargo-passenger ships which would incorporate features recommended by the Navy for their conversion into attack transports. At present, when a shipping line takes over a vessel built under Federal subsidy the 20-year mortgage applies to every ship owned by the company. In the case of passenger-transport ships—because of their high cost—the mortgage should apply only to that individual ship, so that if the operator lost money on it, he could return it to the Government with the loss of only his 25 percent down payment, plus any interim payments he had made, and the Government would get back a virtually new and valuable ship.

An American, whether he operates under a Government subsidy or not, should be permitted to build a Government-approved ship with a construction subsidy, provided he agrees to operate it under the American flag for 20 years. At present, only those lines which contract to serve essential routes are permitted construction subsidies.

Today any vessel must be operated by the shipping company for a minimum of 17 years before it can be turned in on a new subsidized ship. To reduce the danger of multiple obsolescence of many ships at once, the period should be reduced to 12 years.

The Maritime Board, at an appropriate time, should be returned to its status as a separate agency operating under the Congress from the Department of Commerce. Thus it would be less subject to political and department interference at or below Cabinet levels.

Once before—from 1932 to 1936—American martime authority was vested in a board under the Commerce Department. It failed, hampered and harassed by politics and external argument. Little or nothing was done to improve the merchant marine.

We should scrap the Liberty-ship fleet tied up in our rivers and use the money from the sale of the steel as the partial basis of a new ship-construction program.

We should urge our Senators and Representatives to a greater understanding of the vital import of a strong merchant marine, and should demand from Congress a constructive program if the executive branch of the Government continues it uninterested policy.

We should reestablish, without delay, a program of fair and adequate construction and operating subsidies, so that we may compete on an equal footing with foreign shipyards and foreign operators.

We should, in other words, build up a merchant marine that will serve us as effectively as is necessary to our continuing advancement as the greatest and strongest Nation truly representative of democracy on the face of the earth.

Address of Hon. Sean MacBride

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. FOGARTY. In the midst of world-wide worry and tension, Mr. Speaker, many of us were privileged yesterday to enjoy a genuinely thrilling few hours. The foreign minister of a sovereign nation of Europe discussed the state of the nation he represents—both on domestic matters and international relations. Later in the afternoon he presented to the Library of Congress a reproduction of the world's most beautiful manuscript, the Book of Kells.

This manuscript is to go on display today. I hope all my colleagues will take advantage of the opportunity to examine it. When they do I hope they will have in mind the fact that the proud little Republic of Ireland took occasion to present this great work, which is the story of the life and death of Christ as told in the four gospels, at an hour in the world's history when all men need the inspiration—the renewed faith and confidence—which can come only from Divine Providence. We can be proud of this wonderful gesture of friendship. The world will have wiped out the cause of 95 percent of its woes when all nations can enjoy the kind of foreign relations which were exemplified here yesterday.

I include in the RECORD the address of Hon. Sean MacBride, Minister of External Affairs of the Republic of Ireland, delivered at the National Press Club luncheon, and his remarks at the Library of Congress when he presented the reproduction of the Book of Kells.

I include, also, the Washington Post account of the Irish Foreign Minister's address.

ADDRESS BY SEAN MACBRIDE, MINISTER OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OF THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND, AT THE NATIONAL PRESS CLUB LUNCHEON, WASHINGTON, D. C., MARCH 14, 1951

The honor you have done me in asking me to be your guest here is one which gives me a very special pleasure. I have been a newspaperman myself and I have come here today simply as a colleague who happens to be Foreign Minister of a small nation which has very strong and ancient ties with America, to tell you something of how that nation stands today.

I am told that Irish names are not unknown in American journalism and, if so, there must be among you many whose parents and grandparents came from Ireland. The land they left was vastly different from the Ireland we know today. The Ireland of the last century was, in the material sense, one of the poorest countries in Western Europe. Her population was in process of being halved by the results of a famine on a scale that had been unknown to Western Europe since the Middle Ages. Today, Ireland is on the road to economic progress and development. Our wealth is reasonably well divided: we have no very great extremes of rich and poor. The rural slums, the ramshackle cabins, are nearly a thing of the past, and although there are slums still in certain of our cities, we shall, unless a general war or acute shortages wreck our plans with those of the rest of the world, get rid of these within about 10 years. Our population, which had been falling steadily, although at a decreasing rate, since the famine of the last century, is now taking an upward turn. Work is progressing on a $120,000,000 land development scheme and on drainage, rural electrification and hospital building schemes of a similar scale. The number employed in industry, though still small, is rising steadily.

I don't know if any of you, Americans with your history which has been no less prosperous than glorious, can appreciate what that means to an Irishman. It means that a nation which was nearly killed, whose life had almost ebbed away in the course of a long and agonizing struggle, is at last on the turn. The efforts of many Irishmen have gone to make this change and, not least, those Irishmen who worked and fought to secure for us the independence without which a nation cannot work out its own salvation. Since a measure of independence was obtained, successive governments have played their parts—that of Mr. Cosgrave, that of Mr. de Valera, and now Mr. Costello's government, of which I am a member. None of these governments has been infallible, but under all of them the work has gone ahead and is still going on. While the Ireland of today is no Utopia, one finds that atmosphere of hope and confidence which is lacking in many other countries today.

Much of the progress made in the last couple of years is attributable to the Marshall plan and in particular to the really constructive and helpful cooperation which we received from the ECA. The direct financial aid which we received was valuable but far more important in any view was the economic planning which we had to undertake in conjunction with the ECA. I have always held the view that in the long run the most permanent benefits that will accrue to Europe from the Marshall plan will be technical assistance and the system of economic analysis and cooperation resulting from a policy answered by ECA. I would like to avail of this opportunity of paying a public tribute to the far-sighted and constructive approach initiated by the ECA in Europe under the leadership of men like Paul Hoffman, Averell Harriman, and Bill Foster.

It is often suggested or implied by critics that Ireland is so preoccupied with her own affairs that she cares nothing for what goes on around her. I think it would be hard to put forward a suggestion that was more wholly misleading. It is not a question of whether the Irish people want to be internationally-minded or not; they cannot help being internationally-minded for they are an international people. An ordinary Kerry family may well have two uncles and an aunt in New Jersey, Chicago, and Springfield, Mass., a cousin in Montreal and another in Melbourne and probably a son or daughter in England or Scotland as well. With most of these they regularly correspond and I think that if some of our older people in, say Galway, were asked to draw a map of the world they might if they were not careful, show New York as being nearer than Dublin.

The people of Irish origin, scattered throughout the world and now playing their parts as citizens of other countries, still retain many of the characteristics of the people of the mother country. They are, for the most part, whether they be Catholic, Protestant, or Jewish, religious folk, and they constitute a moral force and go to reinforce the stabilizing elements in the countries in which they are. They are a virile and active force within the community of free nations—the very sort of people, tainted neither with communism nor reaction, of which the west stands most in need. While they remain fondly attached to Ireland and look to Ireland for moral leadership they certainly do not look to Ireland for political leadership. They are loyal Americans, Australians, and Canadians, or citizens of the country in which they have settled. At home our wish is to play our part with them, as well as with the ancient European nations to whose sisterhood Ireland belongs, in the building and preserving of a just and free society.

What part is Ireland, in fact, playing in international affairs? I think that question is best answered by reference to the four international organizations with which we might be directly concerned: The United Nations, the Council of Europe, the OEEC, and the North Atlantic Treaty organization.

As regards the United Nations the position is that we applied for the membership several years ago, being willing to undertake the full responsibilities of such membership. We were, however, kept out by the veto of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—Russia. Ironical as it may sound, Russia says that she cannot regard us as a democratic or peace-loving country.

As regards the Council of Europe and the OEEC, we are members of both these organizations. In both of them our representatives have consistently adopted the progressive policy of favoring developments which tended toward a united Europe. In the OEEC we have favored greater liberalization of trade, and we are in a position to do so since our own trade policies are among the most liberal in Europe. In the Council of Europe we have supported every measure which tended to strengthen the Assembly as against the Committee of Ministers, that is to say, every measure which represented a step on the road to a parliament of Europe. This was the attitude which was taken up by a country which has been represented as stubbornly or narrowly nationalistic. In fact no nation has been so prompt as we have been to support the uniting of Europe and the free and voluntary merging of individual sovereignties. We are however quite as stubbornly nationalistic as the United States would be when it is suggested that we should surrender our rights or a portion of our sovereignty to another nation.

As regards the last organization, that of the Atlantic Pact powers, the position is eign name, Corno di Bassetto, and then emerged as George Bernard Shaw. Miss Horniman and the Abbey Theater players have brought delight to thousands in our stalls. Our poets have sought beauty by frank, unblushing trespass on the realms which Yeats made his. From James Stephens we have taken up the chase of leprechauns. A generation of my fellow citizens learned political science and political suspicion from the works of a great philosopher, Mr. Dooley. Don Byrne has interpreted for us the magic that is in your soil and on your tongues and of your hearts.

But there are modern instances. The Book of Kells stands for something else. In sharp contrast, its antiquity stands for ancient, rooted, friendships, its presence here, for the commonality of freedom seeking and freedom winning, its text for those ideals and energies and high resolves which hold the fairest promise of survival and a future. Itself a blend of supreme art and consummate craftsmanship it has neither counterpart nor counterfeit among the medieval manuscripts which destructive time has spared to us. Curiously, it inspires no argument but only firm agreement. It is by consent and honor the finest product of that unparalleled efflorescence of Irish achievement which set the fine example for Western Europe in the centuries following the fall of Rome. In the Middle Ages it was at once model and goad and challenge for the perfection of calligraphy, the eloquence of illumination, and the nobility of striving. It is a testament worthy of the testaments it contains. Today, after a millenium and more, it evokes the same wonder and enlists the same devotion that brought it into being.

And so, Mr. Minister, please say to them who dwell in County Meath, and to the officers and fellows of Trinity, and to all the men and women of your green land, that your magnificent message of many meanings has reached one who is, at least by marriage, Irish. That may be their comforting assurance that the Book of Kells is inalienable and safe and somehow still at home. And for the people of these States, in whose name I am allowed to speak, convey to your constituency a profound and sturdy gratitude.

IRISH FOREIGN MINISTER COMPARES BRITAIN TO RUSSIA

Sean MacBride, Ireland's 47-year-old Minister for External Affairs, said yesterday that his country wanted to play a full part in international affairs, but was prevented from doing so by two powers—Russia and Britain.

"I do not say that the policies or actions of these two powers are the same, or even comparable," MacBride said. "All I do say is that they are inclined to look rather alike from where we sit.

"Both are powers with imperial traditions and to imperial powers the partitioning of small nations has always seemed expedient, and, therefore, just."

Minister MacBride spoke at a luncheon of the National Press Club, and evoked a good deal of applause and laughter with his eloquence and wit. The main dish at the luncheon was Irish stew.

The Irish cabinet officer said that Ireland had been kept out of the United Nations by the veto of Russia.

"Ironical as it may sound," he said, "Russia says she cannot regard us as a democratic or peace-loving country."

He said that Ireland was asked to join the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, but refused because the six northeastern counties of Ireland are held under British rule. He pointed out that any Irish Government would be driven from office if it attempted to enter into a military alliance with a power that is responsible for the partitioning of Ireland.

"This is not one of those ancient grievances which we are supposed to hug to our bosoms," MacBride said, "It is quite modern and very real and very present. It would be as impossible for an Irish Government to accept the article of the Atlantic Treaty which binds each participant to respect the territorial integrity of the others as it would have been for Abraham Lincoln to accept the Mason and Dixon's line as an international frontier.

"You do not accept the territorial integrity of a neighbor who is encamped in your garden."

Minister MacBride, in answering questions at the conclusion of his prepared talk, said there was no question that Ireland ought to be in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

"Whatever else you may say about Ireland," he said, amidst laughter, "she is plump in the middle of the North Atlantic Treaty territory."

He said that the time Ireland was invited to join the Atlantic Pact, in the interests of greater safety and strength, she suggested that the members discuss ways and means of solving the problem which precluded membership. This suggestion, he said, was not acted on.

Civilian Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following address which I shall deliver over radio station WMEX, Boston, Mass., on Monday, March 26, 1951:

These days we hear a lot of talk about inflation, price control, wage freeze, communism, hidden taxes, and "where do we go from here."

Now most of the problems are very real, but in a strange way that we cannot see and come to grips with. They bother us because we fear the unknown.

For a change, suppose we take a subject that is familiar to every American. And its name will be the Average City in the United States. In colonial times, most people lived in the country. In 1951 most of them live in communities. New York City alone has a population greater than forty-odd individual States. Each city has a transient number of people who work here or visit it frequently. Therefore, it may be said that all Americans are city folk either on a full- or part-time basis.

With the vast network of railroads and highways and airlines and with tens of millions of cars and trucks one would expect to find us getting away from urban concentrations. But these vast transportation facilities lead from city to city to city. We have seen the growth of suburban areas, but they are so close to the major cities that it is hard to tell the difference.

The average American community is the nerve center of our civilization.

Each is the focus of trade or industry.

The organization of city life is a big job.

To protect the life and health and property of its cliff dwellers is an elemental problem. There are others more complex and difficult.

So much so that we have had to create a new profession called city management to save our municipalities from a breakdown.

The traffic war alone in Boston or Los Angeles is a nightmare in itself. And a new one that didn't exist 30 years ago. Pollution of air and water is another modern plague that endangers our overcrowded centers of population.

Add to these physical troubles the old moral sores of crime and corruption, and we can understand how hard it is to control our mushrooming cities.

It is a major domestic challenge in time of peace.

And one that would be magnified a thousand times if we had to contend with sabotage, germ warfare, or death from the skies.

Imaginary?

Look back 1 year.

Whoever dreamed on February 26, 1950, that we would have been deeply committed in Korea and would have suffered more than 50,000 casualties 1 year later?

No one, at least not in the United States.

With hindsight it is easy to say now that we could have avoided some of this cost if we had been prepared.

The grim truth is that we were not prepared then.

From that lesson we are learning to have a little foresight and to protect ourselves against further shocks by taking out a little insurance in advance.

Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, United States Air Force, has testified that even with the best of interception a majority of enemy bombers would be able to get through and press home the attack on our industrial cities.

This is not a pleasant fact.

It is a realistic one.

What do we do then?

If we are organized and prepared to meet such a threat, the loss of life and the damage can be held to a minimum. The enemy will have lost his greatest opportunity, for our strategic bombers will be able to retaliate in force, sustained by our productive capacity that has been hurt but not destroyed.

If we fail to take these precautions, we shall be victims of the last Pearl Harbor, the last because we will never have a chance to recover from our defenseless, shattered, and defeated cities.

Our people's will to resist would be numbed by an overwhelming disaster.

Under the present circumstances, I cannot understand how anyone either in the United States or abroad can object if we set up defenses for our own cities.

Even the Communist propaganda machine, clever as it is in twisting the facts, could never call preparations for the civilian defense of Detroit or St. Louis as an aggression against the people of Budapest or Leningrad.

In normal times, it is our duty as citizens to pay out some money and not enough responsibility to protect our cities from germs, fire, crime, and ignorance.

In the present national emergency, declared because we are under pressure from an enemy who might blast our cities with fearful weapons, the ordinary safeguards would provide us with no defense.

Evidently we need something more.

I believe that volunteer service for civilian defense is both necessary and good. It will help to save our families, our homes, and our standard of living. And it will give us a greater knowledge of and respect for our communities and our fellow citizens that will improve the life of every city after we have survived these anxious years.

On Friday, January 21, 1951, the President signed H. R. 9798, which provides for a 3-year, three billion, one hundred million civil defense program. It extends Federal aid for the construction of air-raid shelters, for the stockpiling of blood plasma, and other special equipment, and sets up a Civil Defense Agency with authority—this: We were asked to join and we refused. You will want to know why.

1. To mobilize all Federal agencies for the aid of a stricken or threatened area.

I think on this vitally important question I cannot do better than take as my point of departure the cardinal principles of your own foreign policy, as set out in an admirable document, Our Foreign Policy, issued by your State Department.

These are the three points:

"We are an independent nation and we want to keep our independence;

"We attach the highest importance to individual freedom and we mean to keep our freedom;

"We are a peaceful people and we want to get rid of wars and the threat of wars."

We, in Ireland, would subscribe wholeheartedly to every one of these principles but, being historically less fortunate than you, we are forced to state them for ourselves in a somewhat different manner. This is how we have to state them:

"We are not an independent nation because a portion of it is still unfree but we want to achieve our independence;

"We attach the highest importance to individual freedom but many of our people have not got that freedom;

"We are a peaceful people but part of our territory has been taken from us by war and the threat of war."

These points which, as you will surmise, refer to the fact that part of our country, the six northeastern counties, is held under British rule, may seem exaggerated to you. They do not seem exaggerated to us or to the people, the majority in the greatest part of the British held territory, who want to be with us. I do not bring this problem before you because I expect that you, with the vast problems which you must debate every day, can concern yourselves with the intricacies of the methods by which this small territory, in defiance of geography, is held as part of Britain. I am not going to discuss, nor, I am sure, do you want to hear of the finesses of boundary drawing. Discrimination, gerrymandering and political police by which the entity known as Northern Ireland was set up and is maintained, but I do want you to know that that partition is the cause of such feeling in Ireland that no Irish Government could attempt, without immediately being driven from office, to enter into a military alliance with the power which is responsible for it. This is not one of those ancient grievances which we are supposed to hug to our bosoms. It is quite modern and very real and very present. It would be as impossible for an Irish Government to accept the article of the Atlantic Pact which binds each participant to respect the territorial integrity of the others as it would have been for Abraham Lincoln to accept the Mason and Dixon line as an international frontier. You do not accept the territorial integrity of a neighbor who is encamped in your garden. We are, I need hardly say, fully conscious of the gravity of our decision. Indeed, in our reply to the invitation to join the pact we suggested that, in the interests of the greater safety and strength of the chain of Atlantic defense, the members might discuss ways and means of solving the problem which precluded us from membership. Unfortunately, this suggestion was not acted on.

I wish to make it clear that there is no question of bargaining on this matter. It would be unworthy, both of the great issue involved—the future of the Atlantic community—and of the historic tradition of the Irish nation, were we to attempt to bargain on this. We are seeking our full freedom and independence as of right and we intend to get it.

The position then, in short, is that Ireland is willing and anxious to play her full part in international affairs, that she is already making a certain contribution but is prevented from doing her full share by two outside powers: Russia and Britain. I do not say that the policies or actions of these two powers are the same, or even comparable. All I do say is that they are inclined to look rather alike from where we sit. Both are powers with imperial traditions and to imperial powers the partitioning of small nations has always seemed expedient and, therefore, just. This was, and is, the policy of Russia in Poland. It has been the policy of Russia in Korea. In both cases the Russians found some Poles and some Koreans to support them, but in both cases the partition of a nation, a disaster in itself, leads to other disasters.

A nation is not a vague territory that can be cut up at will. It is a living, breathing thing. It is not easy to dig the grave of a nation, and when you have dug it, it is an unquiet grave. I think that you in this room who do so much to mold the policies of your great Nation, cannot do better than to reflect upon the cases of Poland, of Korea, and of Ireland, and to believe, contrary to the imperialistic maxim, that what is unjust can never be expedient, since there is something in humanity which stubbornly rejects, and in the long run overthrows, an unjust solution. I think that the greatest and the most effective political leaders, those whose work has been solid and enduring, are not the showy Machiavellians, or modern totalitarian dictators, with their contempt for people, and especially for people who were militarily weak or numerically insignificant, but the leaders who, like Washington and Lincoln, believed in human freedom as a guiding principle. Those who stand for that freedom have always been reputed damnably awkward people. It is, therefore, with no shame, but with pride, that I say that the Irish, still, stand for freedom and democratic rule and therefore may still be portrayed to you as damnably awkward people.

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE SEAN MACBRIDE, MINISTER OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OF THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND, AT THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS, MARCH 14, 1951

Whether the Book of Kells—known of old as "the Gospel of Columcille"—was inscribed and illuminated in the ancient town of Kells is a question which has not yet been solved. The last few pages of the manuscript, which might have enlightened us on this point, have been missing for many centuries. But it is now generally accepted that the book was produced at the end of the eighth or the beginning of the ninth century.

We know from an entry in the Annals of Ulster that the book was preserved in Kells in 1006. In that year the Annals record that "the great Gospel of Columcille was wickedly stolen by night out of the western sacristy of the large stone church of Kells. The Gospel was found after two months and twenty nights its gold having been taken off, and a sod over it".

For the next three centuries the famous manuscript continued to survive in the Monastery of Kells, now threatened by the violence and destruction of the Anglo-Norman invaders. Its association with Kells was finally broken in 1539, the year in which all surviving Irish monasteries were dissolved by order of Henry VIII. The manuscript was handed over to the care of one Henry Plunkett, probably a relative of the last abbot of Kells. A marginal note by Plunkett shows that some of the pages were missing in his day.

In 1661 the book became the property of Trinity College, Dublin, where it has remained ever since. Three hundred and thirty-nine pages long, it contains the Four Gospels in Latin, illustrated by pictures of the Evangelists and scenes from the life of our Lord. It is remarkable for the beauty of the writing, for the great variety of the capital letters, for the size of the initials on the monogram pages. It is the most elaborate Irish manuscript extant and the delicacy and beauty of the design are such that in the words of one observer "they might have been drawn in Paradise." Not without reason has the Book of Kells become known as one of the world's most beautiful books.

Now, after the lapse of 1200 years Swiss experts and Irish scholars, aided by modern color photography, have combined to produce this copy of the Book of Kells. It was, I understand, a slow and difficult task. There were more than 650 distinct shades in the book. Each page was photographed in Dublin, the photograph taken to Berne for technical treatment and printing then the proof returned to Dublin to be compared color by color, line by line with the original. Some pages went through more than 25 printings before the experts were satisfied.

One day, I understand, someone suggested that this was a needlessly complicated arrangement. Wouldn't it be better if the Book of Kells was flown to Switzerland? The Swiss expert scrutinizing print and original looked up from his task. "You can always replace an airplane," he remarked laconically—and that was that. The Book of Kells stayed in Dublin.

It is not without significance that this presentation takes place in the United States of America the greatest free federation of states which the world has ever known. The skilled reproduction which we see before us is largely the work of Swiss experts, men from the confederation of freedom-loving self-governing cantons which the outside world has grown to love and respect as Switzerland. The original Book of Kells was produced some 1200 years ago in an Ireland in which the individual tuatha, grouped into five kingdoms, presided over by one High King while sharing the same language, the same Brehon code of laws, the same rich folklore and literature, the same social life and customs, yet possessed a large measure of local autonomy and in fact formed a United States of Ireland.

On behalf of the people and Government of Ireland I am honored to have the privilege of presenting this copy to the Library of the Congress of the United States which has always given us its sympathy in our struggle to regain our liberty and to maintain the civilization and culture of which this book is an example.

REMARKS OF THE LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS, LUTHER HARRIS EVANS, ON THE PRESENTATION OF THE BOOK OF KELLS, COOLIDGE AUDITORIUM, MARCH 14, 1951

You Irish have a saying: "Glory be to God; it's the fine day that's in it." I use it now (employing a Texas accent) for you have made a fine day in this. But my pleasure in this afternoon is more than pleasure in a gift. The Library of Congress has—or had until a few minutes ago when last I looked—a book. No such book, to be sure as that of Kells, which, legend holds, was penned by Columba himself almost a millenium before Columbus provided the possibility of this repository for that magnificent reproduction you have entrusted to my care. No, our gratitude for your generosity is not confined to tangibles, but spreads beyond an obvious cupidity and a lamentable sense of proprietorship to the very race which makes it. Specifically, our gratitude goes out to the island people and their government, who have so lavishly enriched our collections. In sharing with us the greatest of your cultural monuments you continue a great tradition.

You have delighted the American audience with the luminous loveliness of Synge and the wit and daring of a vegetarian-musicologist who once called himself by a for-

of the kind and magnitude that will drain off excess spending power, and of coordinated fiscal and monetary policies to restrain inflationary pressures, as discussed in the subsequent articles in this letter.

ESSENTIALS OF INFLATION CONTROL

In this brief record of 1 month's developments can be seen the basic reasons why the program to curb inflation is working badly. With respect to price and wage controls, the weaknesses in part are inherent. A freeze in either prices or wages destroys the flexibility which in normal times is relied upon to keep the economy in balance. It freezes inequities and impracticable relationships and for that reason checks production and trade, unless relief is given. But relief or exceptions in any direction raise demands for compensating relief or exceptions elsewhere. Meanwhile powerful political groups use their power to protect themselves against sacrifice, at the expense of requiring greater sacrifice from others. To exert pressure for this purpose, labor union leaders walked out of the Wage Stabilization Board, resigned from all positions in the defense effort, and denounced Mr. C. E. Wilson, whose offense seems to be that as Defense Mobilization Administrator he is determined to get his job done effectively and with regard to the general interest above special interests. Fortunately Mr. Wilson continues to enjoy the confidence of the country.

The United States Treasury seeks exemption from any increase in borrowing costs that might be caused by desirable anti-inflationary policies. The Congressional hearings on taxation become a cockpit of conflicting representations by groups intent on protecting themselves, culminating in the proposal of a labor union economist that exemptions from the personal income tax be raised to $2,500 for a married couple; this of course would free more billions of dollars of income from taxation and leave it to exert its inflationary powers in the markets. While this goes on the rise in incomes and spending power continues, and well designed anti-inflationary measures such as Regulations W and X, limiting consumer and housing credit respectively, fail to have the anticipated effects because people can pay cash or meet larger down payments without the expected difficulty.

This list could be extended. The evil is that if the politically powerful groups obtain exceptions the inflationary pressures will not be contained, and all will suffer. The problem of leadership, if the objective of establishing an effective price and wage stabilization in the next few months is to be reached, is to get people to think and act in terms of the general interest, and resolutely to place the welfare of the whole country ahead of group interests in the hard decisions now in the making.

The National Health Insurance Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 14, 1951

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an address I made before the Midwood Jewish Center in Brooklyn on the subject of the national health insurance program:

THE NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE PROGRAM

Before I begin the discussion of a national health insurance program I believe it is high time that it was made clear what we are talking about. The misleading tag that has been placed on this program, namely, socialized medicine, has done more to confuse the issue than any other factor. You will forgive my bluntness, I am sure, when I say that this was and still is a deliberate campaign to becloud the real meaning and benefits of such a program.

This must be made absolutely clear: The national health insurance program is not socialized medicine. I have yet to see any bit of propaganda against this program making any attempts to analyze the bills. What I have seen is vague ill-denied use of such words as "socialism," "bureaucracy," "Government controlled," and so on. If the opponents of a national health insurance program have read the administration bills they certainly take the greatest pains to conceal that fact; and if they have not read the administration bills, then most certainly the public trust and confidence have been clearly abused.

The national health insurance program is exactly what it says it is—it is insurance. The purpose is to enable the American people to pay for good medical and hospital care by requiring them to put a small percentage of their income into a national insurance fund which would be used to provide such services. It is based on the exact same principle as unemployment insurance, and social security. It is based on the exact same principle as private insurance. In other words, periodic payments are made at a time when ability to pay is present to provide for future needs. As in social-security payments, unemployment compensation, and private insurance, moneys are paid into a common fund out of which fund, benefits will be derived when conditions demand it. If this be socialism, then make the most of it.

It has been charged that the right of the citizen to pick his own doctor will be wiped out. I would like to quote a section—a direct quote, if you please—from my bill, H. R. 27, section 203: "Every individual eligible for personal health services available under this title may freely select the physician, dentist, nurse, medical group, hospital, or other person of his choice to render such services, and may change such selection."

It has been charged that such a program makes mere political pawns of doctors, dentists, and nurses. Nonsense. The bill assures professional freedom to doctors. Their medical work is not to be subject to lay direction. Doctors are represented on all commissions and advisory councils. All purely medical matters are to be settled only by doctors.

Doctors and other health personnel are free to participate full-time, part-time, or not at all as they choose. Let me read from section 220 headed "Professional rights and responsibilities":

"(b) Every physician, dentist, or nurse agreeing to render services as benefits under this title shall be free to practice his profession in the locality of his own choosing, consistent with the requirements of the laws of the States.

"(c) Every physician, dentist, nurse, hospital, or other person entering into an agreement under this part shall be free to the extent consistent with applicable State law and customary professional ethics to accept or reject as a patient any individual requesting his services."

Now let me read subsection (d) to you:

"No supervision or control over the details of administration or operation, or over the selection, tenure, or compensation of personnel, shall be exercised under the authority of this title over any hospital which has agreed to furnish personal health services as benefits."

Now let's look a little bit at the pay. A national health insurance fund would be set up in the United States Treasury and would consist of an annual sum equal to 3 percent of earnings up to $3,600. Workers would contribute a small regular sum, amounting to 1½ percent of their earnings up to $3,600 a year (a maximum of $54 a year). This would be matched by equal contributions from their employers.

Physicians and dentists could choose any of the following methods by which to be paid: on a fee-for-service basis, as is now the most common method; so much per year per person; on a salary basis; or by a combination of methods. The bill provides that the payment must adequately remunerate for the services rendered and that is determined by the advice of the professional people participating in the administration of the program.

Now let it be noted that major administrative responsibility would be placed in the hands of the people where the services are rendered and received. Each State government would be able to administer the program in its area. Each State would name its own agency to administer the program and its own advisory council. The Federal Board would administer the program within a State only if a State did not accept the responsibility.

In addition to health insurance, the bill grants to nonprofit institutions and agencies aid for medical education and medical research up to $10,000,000 in the first year and $15,000,000 the second year; thereafter up to 2 percent of the amount spent for benefits in the preceding year.

Grants to States are authorized for a comprehensive program of basic State and local health services, for maternal and child health, crippled children, chronic disease, industrial hygiene and related services, and for training of personnel.

It provides Federal funds for the construction of needed hospitals, clinics, and health centers.

Perhaps you are asking yourself why this program is necessary at all. Why can't we continue the way we have continued heretofore—a man is sick, a man, woman, or child is ill; he goes to the doctor; gets his treatment; pays his money? But is it really of question of "leave well enough alone"?

Four fears attend the average person through his life—the fear of unemployment, the fear of accident, the fear of old age, and the fear of sickness. It is a common enough, though tragic, story of life savings being wiped out by an illness. Doctor bills, hospital bills, and dental bills have, in many instances, mortgaged many lives. Is it not logical that unavoidable illnesses be paid for when the ability to pay is still with us? Or shall we wait until the dread attacks us and then draw upon our limited savings?

That is what all insurance is—a compulsory savings to meet a need when it arises. The whole program, to my mind, is a prudent, practical, American way to insure the very best for its people, self-paid for by the people out of their earnings. It is confined to people who make no more than $3,600 a year, thereby covering those people whose savings at best barely cover when the tragedy of illness overcomes them either as breadwinners or as heads of families. Lost wages and lost production come to $27,000,000,000 a year.

Over 40 percent of America's young men were not able to pass wartime draft standards. One out of every six rejected had remedial or preventive diseases or defects.

2. To spend unlimited funds to aid stricken area.

3. To requisition equipment and property from any source.

The States and cities would have to match the Federal contributions.

Last June there were less than six full-time State directors of civilian defense. Now there is one for every State and Territory.

Detailed plans have been worked out on local, State, and regional levels, but these blueprints mean little unless we have the supplies and the trained volunteers to give us some measure of real protection within a matter of minutes.

The people working on the problem at Chicago have figured that we couldn't expect more than 8 minutes warning before an atomic-bomb attack.

But how many Americans know what they should do in the next 8 minutes?

What would you do now—sitting in the easy chair before your radio or washing the dishes in the kitchen? Has anyone told you? Have you read up anything about it? The children in your home would look to you for emergency protection because the civilian-defense people at their posts or on their way to them would have their hands full battling fire and confusion and ministering to the wounded.

It is a question for sober thought and answer in terms of immediate and personal responsibility.

The average American city is a structure of many buildings, laced together by streets, in which thousands of human beings move and function with a minimum of friction. Your civilian defense agency has to protect the city first and you secondarily. It is a group effort.

Red Russia has a stockpile of 50 or more A-bombs.

Perhaps your city is designated to receive one of these, or you live within 100 miles of a major target city and must be prepared to offer refuge to its evacuees.

How much progress has your community made in preparing for such an emergency?

Luckily, most cities have done something on their own initiative without waiting for the State and Federal Governments to catch up with the realities of 1951.

Norfolk, Va., and San Mateo, Calif., report that they are almost completely ready to handle any disaster. Uniontown, Pa., has lined up its beauty shops as first-aid stations, and San Antonio, Tex., has given its taxicab drivers and its bus systems a basic training in the technique of moving the population from a hard-hit area.

Schenectady, N. Y., has figured out bridge loads and clearances in case of a mass emergency exit and is recruiting volunteer stretcher bearers; Revere, Mass., is using television to explain civilian defense to the people at home.

A disaster manual, written in plain words and with pictures to show what each individual should do to protect himself and others, ought to be in the possession of every school child and every grown-up in this Nation. A few cities and States are putting out their own manuals, but this isn't enough. The source of such vital information—the Federal Government—is so bogged down with red tape that it can't seem to get out these prescriptions for safety to the people it is supposed to serve. Maybe if the first Russian A-bomb is dropped on Washington and burns up the suffocating mass of bureaucratic waste paper, the way will be cleared for direct communication and effective teamwork between the Government and the public.

Our present stockpile of A-bombs won't do us much good as long as we are wide open to attack. And the Soviet Union is far ahead of us in protective measures. Much of its industrial power has been dispersed, and its citizens have been well trained in civil defense. Sooner than we think, the Soviet Union will be able to direct simultaneous A-bomb attacks against many of our harbors and industrial centers. To absorb this without crippling damage we must scatter our industries and decentralize our Federal Government, and set up an effective warning and interception system.

The only power in the world that the Soviet planners fear is the power of American production. In fact, a complete civilian-defense program that actually protects our industries, our people and their ability to work, will discourage a Soviet attack. They will not strike if they know that we are ready to take it and strike back in turn.

And our readiness will be based upon our ability to keep American cities going as producers of military supplies.

We can defend ourselves against atomic attack, but we cannot buy absolute protection. England survived because it was able to take and rally from the fury of repeated enemy air attacks. And make note of the fact that England started to prepare its civilian defense in 1936, 3 years before the outbreak of war.

In the light of all this, what shall we do?

Sign up as volunteers for local defense.

Help in the work of planning dispersal and for the setting up of decontamination facilities. Each city needs emergency hospitals, mobile first-aid units, fire-fighting units, emergency feeding and housing accommodations, and other programs for the relief of target areas.

I feel that the American people should know of the dangers that face them. I do not hold with those who say "Don't tell them the truth for they will give way to fear and hysteria."

Rich or poor, great or humble, we're all in the same house as far as this threat to our security is concerned. Given the details, we can accept them and learn to live with danger and not try to shield ourselves with helpless and pathetic innocence.

Only preparedness can possibly ward off an attack.

There is no other way.

As one of your public servants, I consider it my duty to give you a few of the facts in the time at my disposal. I do this so that you will demand a genuine program for your community, that you will become a part of it, so that our combined efforts will build an alert and strong America that will warn the aggressor not to attack, because he will fail against the strength of our civilian defense.

Price Stabilization—An Economic View

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 27, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, appended is an analysis of the price stabilization situation from the March monthly letter on economic conditions and Government finance of the National City Bank of New York. It emphasizes that the welfare of the whole country must stand ahead of group interests and calls attention to the hard decisions which must be made in the public interest when the Defense Production Act of 1950 is extended this year:

PRESENT RELATION OF WAGES AND LIVING COSTS

The accompanying chart [not printed] sets forth as of latest available dates the relation of wage rates in the manufacturing industries to the cost of living calculated on the base period January 1950, according to Bureau of Labor Statistics data. It shows that in November average straight time wage rates (excluding overtime premiums) were almost exactly in line with the cost of living. Later figures unfortunately are not available. To reach the allowable 10 percent increase, a rise of nearly 5 percent above the average November rates could take place, even without the good-sized loopholes asked by Mr. Johnston.

The chart also shows that the straight time rate understates factory workers' income, because earnings are made up not only of straight time rates but of overtime and other premiums. Another line in the chart shows actual hourly earnings, averaging overtime premiums over the workweek. This line rose above the cost of living line in September and has maintained a good lead since. Finally, average weekly earnings are given. Reflecting the influence of longer hours, they show a steady gain in real purchasing power.

The margin between contractual straight time rates and actual hourly earnings is almost certain to widen as the familiar "upgrading" and shifting of jobs, which inevitably develop in tight labor markets, makes its appearance. Thus the rise in hourly earnings under the formula can obviously exceed 10 percent, and by a substantial margin if all the loopholes asked by Mr. JOHNSTON are provided. What the cost of living may be by June 30—the date when revision is promised—remains to be seen. But the probability indicated by the respective lines on the chart is that factory workers under the formula will enjoy a rise of real income on an hourly basis—in other words in real earnings per unit of work—even without the further increase in working hours which in many industries is desirable.

INFLATIONARY EFFECTS

If this is the outcome the influence of the wage formula will not be to establish equity, but to create inequity. The purchasing power of factory workers will keep ahead of the cost of living increase, and the added buying power (unless nullified by greater taxes and savings) will come into the markets as enlarged demand for goods. In a time of declining supplies of consumer goods an increase in the real purchasing power of any group must be at the expense of other elements of the population. This is the pertinent point as to the equity of the formula. As to its inflationary effect, further wage increases unless offset by greater productivity will raise industrial costs, and the increased money income also will exert its upward push on the price level.

The position of the farmer under the stabilization program is equally privileged, by reason of the statutory exemptions already referred to. As higher wages force up industrial costs, and the increases work their way into the prices farmers pay, the farm parity price—the level at which ceilings are permitted—will rise. This in turn will interact on the cost of living, and so around the circle. The farm parity price computation itself includes a substantial percentage of farm commodities such as foods and purchased feed; this permits the parity index in effect to spiral within itself when farm prices are rising, even though manufactured goods prices remain unchanged.

On behalf of increases in compensation for special groups, it will be argued that incentives to work and production must be preserved. But if the decision of the stabilization agencies is that preservation of incentives makes it necessary to accept inflationary mechanisms, the need to adopt offsetting counter-inflationary policies becomes all the more urgent. This brings the discussion back to the point at which it inevitably arrives, namely, the need for taxes be needed only after the organized units were called into active service. The call, therefore, which resulted in bringing almost a million of these men, together with the National Guard, into active service found the inactive Reserve unprepared both mentally and by virtue of his environment for such a call.

As I understand the feeling of these men, it is that they feel that organized units with equipment, uniforms, training, drill pay and a definite rating as to efficiency would be called before the inactive Reserve would be called into service. He was prepared to go in the event of an all-out world-wide war; but he did expect, and felt like the armed services had led him to believe, that he would not be called upon to shoulder the burden of national defense as a first-line reservist. This, I think, presents strongly the views of the men whose letter is set forth above.

The bill which has just been approved by the House Armed Services Committee contains a provision which will release inactive and volunteer reservists after 12 months of active duty, provided it is in the interest of national security. Considering all the circumstances, I feel that this man with veteran status should be treated as a veteran and should be released as soon as practicable, regardless of the 12-month period, in the event it can be done without jeopardizing our national safety.

I strongly believe in rotation. It is a great morale builder. The fact that the Marine Corps has already put into active operation rotation from the Far East theater of operations is a further argument showing the wisdom of this program. I hope that the other branches of the armed services will immediately put into effect a very liberal rotation policy and that those men who have long periods of service in Korea and in the Far East will be given a reasonable opportunity to come home and stay for a while in the United States of America with their friends and family. The sooner this program is put into operation the better will be the morale effect on our troops overseas.

We have tremendous problems in providing this country with an adequate national defense. These problems must be met; but in meeting them we should not overlook equity and fair dealing in our attitude and our program to those who faithfully served the military needs of this country in critical times.

Budget Cuts Hurt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, it was encouraging to observe the action of the House today in passing by comfortable margins amendments to effect substantial reductions in the first three items of the first appropriation bill to come before us. Yet the total of these cuts is less than $1,000,000.

Commendable as this action was, therefore, it also demonstrates that the only way we will accomplish large economies is by eliminating entirely services, activities, and functions of government which cannot properly be termed essential.

In the accomplishment of this objective, it is my considered judgment that the re-creation of the Hoover Commission would be a great step forward. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Rochester Times-Union backing such a proposal.

The editorial follows:

BUDGET CUTS HURT

President Truman has described his $71,600,000,000 budget as "tight." If this year is like others the budget will rock along that way until the congressional committees get all wadded up in figures and confusion. Then out of sheer discouragement at the magnitude of the task, somebody will pipe up and demand to know how budget cutting can be done.

Senator BYRD has shown how $9,000,000,000 can be cut. Now comes the Roswell Magill committee on Federal tax policy with proposals of $10,000,000,000 cuts outside defense expenditures.

Of course these cuts hurt. But so will the new taxes hurt. Magill and his associates would make deep cuts in public works, drastic reductions in grants and subsidies, and an end to Federal buying of farm commodities and business loans.

The budget can be cut but it can't be cut painlessly. That is why Representative KENNETH KEATING's proposal to call back the Hoover Commission to designate unnecessary or postponable drains on the public till is a practical approach.

KEATING has now been joined by Senator DIRKSEN (Republican, Illinois), who will press the proposition in the Senate. Until this is done, any claim that the budget can't be cut is pure defeatism.

Asleep at the Switch

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am including as part of my remarks, excerpts from Paul Harvey's news broadcast of American Broadcasting Co., of January 21, 1951. I believe that Mr. Harvey has correctly called attention to the situation as it exists in this country for the last decade. The American people have been asleep at the switch.

The above-mentioned excerpts follow:

Now something to slumber on.

The Pilgrim Fathers of the United States were Communists.

The self-government which they established in Massachusetts was communistic.

All that they owned and all the crops which they grew became the common property of all. A man's task was assigned him by central authority. Food was rationed. At first a quarter-pound of bread a day to each person.

But some of the Pilgrims complained that they were too weak from want of food to tend the crops as they should.

There was increasing absenteeism.

"So," writes Governor Bradford, "the colonists began to think how they might raise as much corn as they could and obtain a better crop than they had done."

And at last, in 1623, after much debate of things, the governor, with the advice of the chiefest of the colonists, decided upon a new system whereby each man should plant his own corn. Each would therefore have to trust himself for the food for his family.

So each family was assigned a parcel of land. And I quote Governor Bradford, "This had a very good success, for it made all hands very industrious so as much more corn was planted."

They now went willingly into the field and took their little ones with them to set corn. Before, they would have alleged weakness and inability to work. To have compelled them to work would have been tyranny. But now they worked willingly. By the time the next harvest had come, instead of famine there was plenty. The effect of the private planting was apparent to all. Some of the more industrious had to spare, and to sell to others. "So," writes Governor Bradford, "any general want or famine has not been amongst them to this day."

The Communist experiment in America—as with all Communist experiments past, present, and future—was foredoomed to failure, because it considered man to be an economic rather than a human being. And so was conceived here a new system of government. It was based on I Corinthians 3: 8: "Every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labor." And in but a few years freemen raised themselves and their society to a pinnacle of progress unapproached in all the ages.

Then in 1916 something happened. And the people of the United States became the first in the history of the world ever voluntarily to surrender their rights of property. It was done in an hour of foreign entanglement, with a carelessly worded constitutional amendment. It said, "The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes on income from whatever source. * * *" It placed no limit on the amount of those taxes. Conceivably the people could be taxed out of all private property. Income taxes were not new. The first income tax was written on a rock by the hand of Divinity and given to Moses at the top of Mount Sinai. It was at the flat rate of 10 percent. And, remember this, it promised the wrath of God on anyone who violated that law.

At Runnymede the Magna Carta was handed to King John on the end of a sword * * * denying to royalty the right of unlimited taxation. But, as I say, it was for the American people to become the first ever voluntarily to return that tyrannical power to government.

Then, in 1932, the next big step backward. What had been a government of, by, and for the people * * * became instead a government of executive directors and bureaus; by appointees having the power to make rules with the force of law. The power to construe those rules and to enforce them. All the powers any king in history ever had * * * were handed to men not even duly elected. Such was called a "new deal." Though Emperor Diocletian long before had tried to rescue the Roman Empire by destroying the power of the senate and delegating that power to many government bureaus. The result was the Dark Ages, lasting a thousand years.

Finally, in January 1951, the United States prepared once more in the pattern of the first confused, frightened Pilgrims to ration food, to allocate farm crops by decree, to regulate what could be sold and to whom and for how much; to regulate where a man

Twenty-seven million have doctors' services in a hospital plus hospitalization. Twenty-seven million more have hospitalization insurance only. Three and one-half million have comprehensive protection including preventive medicine. Eighty-six million Americans have no health protection at all.

True, voluntary plans such as the Blue Cross and the Blue Shield are all right as far as they go, but very few of these approved plans offer any preventive medicine or accept patients with chronic diseases. Very often in maternity cases extra fees are justifiably asked for. Under the national health program adequate medical care would be a right, not a charity.

Now I do not for a moment pretend that the administration bills covering the national health insurance program are letter perfect, but I do know that the resistors to any national insurance program have made no effort to cooperate so that a fully acceptable bill could be worked out. As I pointed out before the only cry that they put up is that of "socialism," disregarding the hopes and the futures of millions of Americans. The AMA—the American Medical Association—has disseminated a good bit of material about the national health insurance program full of hazy writing and half-truth.

I would like to quote a bit from Mr. Bernard DeVoto, who in a recent issue of Harper's magazine wrote a Letter to a Family Doctor. He bluntly states: "I will not help pay for the $25 assessment you sent to the AMA to run these ads and print these pamphlets. I will not help you finance distortion and demagoguery. In an envelope that has your name and degree on it you tell me by way of Dr. Henderson that 'all infectious diseases have been brought under effective methods of prevention, control, and treatment.' I am to have no more colds, then, and my friend's daughter need not have died of poliomyelitis last summer. Cure guaranteed, Dr. Henderson's ad says in effect, and it was only through inadvertence that he did not mention the great increase in chronic diseases, especially among the elderly, and that he did not point out how our increased longevity makes more medical service necessary, not less."

Several proposals, as you know, have been made. The administration bill outlines a compulsory health-insurance system based on a contributory payroll tax. Other bills have called for grants-in-aid to States to underwrite and expand existing State and local programs for the "medically indigent." The Flanders-Ives bill proposes Federal subsidies, furnished through the States, to help develop a national system of private voluntary prepayment group-insurance plans. In the first and third plans mentioned here, there is considerable merit. It may well be that a system of private voluntary prepayment group-insurance plans may be a partial answer. The legislation is continually under examination. What I ask mainly is that there be an intelligent approach to the subject, taking into consideration both our needs and our facilities. What I object so strenuously to is this attitude of what was good enough for grandfather is good enough for me.

There was a time when the American Medical Association bitterly attacked voluntary-group plans, going even to the extent of dismissing able physicians from the society because of their participation in such groups. Now experiencing a change of heart, it embraces these groups, trying to show how noble and how public-minded the AMA really is.

If there is a basic evil in a national health insurance program, its opponents have yet failed to point it out. Enough of this double-talk. Let's have straight talk. Yet the AMA has offered no adequate substitute for this tested insurance plan of pooling resources to meet a common risk. If they fear reduction in earnings, let them say so, though nobody has yet proved how the doctors will suffer financially because of such a program. Nor has yet anybody proved how medical services therein will be decreased in quality.

What I object to is not the objections to the program—for honest men may disagree among themselves—but I object to the manner and methods of objection.

If there is a better way of improving the Nation's health—and it cannot be denied that the Nation's health needs improving—then let's face the issue squarely in earnest cooperation and not in a spirit of tantrums and the manufacturing of ghosts.

Enlisted Reservists in Korea Score Congress for Indecision

EXTENSION OF REMARK
OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 1, 1951

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I have just clipped an article from the March 8, 1951, edition of the Shreveport Journal, a daily newspaper published in Shreveport, La., which article contains a joint letter signed by 33 members of the Armed Forces Reserves who are now on active service in Korea. This letter sets forth strongly the position of these Reserves who are now fighting in the Far East and who are serving the Nation there and elsewhere. It is obvious that these Reserves feel that they have not been treated fairly.

For the information of the Congress I set forth this article in full below:

CLAIM UNFAIR BURDEN—ENLISTED RESERVISTS IN KOREA SCORE CONGRESS FOR INDECISION

Shreveport enlisted Reserve servicemen now on duty with the Eighth Army in Korea blame congressional indecision for what they consider an unfair burden on veteran reservists.

"It seems that the Armed Forces reason * * * that they had better milk us dry while we are still under thumb, for once the Reserves are released, they will never again allow themselves in position for another rape," the Shreveport Journal was told today, in a letter signed by 34 enlisted reservists in Korea.

THIRTY-FOUR SIGN LETTER

The letter, signed by Corp. Clarence D. Ellington and 33 other men, was written February 25.

"Congress would have heard little complaint even this time," the men wrote, "if a just recall system had been effected."

An investigation of reported inequities in the reverse recall program was launched by the House Armed Services Committee several months ago, shortly after the Journal printed a complaint from Ellington and other reservists prior to their shipment overseas.

The letter received today from Korea follows:

"Enlisted Reserve personnel in this theater have received word through letters from home—we get little first-hand news—that an attempt is being made by the Defense Department to extend our present compulsory tour of active duty beyond 21 months.

"Are the Armed Forces trying to cope with the present crisis by the exclusive use of veteran reservists? Such would seem to be the case.

"Reservists in Korea had already given 3 years or more of their lives even before the present police action. Congress would have heard little complaint even this time if a just recall system had been effected.

"Be that as it may, these reservists are now filling manpower gaps in Korea, fighting with the Regulars, and awaiting congressional consideration on mistakes which have been made.

"Our civilian lives have been interrupted for a second time. How are we later to compete with men who have seen little or no service?

"We have heard of endless talk and hesitation on the draft of 18-year-olds and married nonveterans.

"Why have these men acquired the privilege of living their lives with impunity when, during the last war, they would have long since been overseas? Experience, not age, determines the efficiency of a soldier in or out of battle.

"It appears that someone at home is suffering from delusions of grandeur if they believe a large military force can be built without this sizable segment of available manpower. Volunteer 17-year-olds were permitted to fight in 1941 and are fighting now, yet there is still doubt over the ability of 18-year-olds to do likewise.

"The reservists await completion of present debate over rotation plans, but, judging from treatment afforded us thus far, precious little in our favor is expected. It seems that the Armed Forces reason, and with accuracy, that they had better milk us dry while we are still under thumb, for once the reserves are released, they will never again allow themselves in position for another rape.

"The following signatures indicate agreement with this letter and request publication of same." Names and serial numbers on the signature list:

Mr. Speaker, the inactive reservist in a large percentage of the cases is a veteran with a long period of service in the Second World War. It is true that he entered the Reserves voluntarily, but after electing to go into the Reserves, he was placed in an inactive status as an inactive reservist. As such, he was denied position in an organized unit. He was given no equipment, no drill, and no drill pay. He received no training and no instruction; and in most instances, no effort was made whatsoever to keep in contact with him. In many instances he changed his civilian occupation and certainly changed his marital status and the Armed Forces knew nothing about his efforts to improve himself and his position in life. When an inactive reservist was denied a position in an organized unit, he obtained the impression, if not the information direct, that he would rather than toward the heavens for that help all mankind needs.

How tragically true the events of the past year have proved the President's prediction. More and more evident it becomes that the current separation of mankind into differing camps is essentially a moral cleavage involving two irreconcilable concepts of the importance of the human being. In the Communist view the individual—like a cow or a horse—is a chattel of the state, just that and nothing more. In the eyes of the democratic world the individual is recognized as the most important thing on the face of the globe because that individual possesses an immortal soul. You and I are truly free, because you and I have certain inherent, natural rights—rights derived from our creation by God—from our equal creation by God.

Few generations have lived in such uncertain, confused and dangerous conditions as those in which we will probably spend the rest of our lives. On all hands people cry out "What can we do to help?" One clear and obvious answer to that question is for all Americans to strive in their daily lives to fulfill in our blessed America that perfection of the democratic processes, that real equality that was envisaged for all Americans by our founding fathers. Much remains to be done by all of us before that is accomplished, and it cannot be accomplished merely by a 7-day observance of Brotherhood Week.

Believing in a spiritual interpretation of the universe, and deriving its inspiration therefrom, the national conference exists to promote justice, amity, understanding, and cooperation among Protestants, Jews, and Catholics. We seek to analyze, moderate, and ultimately eliminate intergroup prejudices which disfigure and distort religious, business, social, and political relations. We strive to establish a social order in which the religious ideals of brotherhood and justice shall become the standards of human relationships, and we work at it 365 days in the year.

Goethe once observed that it is easier to perceive error than to find truth, for the former lies on the surface and is easily seen, while the latter lies in the depths where few are willing to search for it. From day to day and from week to week we must augment our forces with men and women who are willing to make some sacrifice to seek out the causes of intolerance and bigotry and to root them out of our system.

In the 22 years since this conference was organized, very great progress has been made. Encouraged by that progress thousands of American men and women who realize that the job is far from done and who appreciate the tremendous importance of this work are devoting a great deal of their time and their efforts in this cause.

Why is this so important? That I shall attempt to answer this evening.

Whether or not we like it, America has been invested with the leadership of the free world and the task of defending western civilization. The success of that defense will determine the survival of our way of life and the maintenance of the dignity of man. Until and unless bigotry, prejudice and intolerance among intercreedal and interracial groups have disappeared from the American scene, the success of that leadership and of that defense will be in jeopardy.

Until we have achieved a practical day-to-day implementation of the principles of brotherhood, we cannot be sure that our American democracy is secure, and we cannot have too great confidence in our efforts to bring democracy to other parts of the world. But once we have attained throughout this fair land a unity which comes from an understanding of group by group; an appreciation of culture, group by group; and respect of racial, religious differences, group by group, American democracy will have a much firmer foundation.

The times in which we have lived have seen fantastic progress in most fields of human endeavor. Within our lifetime science has contributed more to medicine, to communication, to transportation, to agriculture, and to many of the other things that affect our daily lives than it has contributed in many centuries. In giving us the radio and the airplane it furnished the peoples of the world with those devices they needed to draw closer together, to understand and respect each other. It is the tragedy of our age, that these two inventions were aborted from their proper purposes. In the hands of power-crazed egoists in the late 1930's one was diverted to the purposes of hate-fostering and war-breeding propaganda, and the other into a lethal weapon of international blackmail. These two inventions which had given such promise of forestalling future wars contributed to the events that produced the most costly war in world history.

Since the end of World War II, science has made further great strides—in every field of human endeavor except the one in which we most need progress. That is the field of human relationships. It is to this objective that the National Conference of Christians and Jews addresses its entire efforts.

In this country, differences in background and culture are sometimes overemphasized, and the broad areas of common purposes and objectives that unite all of the people of the United States are too frequently forgotten. So it is that throughout the length and breadth of our land we ask Americans to reexamine from time to time the community of purpose of all Americans, and to explore various new approaches for devising formulas that will lead to even greater trust, confidence, and respect among our different groups. We hope that there will be no lessening of anyone's loyalty to one's own faith or race. We seek a strong, purposeful movement toward the realization of unity in diversity. Our objective is not to abolish differences but to learn to respect them. The pride and the strength of America are to be found in the amazing diversity of its people drawn from every race and culture on this globe. That diversity of talents and skills and personalities—urged of the toxin of misunderstanding and distrust—can constitute a greatness and a strength that no other nation can ever achieve.

We know that today the biggest question for the entire world is whether the human spirit is to remain free, or is to be swallowed up by totalitarianism. We agree with the late Justice Wiley Rutledge that if we are to be free we must deserve to be free; if we are to survive we must deserve to survive.

There is no doubt in the mind of any real American that here on this continent our forefathers established a system of government and a way of life which has proved to be the world's greatest contribution to human freedom and the dignity of man. No thoughtful person can question that our system of government and our way of life is in greater jeopardy today from outside influences than it has been since the birth of the Republic.

We Americans have come to regard democracy as an established, dominant fact in this world. Yet, neither in terms of duration (as judged by the perspective of history) nor in numbers of adherents, has democracy permanently or universally established itself, although we know it is the best form of government yet devised.

There are in the world some 2,400,000,000 humans. Of this number only 600,000,000 derive their culture and their philosophy, their religious ideals, and their way of life from the same sources that gave us our civilization—Western Europe. These peoples of Europe, the British Isles, Australia, North and South America, parts of Africa, and those in the Southwest Pacific who have embraced democracy, together with ourselves, constitute the bulk of those who believe in democracy or who have been able to give it stable life in their native lands. Two hundred and fifty million of these people exist today in Western Europe under the guns of a colossus that says that communism and democracy cannot live in the same world.

It has never been the policy of our Government to attempt to drive the Soviet system from its birthplace. Our Government has never taken the position that it cannot live in a world where communism exists. However, the Communists view with alarm every manifestation of freedom, and repeatedly proclaim that communism and what we call democracy cannot exist together. Particularly do they proclaim the impossibility of the coexistence of communism and religious principles of any sort or type. They reject such virtues as meekness, humility, charity, love of neighbor, and the Golden Rule. The trials of Cardinal Mindszenty and the Protestant clergy of Bulgaria and the present antireligious activity in Czechoslovakia are among the most brazen and ruthless attacks upon God and upon religion that have been witnessed in many centuries.

Now all thinking Americans know deep in their hearts that the surest and most effective countermeasures we can take in this country to combat the godless propaganda of the Communists is to create here upon our shores the fullest and finest flowering of true democracy and real equality. We know that if people are free they are equal, but that without equality there can be no true freedom. That applies to all—Protestants, Jews, and Catholics; Nordics and Latins; Negroes and Orientals.

The members of this conference are not unduly alarmed about interracial and intercreedal conditions in the United States today. We recognize the very great progress that is being made toward understanding and mutual respect. We believe, however, that through public diligence and public awareness of its importance the progress now being made can be accelerated.

There is a new attitude on the American scene about which I would like to speak for a few moments—one that truly disturbs me. And that is the attitude of defeatism about America's military and economic posture, an attitude that must give very great solace and comfort to the men in the Kremlin.

In government, self-criticism, and I mean public self-criticism, is the mark of a dynamic, progressive democracy, the real antidote for political dry rot or inefficiency. Today in Washington, a great deal is being done to question, examine, and perhaps to improve our public affairs. Such examination is welcomed by every public servant worth his salt. However, I call to your attention the very great difference between self-criticism that seeks for improvement and blind pessimism that looks at only one side of the ledger.

There is some talk and feeling in this country today that seems almost foreign.

What is the faith of an American? It varies from man to man, and from woman to woman, and with each man and every woman, it varies from time to time.

With some, it is faith in our manhood. With some, it is faith in our moral or political leadership. With some, it is faith in our industrial potential. With some, it is a faith in God coupled with a belief in free democratic institutions and actions.

But whatever that faith is, wherever it comes from, whatever its basis, it is the hallmark of every real American. An American is the one person in the world who is distinctly out of character when he dons the black robes of defeatism and hastens civilization on its rush to ruin.

Of course, we face a formidable challenge from a power that holds in thrall the largest organized group of manpower in the world. Yet, the entire history of the development of the freedom of the individual and the creation of what is now the Western World has should work and at what wage; and to remove further limitless amounts from his wage in taxes.

Let them not alter the label on the poison bottle. Let them call it "necessary," but let them not call it "new." Let them call it "expedient," but let them not call it "progress." Let them say we no longer deserve the right to think and act for ourselves, but let them not say this is to preserve our "freedom."

Could it be?

Is it yet possible that history might be altered?

That the American people will awaken in their comfortable parlor-car seats, look out the window, and realize in time that somewhere back there the Freedom Train got off the track.

That we switched off the main line and turned left.

And kept turning left until we're headed back to where we came from.

Could it be that we may yet shake off the leg iron someone locked on while we slept, and seek out the engineer?

And demand—with the courage of barehanded men—that he get us back on the high road. Now.

That if any bandits think they can stop this train, they can come shootin', but we're not going to be wrecked or returned to serfdom by our own frock-coated crew.

And I'll tell you something.

If we all left the parlor car and got back to competing to see who could shovel the most coal—nobody could even catch, much less wreck—this train.

Then the American historians of some distant tomorrow might write, as Governor Bradford wrote, "Any general want or famine has not been amongst them to this day."

Could it be?

No.

Free men—free to do anything—are also free to do nothing.

And apparently that is our choice.

We said we no longer wanted opportunity.

We wanted security.

And they gave us chains.

And we were secure.

So, when some future Gibbon writes, "The Decline and Fall of the American Empire," let him be honest.

Let him say the great new system of government called free competitive American capitalism brought forth such bountiful harvest of all good things, that the people, grown fat—grew lazy.

And their leaders, instead of destroying their enemies, copied them.

And history's shining hour came to an end.

The Book of Kells

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following interesting article from the Sunday Star, March 18, 1951:

THE BOOK OF KELLS

One of the most beautiful things in the world made by human hands is the ancient Book of Kells. Created by the brothers of an Irish monastery about the eighth century after Christ, it now is the principal treasure of Trinity College in Dublin. Thousands of pilgrims have gone there to gaze upon its delicately illuminated pages. The text is the four Gospels of the Vulgate. It was lettered and decorated with a precision unexcelled in any similar work at any place or any time. The geometrical symmetry of the entire volume has been compared to a single breath of celestial song. Examining its loveliness, one takes pride in sharing the devoted humanity of the unrecorded artists. Their names are lost, but they were men to make all men glad to be men.

Kells was called Ceanannus a thousand years ago. The retreat where the book was put together was pledged to Saint Columba. It was founded in 550, and it drew scholars like the proverbial magnet through 30 generations. How great was the wisdom of the friars is proved by the variety of their subject material. Their learning embraced everything—all classes and conditions of people, a vast menagerie of animals and birds, flowers, inanimate forms of reality, and much that simply was imagined with rare poetic artistry. The 678 pages the monks compiled are an encyclopaedia of the universe. Their faith was an ardent force, reaching from the dust to the stars, conceding no barrier to the power of their love for the Master Artist.

The brothers were deliberately all-inclusive. Their work shuts nothing out. Within it all forms are interlaced. The book assembled at Kells is as closely knit as a good tapestry or a good carpet. Some hint of distant Byzantium may be discovered in the designs, yet they are as Irish as Ireland. Their colors are as brilliant as the rainbow even now after a whole millenium. Perhaps it was because of the challenge of this circumstance that all early attempts to copy the volume fell short. The version produced by the Urs Graf-Verlag in Berne, Switzerland, in recent months represents the best skill available in Europe in our day. An example of this edition is the gift of the Government of Eire to the Library of Congress. Sean MacBride, Irish Minister of External Affairs, made the presentation. Dr. Luther H. Evans, Librarian, received the precious offering and expressed the gratitude of the American community for it. The book is a tie of a sort between three as yet free nations—Ireland, Switzerland, and the United States.

Address of the Honorable John L. Sullivan, Former Secretary of the Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago, February 27, 1951, to be exact, the Honorable John L. Sullivan, former Secretary of the Navy, delivered an address in Shreveport, La., at a luncheon held under the auspices of the National Conference of Christians and Jews. Mr. Sullivan said so many things in that address that should command the approval of all of us that I have asked leave to include his remarks in the RECORD.

John Sullivan was known to Members of Congress as one of the most capable, efficient, and patriotic Secretaries who ever directed the Department of the Navy. He was a strong man and commanded universal respect in that position as well as in other Government positions which he held in many years of public service.

His endeavors outside the Government add to the high respect we have for him. He has been intensely active with the National Conference of Christians and Jews. He has been outstanding among Americans because of his contribution to the most worthy movement to implement the principles of brotherhood.

I hope my colleagues in the House will read carefully the message on brotherhood which John Sullivan left with those who attended the luncheon in Shreveport. His address follows:

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE JOHN L. SULLIVAN AT THE LUNCHEON UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS AT THE WASHINGTON-YOUREE HOTEL, SHREVEPORT, LA.

I want to tell you how delighted I am to have this opportunity to visit your dynamic, growing city of Shreveport and to meet with so many outstanding citizens of this great city.

The work you have done in the advancement of intergroup relations is known far outside the confines of this State. For your progress in this mission, I extend my congratulations not only to you but to Centenary College and its president, Joe Mickle, who have rendered such valuable assistance in this endeavor.

Here in Shreveport with your oil and gas, your agriculture, your cattle, and your lumber, you have a sound and diversified basis for a continuing prosperity. Together with the fine Barksdale Air Base at Bossier all contribute to the stability and zest of living in this most pleasant city.

The only thing about my visit here today which I regret is the absence of my good friend, Congressman OVERTON BROOKS. I have known Congressman BROOKS ever since 1939, and during my years in the Treasury and Navy Departments I have had a first-hand opportunity to watch him work and to evaluate the contribution he is making to the affairs of our Federal Government. I know that all of you know him and like him. I can assure you that if you had had my opportunity to work with him closely in Washington, you would be even prouder of him than you are now.

I talked with Congressman BROOKS just before leaving Washington, and I am very happy to extend to you, as he requested me to do, his very warm and cordial greetings to all of you here today.

We meet here under the auspices of a truly great organization, an organization which last year afforded me the opportunity of engaging in the most rewarding work I have ever known. I am convinced that there is no peacetime work in which civilians can engaged that contributes so much to the present welfare and future security of our country as the implementation of the principles of brotherhood.

My activity in this work started at a luncheon in Washington on Armistice Day, 1949. That day we heard a stirring address by the President of the United States. He started by saying, "I have just come from the National Cemetery at Arlington where I have laid a wreath on the grave of an American hero, the unknown soldier. I do not know, and no real American cares, whether that man was a Protestant, a Jew, or a Catholic, whether he was black or red, yellow, or white." Later in this address the President warned us that the issue of our times would lie between those who believe in a Divine Being and who look upward for guidance, and those who—denying God—worship materialism, and look downward to the earth for the things which it produces been achieved against seemingly overwhelmingly powerful tyrannies. If the odds against the free world are today greater than ever, you must remember that so, too, are our means of resisting and our will to resist.

Why, then, do so many of our fellow citizens adopt the helpless and hopeless point of view?

The focal point of the world's troubles today is Korea. But it is merely a happenstance that it is Korea and not any one of a half dozen other places. Realizing what Korea is costing us in the lives of fine young men and the disruption of our economy, some people are today questioning the wisdom of our decision to resist aggression in Korea. Regardless of the outcome of the Korean campaign, there will never be any question in my mind but what the United States made the only decision it could have made under those circumstances.

It so happened that I was in Europe at the time of the crossing of the thirty-eighth parallel by the North Koreans. Within a period of 6 days I was in Rome, Paris, Frankfort and London. You will recall that following the invasion there was a hiatus of 48 hours during which our Government very properly went through the procedures of the last-resort provision of the United Nations Charter. During those 2 days you could see the confidence of Western Europeans in America melt like butter in the noonday sun. On all sides they said: "Here we go again. After World War I your President Wilson conceived the League of Nations. We all joined it in an effort to secure a just and enduring peace. Then, after we had gotten in, America turned her back on us and left us holding the bag. It is only 5 years since you started the United Nations, and here, when the first real test comes, when there is a clear and cruel case of aggression, you don't fight, you don't even make a statement." I can tell you that things looked pretty grim, and I am sure that had that continued for another week or 10 days Western Europe would be lost to America for generations and that the cooperation we are now receiving from the Atlantic Pact Nations could never have been achieved.

However, 2 days after the invasion of Korea the President of the United States announced our resistance to aggression in such clear and unmistakable terms that the peoples all over Western Europe were lifted from the depths of despondency. Never have I seen such a change come over large numbers of people. You could see it in the face of every man and woman you passed on the street.

It must be remembered that at no time since the death of Napoleon has there been a catalyst to unite all peoples of Europe in a common front against a common foe. I am not at all sure that the Communist action in Korea is not serving as that catalyst. I believe that there exists today a greater potential opportunity to weld the peoples and governments of Western Europe into a stanch bloc of defenders of democracy and freedom than has existed in the last 125 years.

We started to fight in Korea as we had to. Our forces were greatly outnumbered and in fact there were few combat troops in that area. But once we became organized and landed at Inchon, things took on an entirely different aspect. Then came the disastrous defeat and retreat of late November. That is when the second guessers went to work. That is when a great many Americans forgot that the United States of America is at the peak of its power, the strongest country in the world. They began to exalt our enemies as superdemons and to discount and downgrade the finest fighting men in the world—the American soldiers. What a spectacle this must have been for the United Nations representatives of the other countries of the world. Just think of what it must have done to their confidence in America when they saw that Americans were forgetting their own potential power and the majesty of our mission, and thinking only of the price it was costing us.

I would like to go on record here and now as affirming my complete confidence in the professional soldiers and sailors who are today guiding the destinies of our Army, our Air Force, and our Navy.

Throughout my life I have been particularly fortunate in my associations with my fellow men, in college and law school, in the practice of law, in business, and in the Government. However, for 4 years I had the opportunity of working very closely with the officers of the Army, Air Force, and Navy, and I want to tell you I never met a better group of men in my life.

We have heard a great deal of criticism since VJ-day about the graduates of West Point and Annapolis. I tell you that, in my opinion, if the alumni of West Point and Annapolis as a group were compared with all of the alumni of any college or university in this land, the comparison would be far from favorable to us civilian alumni. In like manner, I believe that if we were to compare all of the regular officers of the Army, Air Force, and Navy with all of the civilians in any given profession or line of endeavor, the results would be equally startling.

With the sole exception of those who have consecrated their lives to spiritual leadership, I know of no group of men who lead such dedicated lives or make such sacrifices in their profession as the regular officers of the armed services. I think we should all thank God that the future security of our country is in the hands of these men. They are the best I have ever met.

Fighting under their command and backed by the production of the greatest industrial power in the world is the youth of the Nation, young men who know the value of that for which they fight. Victor Hugo once said: "Nothing in this world is so powerful as an idea whose time has come." The youth of America know the full value of democracy and freedom, and they know that now our hour has come, and that we must stop every effort to spread communism further by forceful means, or we will be isolated and left to fight, and perhaps lose, alone.

Science has made great contributions to American armies and military proficiency. Yet, neither radar nor the proximity fuse, the atomic bomb or the guided missile is America's secret weapon. I know that every commander in the armed services agrees with me that the secret weapon with which America won World Wars I and II and the greatest weapon we have today is millions of the finest young men this world has ever known.

They are the best because they have seen democracy at work and they know that after enjoying the freedoms and the equality of America, life for them under any other system would not be worth the living. Those men on the battle lines in Korea have seen democracy and brotherhood at work, and they know it is worth fighting and dying for. In these crucial times when men as well as nations are being tried for size, the least we civilians can do is to acquire a faith to match that of our men in combat.

In no way do I try to minimize the seriousness of the situation. But America has survived a great many crises in the last 176 years. I think we will survive this one.

In the words of the poet, Stephen Vincent Benet:

"We made this thing, this dream.
This land unsatisfied by little ways,
Open to every man who brought good will,
This peaceless vision, groping for the stars,
Not as a huge devouring machine
Rolling and clanking with remorseless force
Over submitted bodies and the dead,
But as live earth where anything could grow
We made it and it's ours.
We shall maintain it. It shall be sustained."

Not Illegal, but Wrong

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the President does not reflect the thinking of the vast majority of the American people when he intimates that legality should be the sole test in determining the faithfulness or faithlessness of a public servant. He should clean house at once in his official family in the light of the shocking disclosures which have been made in congressional hearings. If he does not act promptly, Congress should move without any regard to the question as to whose toes are stepped on.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include two editorials from the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle and one from the Rochester Times-Union.

The editorials follow:

[From the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle]

NOT ILLEGAL, BUT WRONG

"Why," asks a correspondent of this newspaper, "is it up to Congress to ferret out the crooks, parasites, and subversives in the executive branch of the Government? Have you noticed that most of the sensational proceedings against such offenders have resulted from congressional action? Congress uncovered the Garsson brothers, Andy May, Benny Meyers, John Maragon, Alger (Red Herring) Hiss, and William Remington."

It is a good question, given more point by the current interest in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation investigation. The revelation of misused influence, of mink coats and luxury room hotels speaks loudly of a Government owning an easy morality and a great complaisance toward wrongdoing that stops short of violating a law. It is easy to believe that the Federal Bureau of Investigation, a Government agency, knows of many such violations of moral codes. Yet, operating under the Department of Justice, it is not a prosecuting agency. The Department of Justice, headed by a political appointee, has shown little concern over much wrongdoing which is just short of illegality.

Here lies the harm: It is the official contentment with behavior which is improper, but cannot be branded specifically as illegal. It is behavior which any man, unless utterly devoid of conscience, would recognize as wrong. It is the sort of behavior which would end quickly any employee's usefulness to a business concern. It is the sort of behavior which would make a man a neighbor to be avoided. It is the sort of behavior which cannot be tolerated in a government, supposedly acting for the good of all citizens.

If the Presidency will not act to rid itself of bad characters, if the Department of Justice is prevented from clearing them out, then we hope Congress, much maligned Congress, will continue to rout the unfit in its own slow, expensive way. Let it keep on the trail of the RFC, and then let it go after some other agencies which offer promises of easy money for the unmoral.

VALENTINE DISCLOSURES SHOULD STIR COUNTRY

The usually mild-mannered Dr. Alan Valentine let loose in Cleveland with some blunt truths about affairs at Washington that must have relieved his own soul and ought to have a tonic effect on the conscience of the country. What he said ought to be published across the Nation, studied in every home. For he pictured, more plainly and bluntly than anyone else has yet, a steadily deteriorating moral climate in Washington that is spreading contagion and actually creating a threat to free government.

In an adjoining column we print excerpts from this notable address.

As economic stabilizer in the early days of the defense mobilization program, during which he butted his head against walls of confusion and recklessness, Dr. Valentine got a close view of the whole stewing mess. He reports now on the patronage, favoritism, pushing and jostling that have created "a government within a government," and as such is almost beyond the control of President Truman and other top men. "Patronage," he said, "has become not a means of life but an end in itself to a political machine which has been too long at the trough."

Never in the Nation's history, said Dr. Valentine, "have such third-rate standards and objectives flourished so openly or been more generally accepted and more loyally defended."

This tolerance of the mediocre "began long before the present administration, and Mr. Truman has inherited a downward trend in political morality."

There are signs that the public is awakening to the seriousness of a state of affairs that has been likened by one Senator to the Teapot Dome scandals. The disclosures about the Reconstruction Finance Corporation alone are enough to disgust any ordinary conscience. Among the sheen of mink coats and of White House favorites controlling millions of dollars in loans, of lawyers getting $21,000 fees for having the inside track with the RFC, of the unbelievable favors granted to individuals with the right contacts, and so on and so on, the level of morality has sunk to the gutter level. It is no better because most of the deals were technically legal.

Never before did influence-peddling flourish so openly and with such complete tolerance by high Government officials. President Truman, personally honest and well-intentioned has scarcely lifted a finger to stop a downward cycle that is slowly but surely dragging his administration to disgrace. Except to discount the reports of those who know what is going on, he has shown almost no interest. Yet, says Dr. Valentine, "only President Truman can demolish this second and unofficial government * * * and drive the money lenders from his own temple."

This government within a government, made up of patronage and favoritism and plain graft, is playing fast and loose with the people's money. It is nullifying the efforts of Chief Stabilizer Charles Wilson and Director of Controls Eric Johnston to stop the dangerous inflation that is making the dollar smaller and smaller. It is sticking a knife into the heart of our whole defense program.

If Alan Valentine's warning is heeded, if the message can be spread, he will have performed a greater service to the country than he could have done in his recent public office. By this speech he has gained stature.

PRESIDENT CAN CLEAN UP MESS

It was only 18 months ago that the Nation was being regaled by tales of deep freezers distributed among the elect, including the President's wife, by Maj. Gen. Harry Vaughan, the President's blustering military aide.

There has been scarcely enough time to get a minor character in that influence-peddling cast into jail for his perjuries. John Maragon, the Kansas City bootblack who rose to influence and wealth as a hanger-on in Vaughan's entourage, has finally lost his appeal and will serve 8 to 20 months.

Now the Fulbright committee has found a bigger swarm of flies gathered around a larger barrel of spilled sugar.

Senator FULBRIGHT (Democrat, Arkansas), didn't start out to send anybody to jail. His committee, composed of Senators of extraordinary competence, had looked into the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for 2 years and decided it needed drastic shake-up and overhauling. The President remarked that the committee's report was asinine. All the reconvened committee hoped to do was to show that it wasn't.

What started out to be merely a demonstration that an influence web wove back and forth from the White House to the RFC and thence to marginal characters in need of Government money, turned into a sickening revelation of the deterioration of moral standards in public service.

The details need not be repeated here. But they involve directors of the RFC, men whose nod can dispense public funds, and at least two employees of the White House, one, Donald Dawson, the personnel adviser to the President, whose wife is custodian of RFC files.

After a week of this, Senator FULBRIGHT is beginning to want some fresh air. "I never heard," he says, "so much lying in my life."

But a few more sentences for perjury aren't enough. What deeply moves Senator FULBRIGHT are the doubts his investigation have raised about the general moral level of government. He proposes a broader inquiry of the whole executive branch.

It may come to this, but it need not. The President can clean up this mess himself. He could have done so 18 months ago when the preposterous Vaughan was explaining his Missouri morals to a congressional committee.

The standards demanded in public service and the moral tone of any administration are set by the President himself. You don't get higher standards by riding along with a favorite poker companion no matter what he does outside poker hours.

We are entering a period when larger sacrifices will be asked of everybody and when more and more people will be going to Washington to ask exceptions to general rules. The people have a right to expect that these decisions be made on their merits, without favoritism, influence rings or payoffs.

The President can give them that assurance by acting on his own—now. He is still the boss. He should know what to do.

What Americanism Means to Me

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 28, 1951

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, the junior chamber of commerce at Itasca, Tex., has sponsored a very praiseworthy contest for the high-school students of their city which has resulted in these young people thinking and writing about Americanism. The JayCees, the teachers as well as the parents who encouraged the students to participate in the contest, and the newspapers in the area who publicized the contest are to be commended for their efforts.

Miss Pat Brown, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. C. Brown, wrote the winning essay entitled "What Americanism Means to me," and under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include this essay as I sincerely believe that this young lady has experienced what Americanism really is:

WHAT AMERICANISM MEANS TO ME

(By Pat Brown)

Just what does Americanism mean to me? It means the American way of life. What is the American way of life? It is the Sunday funnies, hot dogs, and cokes at a ball game, a democratic government, our own desires, and our own ways of expressing them, the hills, plains, crops, farms, lakes, rivers, oceans, the blue of the heavens that seem a little bluer because it is America, the cars and the intricate web of our highways, the flag and what it means to me, our homes, parents, and our God.

In the words of the song, "America," we get a clear picture of what America meant to its author.

"My country 'tis of Thee"—even in those five small words we detect the real reason America was founded. The yearning for real freedom of worship brought the Pilgrim fathers to the shores of our paramount nation. Religion or their beliefs in the Almighty God enabled them to withstand the horrors of hunger, pain, fear, homesickness, and countless other disastrous events that mapped out that first, history-writing winter. As always the magnetism of God's almighty love brought them through. It was part of this life-giving love that encouraged them to make friends with the Indians, who in turn taught them the first principles of agriculture. All of these supreme sacrifices were made and met with the supreme love of our Almighty God in their hearts. His love for them brought them through this so-called "valley of the shadow of death." So, first of all, our country was founded on a firm, stable belief in God. Thus, Americanism means Christianity, love, faith, hope, all of these being achieved through God's love for us and our love for Him.

"Sweet land of liberty"—how many times do we think of the sweet, poignant liberty that our country provides? Where else can you get the things that our gigantic way of life provides? Yes, the serenity of the gently rolling foothills of our own community reflect a sweet, peaceful feeling. It is here for us to enjoy, here to appreciate, here for food for thought. It is a part of our own land, a land surrounded by countless advantages and pleasures if we would only heed them. Even here in Texas, only a part of our vast Nation, the land and liberties are endless, ever rolling in ceaseless splendor. Yes, Americanism exemplifies a "sweet land of liberty."

"Land where my fathers died." Why have so many gallant American men, and yes, women, too, given their lives so unselfishly for the United States of America? A life is not something easily gained, but it is easily lost. I never have been called on to sacrifice my life for anyone or anything, yet, but if I had my choice as to why I should give my life, I would choose the portrayal of Americanism as have so many countless others. I would gladly die to preserve the American way of life or to even impress its immense qualities on the mind of some unfortunate person, who has not enjoyed its advantage as I have. Yes, Americanism must be something pretty big to affect countless millions of men and women like that.

"Land of the pilgrims' pride." Pride, it is a small word to have such a very great meaning. Our pilgrim forefathers had a never-wavering pride for this, then unborn Nation. So, why should not we, as present-day Americans, not fairly burst with pride for America, Americanism, our way of life?

"From every mountain side, let freedom ring." That has been the cry for many centuries, end upon end. Here in America, ever since the first group of colonists came over and settled on the shores of our Nation, the cry has been "freedom." It was heard at Lexington, Concord, Valley Forge, San Jacinto, the Alamo, and in countless countries of the world where the Americans raised their flag in liberty for the embonded, maltreated people of the world. On the beachheads of both World Wars I and II the cries of our gallant soldiers were heard and some of them were stifled; but still the intense burning in the breasts of people everywhere echo the cry of "freedom."

What does Americanism mean to me? It means the right to worship my God; the origin of our country and how that reflects on us, even today; liberty, the right to sing praises of whomever or whatever I see fit; a land that would merit the sacrificing of one's life for it; my pride and the pride of countless millions; and most of all my freedom. Freedom from want, from fear, religious beliefs, press, and many other freedoms compromise the long, practically endless line of freedoms enjoyed and provided by all Americans, regardless of color, race religious beliefs, or station in life.

This to me equals Americanism.

Economies Before Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER NORBLAD

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 19, 1951

Mr. NORBLAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herewith an editorial by Ed Coman in the Woodburn (Oreg.) Independent of March 8, 1951:

ECONOMIES BEFORE TAXES

The recent request of President Truman that Congress increase postal rates by $287,000,000 in the next fiscal year appears to be another evidence of the peculiar reasoning of the administration. He continues to ignore the recommendations of the Hoover Commission to save some $140,000,000 a year by taking the Post Office Department out of politics, modernizing its organization, methods and equipment and providing greater freedom and flexibility of management. Instead he makes a considerable issue of the second-class mailing rates charged newspapers and other publications—a policy established long ago as a public service to encourage the dissemination of news and knowledge—a policy that has resulted in the American people being the best informed in the world concerning their National, State, city, and other government bodies.

Some adjustment of the second-class mailing rates are justified, but President Truman's suggestion of doubling the rates appears unreasonable. This is particularly true in the light of his recent budget and tax messages to Congress in which he seeks to continue further expansion of his experimental Fair Deal program of extending unemployment insurance, establishing socialized medicine, extension of Federal power projects, governmental housing and nonessential public works, and a substantial increase in Federal aid to public schools. This in almost the same breath with his call to the public to practice the most rigid economies in personal and family affairs to meet the huge increase in taxation required for the military budget.

We believe it is high time that the administration begin studying the economies that can be applied to governmental operations before it looks for more ways to spend the public's money. Before it approves any of the President's recommended tax and postal increases, it would be well for Congress to dust off the Hoover report and put the more important of its recommendations into practice. Then Congress should call a halt to the "spending binge" of the administration, appropriating not one single dollar that is not absolutely necessary for defense and essential services.

We face a grim era in our history and we cannot continue to supinely accept politics and governmental business as usual. We must insist that the opportunity of the American citizen to be fully informed must not be curtailed by short-sighted policies. We must demand efficiency and frugality of all governmental activities, appropriating funds on the basis of necessity rather than desirability. The time to call a halt to the "spending binge" is now.

Elimination of Pollution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following:

"RESOLUTIONS MEMORIALIZING CONGRESS TO APPROPRIATE FUNDS FOR THE ELIMINATION OF POLLUTION FROM THE RIVERS, STREAMS, INLAND AND TIDAL WATERS OF THE COMMONWEALTH

"Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts urges the Congress of the United States to enact forthwith legislation appropriating money to be spent in conjunction with funds of the Commonwealth or any of its political subdivisions for the elimination of pollution from the rivers, streams, inland and tidal waters of the Commonwealth; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent forthwith by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officer of each branch of Congress and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth."

In house of representatives, adopted March 7, 1951.

LAWRENCE R. GROVE,
Clerk.

In senate, adopted, in concurrence, March 13, 1951.

IRVING N. HAYDEN,
Clerk.

Attest:

EDWARD J. CRONIN,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

The Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERBERT R. O'CONOR

OF MARYLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, representatives of the shipping and other industries of the port of Baltimore were privileged last week to hear an able discourse from the distinguished senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], relative to the United States merchant marine.

As chairman of the Merchant Marine Subcommittee of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the Senator from Washington has made a most valuable contribution to the future security and progress of our country by his consistent and able efforts on behalf of United States shipping and shipbuilding.

It has been most gratifying to me to have had the opportunity to work with the distinguished Senator and I can assert most emphatically that the people of Maryland, as well as those in the great States of the west coast, are aware of and are deeply appreciative of the splendid fight which the Senator from Washington has led in the Senate to acquaint the country with the problems facing American shipping and the need for constructive action looking toward the rehabilitation of this industry which has ever meant so much to the economy of this great Nation.

I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered by the Senator from Washington, to which I have referred, be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Last fall your national organization held its annual convention in Baltimore. Because of the press of other business—a reelection campaign—I was unable to attend. So when your distinguished Senator and neighbor, HERBERT O'CONOR, invited me to address your club, I was happy to accept.

We in Congress are fortunate you send HERB O'CONOR to the Senate. In addition to ably representing you, he has a keen regard for the national welfare. This is particularly true on maritime matters. His outstanding service as a member of the subcommittee on merchant marine and maritime matters of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee gives an excellent example of his fine work. I am certain his expert knowledge of maritime affairs was learned along your waterfront in rubbing elbows with shipping men, both labor and management. He could not have picked a better home port for his schooling. Your city is one of the world's outstanding shipping and shipbuilding centers. Many of you contributed time and energy in developing such a fine port. You have every right to be proud of the excellent results.

Last year our maritime subcommittee investigated and studied the problems of the American merchant marine. I believe I can state that we were objective in our approach. We wanted facts that would help in solving the many complex problems. We were not interested only in destructive criticism. Thanks to the cooperation of labor, management, Government, and the representatives of industry and civic organizations interested in a strong American merchant marine, such as your group, I am able to report progress in both the administrative and legislative fields.

Under Reorganization Plan 21, 1950, the old Maritime Commission was abolished. Conforming to the recommendations of the Hoover Report, the President's reorganization has brought a new spirit to the administration of our maritime laws. Admiral Cochrane, as Maritime Administrator and Chairman of the Federal Maritime Board, Albert Gatov, and your fellow Baltimorean, A. J. Williams, have made fine progress in their new work. Given a reasonable opportunity to work out the problems, I believe they can succeed in erasing many of the mistakes of the past.

Perhaps one of the most important pieces of legislation is the provision requiring that 50 percent of Government aid cargoes be transported in American-flag bottoms. During the doldrums in shipping, the requirement was invaluable in assuring cargoes for vessels. Needless to say the adoption of the provision was vigorously opposed by foreign shipping interests supported by certain Government agencies. That opposition still exists. We must be vigilant if we are to retain the principle in future legislation. With the pattern of world trade changing from day to day, we cannot afford to relax. Less than 9 months ago cargoes were short. Today they are abundant. No one knows what tomorrow will bring. You may be assured that I will do everything within my power to have the provision included in the India aid bill and any other similar type of legislation I know that Senator O'CONOR agrees with me.

We were also able to pass legislation establishing a permanent policy for the charter of vessels in the reserve fleet. In prohibiting the charter of Government ships except at times when American flag vessels are not available at reasonable rate and under reasonable conditions, the act assures the shipowner and labor of the maximum employment of the privately owned fleet and fully protects the public interest.

The bill also terminated the authority of the Government to sell ships under the Ship Sales Act of 1946. In the 2 weeks preceding the January 15, 1951, termination date, private operators purchased 131 ships. It is gratifying to realize the purchasers had sufficient confidence in the future of the privately owned American merchant marine to invest their funds in ships. If a further extension of the sales authority were to again result in such substantial additions to the American privately owned fleet, it might be advisable to reopen it for a very limited time. This is a matter it might be well to seriously consider.

The long fight for a more equitable formula in the tolls structure of the Panama Canal also came to a conclusion during the last Congress. The amendments to the Panama Canal Act provide a more realistic and businesslike formula for computing tolls. While the full effect of the formula on the toll structure has not been determined, there is no doubt that the legislation removes many of the discriminatory administrative and accounting procedures which forced shipping to pay an inordinate share of the costs of the canal.

On the west coast certain labor contracts contained provisions for seamen's welfare and pension plans. They could not be put in force because the Federal law prohibited deductions from seamen's pay for that purpose. We are successful in passing a bill to validate the plans.

The greatest deficiency in the Government's handling of maritime affairs is the lack of long-range planning. In an effort to correct the condition, Senator O'CONOR and I introduced and succeeded in having the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee favorably report to the Senate, the long-range shipping bill. The House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee also reported the bill with a do-pass recommendation. Unfortunately, because of the time factor and preoccupation with problems arising out of the Korean conflict, we were unable to get a vote in either body.

Senator O'CONOR and I are still convinced of the merits of the legislation. We have reintroduced the bill as reported to the Senate.

Further hearings appear to be unnecessary. The subject was exhaustively covered in the last session. Many of the Treasury Department's objections to certain of the taxing provisions were met. This time, in the interest of resolving remaining objections, I have asked Treasury for a bill of particulars detailing the points at issue. It is due to be received any day. I am hopeful that as a result of this procedure, we can resolve any differences, at the same time retaining the principal objectives of the act. If this can be done positive action during this session is possible.

In the last two World Wars the intrinsic value of a privately owned American merchant marine was conclusively demonstrated. The facts show that in World War II, 95.7 percent of the arms, ammunition, and supplies for our Armed Forces moved in ships operated by private shipping companies acting as agents for the Government. The other 4.3 percent was carried by the military. The cargoes were delivered directly to the beachheads and supply ports and in many instances transferred at sea. The privately operated civilian-manned ships did everything the military-controlled and manned ships were able to do. They did it with substantially less manpower per ship and at a lower cost. The comparative manning scales for a Liberty ship amply illustrate my point.

The scale on a commercial Liberty including the gun crew was 70, on a civilian-manned Army Transport Liberty 79, while on a Navy military-manned Liberty the crew was 167. The comparative wage costs on a monthly basis were: commercial, $18,471; Army, civilian-manned, $22,097; and Navy, $25,516. The picture has not changed under Military Sea Transport Service operations. For example, a privately owned T-2 tanker operates with a crew of 43, an MSTS tanker, civilian-manned has 48, and a military manned 129, or 300 percent above the commercial vessel. Our subcommittee files reflect other comparable examples.

The World War II pattern continues to hold true in the present conflict. Figures released by MSTS show that for a 6-month period from July 1 to December 31, 1950, 5,500,000 measurement tons of cargo were carried trans-Pacific. Of this tonnage, 3,250,000 tons were carried to Korea and Japan; 2,250,000 tons moved to the South Pacific and interisland. Eighty-six percent of the cargoes were carried in privately operated, American-flag vessels, 14 percent in MSTS, other naval vessels, and a small number of foreign-flag ships. Again, the privately operated ships stood off the beaches at Inchon and Hungnam alongside their military counterparts, doing the same work.

Our greatest problem is scarcity of manpower. We cannot afford to waste it. The people rightfully demand that our military planners do everything to conserve this valuable asset. Necessity dictates the closest integration of civilian skills with military operations. Where, as in the case of shipping, the record conclusively evidences that civilian agencies can efficiently fulfill military logistic requirements at a saving in manpower and cost, the course we must follow is clear.

My position as to the operation by the military of a merchant fleet in peacetime should be well known. I am opposed. Such operations are a definite threat to the basic principle of private enterprise. We must plan now to prevent the occurrence of such an event. We cannot wait until the end of the present emergency. Entrenched power is difficult to displace. If a solution to the question indicates the necessity for legislative action to remove this type of Government competition, I will introduce the required legislation. With realistic planning this should not be necessary. I hope the military will cooperate with me in a program to insure a strong peacetime, privately operated, merchant marine. Knowing many of them as I do, I believe they will.

Our present active merchant fleet plus the mothball ships in reserve are considered by some to be sufficient for defense. This conclusion is not supported by the facts. We have a total active and inactive fleet of approximately 2,700 ships. In World War II we had 5,000 and could have used more. Also the greater percentage of the fleet has an effective speed of not more than 10 knots. Considering the speed of a modern submarine, this is much too slow. All informed persons admit that speed is an important factor.

Of equal importance is the alarming shortage of passenger ships available as troop carriers. In this category we have less than one-half of the tonnage we had prior to the last war. The deficiency has all been well documented. In 1947 the President's Advisory Committee on the Merchant Marine recognized it. More recently the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the several congressional committees considering the problem reached the same conclusion. Here again we have been deficient in long-range planning. But in spite of the uncertainties inherent in passenger ship operations, some companies have had the courage to build new passenger ships. They are to be congratulated for their optimism. That passenger vessels are highly important to our military potential is clearly pointed out by the fact that three out of six new passenger ships have already been requisitioned.

A short time ago I had a very instructive and interesting conversation with a leading British authority on shipping. He pointed out the need for more ships in the event of war with imperialist Russia. He made the point that if the Suez Canal were "knocked out," and this is well within the realm of probability, our situation would be desperate. Access to the Middle and Far East would be extremely difficult. The longer routes around Africa would require more ships. Until enough ships were built India and neighboring countries would be effectively cut off from contact with the West. The present fleets could not supply the tonnage to move equipment and troops to those vital areas. Nor are there enough ships to bring the necessary strategic materials so urgently needed for our industries or those of our allies.

No review, however brief, would be complete without mentioning shipbuilding. The status of shipbuilding has improved in the last 6 months. With the building of the 50 class mariner-type ships by the Maritime Administration and increased activity in naval building, many of the yards on the East and Gulf coasts will be able to maintain a reasonable nucleus of skilled workmen. This is not was transferred to Fort Knox, Ky., then transferred to Camp Custer, Mich. The same year he left for Iceland where he served for 23 months. He was then transferred to England for a short period and then to Northern Ireland where he remained until the invasion at Normandy, France, on June 6, 1944. During the invasion he was cited for the Bronze Star for meritorious service. He was assistant divisional chaplain of the Third Army, Fifth Infantry. He took part in all the engagements of that division in the liberation of France, Luxemburg, and so forth. After the liberation of Metz he took part in the ceremonials of the return of the Bishop of Metz in which he spoke to the liberated people in French and English; also took part in many outstanding activities in Luxemburg and in other cities of Germany.

At the capitulation of Germany on VE-day, May 8, he was stationed in Vienna, Austria, where he and many of his fellow officers and enlisted men received their orders to return to the United States, arriving on May 29, 1945.

Father Prudell has been awarded the Croix de Guerre and possesses the Purple Heart, European Theater Ribbon with five battle stars, the Bronze Star for meritorious service, and several other ribbons for similar bravery.

Upon his return from the European theater Father Prudell was assigned to the Chief of Chaplains' Office at Washington, D. C., after which he was assigned to the Army staff job at Carlisle Barracks, Pa., to prepare the new weekly Army publication entitled "The Chaplains' Hour." This publication was for the purpose of supplying lecture material for the Army's weekly nonsectarian lectures to all troops on morality and citizenship.

Father Prudell's approach to the problem of combating an alarming increase in the venereal-disease rate differed radically from the conventional attack used heretofore by the armed services.

An excerpt from a letter to his father, dated January 9, 1948, states:

A medical doctor and I rewrote the Army's policy and attitude which was signed by Secretary of War Robert Patterson. This directive on discipline and venereal disease became the accepted policy of the Army. In this directive I inserted the clause that chaplains would deliver citizenship-morality lectures as prepared by the Office of Chief of Chaplains. As this policy was implemented throughout the Army, venereal-disease rates went down and attitudes and morale improved.

My contention all along has been that it is not the duty of the Army to change a man after he has received the majority of his training in civil life, but it does have the responsibility not to lower his ideals, and, if possible, to give him continued inducements for better conduct as a good citizen.

Since the unification of the Armed Forces, it is of interest to know that the above program is being rewritten so as to become a policy, not only for the Army but the Navy and Air Forces as well.

After this work was completed, Father Prudell was assigned with a group of 10 Army officers on an Army mission to the far north, which included a tour of Alaskan military installations, Fort Churchill, Canada, Newfoundland, Greenland, and Labrador. This mission was under the leadership of Lt. Col. Hallett D. Edson, of Fort Monroe, Va. The mission was by plane and covered approximately 17,000 miles. Chaplain Prudell was instrumental in bringing about the revision of the Army health program. Emphasis was placed on morality instead of the old scare system. This new system was adopted by Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, Chief of Staff of the Army, after it had been given a thorough work-out at Fort Knox.

Chaplain Prudell is also a graduate of the Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth. He served with the Planning and Training Division Office, Chief of Chaplains, Washington, D. C., and also was post chaplain at Fort Eustis, Va., where he received orders to proceed to Korea.

He was first stationed in Tokyo, Japan, and was titled "The Flying Chaplain of Japan." He said mass at Camp Drake, flew 80 miles to Camp McNair and said mass and then returned to Camp Drake for the rosary, and so forth.

Chaplain Prudell was recently appointed as chaplain of the First Cavalry Division near Tokyo, which was recently announced by Maj. Gen. Robert Gay.

On December 23, 1950, Father Prudell received the announcement that he had been promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonel as of December 5, 1950.

Father Prudell's work on the Korean battle fronts continues to be over and above the call of duty as is evidenced by the excerpts from letters of commendation:

In rendering services so faithfully to our wounded and our dying you have not only brought comfort to those who need it, but have brought credit upon yourself and to the division and have been in keeping with the highest traditions of the military service.

HOBART R. GAY,
Major General, United States Army,
Commanding Officer, First Cavalry Division.

During the dark days of Taegu, the chaplain was present at the hospital until late into the night, covering both this hospital and the Fifteenth Clearing Company, again at Kaesong he was present when the wounded arrived from the front. Whenever he had a few spare moments he held services for the Catholic personnel of the hospital.

Chaplain Prudell has accomplished his duties faithfully, a job well done, for which the officers and men of this organization humbly thank him.

ISSAC J. TENDER,
Lieutenant Colonel, Marine Corps.

Address of Robert E. Sherwood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. F. D. ROOSEVELT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday afternoon, March 6, in New York, representatives of the publishers, booksellers, book manufacturers, book reviewers, and others associated with the book trade met for the presentation of the second annual national book awards. The national book award, sponsored by the American Book Publishers Council, the American Booksellers Association, and the Book Manufacturers Institute, is the first award to have the sponsorship of the entire book industry. It was established in 1950 to honor the most distinguished books of fiction, nonfiction, and poetry written by American authors.

Gold medals were presented to the winning authors at a ceremony attended by over 500 authors, critics, librarians, and members of the book industry from all over the country. Edward A. Weeks, editor of the Atlantic Monthly, presided over the award ceremony. The speaker for the event was Robert E. Sherwood, four-time Pulitzer prize winner.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am happy to be able to place in the RECORD the following excerpts from Mr. Sherwood's address:

Last summer I made a speech at the opening of the PEN Congress in Edinburgh, and my remarks provoked quite a bit of controversy at the time and subsequently. I was frequently interrupted. One gentleman jumped to his feet and shouted that he had come there to listen to a discussion of the drama and not a lot of dirty American propaganda against the Soviet Union.

Among those present was the distinguished Scottish dramatist, the late and lamented James Bridie. I am afraid that Mr. Bridie—distracted perhaps by the heckling—did not pay very strict attention to what I said, for he later quoted me as having stated that all writers should write nothing but propaganda.

Now, I can say stupid things as well as the next one, but I could not possibly have said anything quite as stupid as that.

What I did say is that no sensitive writer of today can be unaware of the dreadful circumstances of the surrounding world. It is only natural for writers, like other people, to yearn for escape. But now we can find no ivory tower that is sufficiently strong and sufficiently remote to provide a safe refuge.

In this connection I should like to quote from one of the finest speeches I have ever read—the speech delivered by Bill Faulkner in Stockholm 2 months ago when he received the award of the Nobel prize. Mr. Faulkner said:

"Our tragedy today is a general and universal physical fear so long sustained by now that we can even bear it. There are no longer problems of the spirit. There is only the question: When will I be blown up? Because of this, the young man or woman writing today has forgotten the problems of the human heart in conflict with itself which alone can make good writing because only that is worth writing about, worth the agony and the sweat."

Incidentally, if there is anyone here who has not read all of Mr. Faulkner's short speech, I urge you to do so. It is required reading for anyone who is interested in writing or the publication thereof. The speech was printed in the New York Herald Tribune book review section of January 14 and in Bennett Cerf's department in the Saturday Review of Literature, the February 3 issue.

I do not agree with Mr. Faulkner that "the young man or woman writing today has forgotten the problems of the human heart in conflict with itself."

true of the Pacific coast. If we are to have a well-balanced program on a sound national basis, we cannot afford to overlook the importance of shipbuilding in the West. The nature of modern warfare dictates that industries be dispersed throughout the country. Nor can we close our eyes to the lessons of World War II when our country was the prime supplier of merchant shipping to all our allies. This came about through an agreement between those two wartime leaders, President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill. The conditions motivating the agreement are set forth in a letter from the Administrator of War Shipping Administration to the chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee on July 27, 1943. I quote:

"After Pearl Harbor, one of the general arrangements made by the President with the Prime Minister was that we, the United States, would be the merchant shipbuilder for our cause, while the British yards would be devoted largely to the construction of naval vessels. In accordance with this scheme, the British merchant-ship program was very substantially reduced. A number of persuasive and compelling considerations dictated this arrangement: First, we had the raw materials; second, we had the manpower; third, we had developed a technique which enabled us to produce in mass and with unbelievable speed a vast tonnage of merchant ships; fourth, the cargo was here in the United States to be moved to the various theaters of war."

The same economic and military factors exist today with greater force. We cannot dissipate any of our shipbuilding potential.

Just a few months ago there was a surplus of world tonnage. Due in large part to the Korean situation, the extension of our military and civilian aid programs and stockpiling of strategic materials, a shortage of tonnage has developed. It has become necessary to use the ships of the reserve fleet. The shortages are most acutely reflected in the skyrocketing rates for the transportation of full cargoes of bulk commodities. Liner rates have remained fairly constant. Considering rising costs, the liner rates may even be at a point where they are no longer compensatory.

To alleviate the shortage of ships available to transport the increased movements of Government cargoes, the Maritime Administration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, is seriously considering operating ships on a general agency plan. To do this a National Shipping Authority has been set up. It is contemplated that the new agency will break out vessels of the reserve fleet and allocate them to private steamship companies for operation as agents for the Government. The program will be similar to that followed during World War II.

The facts which I have called to your attention appear to warrant a general agency operation provided that the operation is limited to Government-owned vessels. I am in accord with the thinking of those charged with administering our maritime laws, there is no necessity to include the privately owned fleet under general agency operations. Such a step would require requisitioning of the ships for charter or for hire. In my opinion it would be justified only in the event of a world conflagration. In the light of our past and present experience, I believe we can all agree that the Maritime Administration is the logical department to operate Government owned or controlled merchant type ships under a limited or unlimited general agency plan.

A Government general agency operation, even though limited in scope, will inevitably interfere with normal shipping operations. If it is not equitably administered there is grave danger the entire industry will be disrupted.

The policies governing agency operations in World War II worked well. Conditions then and today are materially similar. I am advised the Maritime Administrator contemplates adopting similar policies. In any event I am convinced that in allocating vessels or cargoes priority must be given to those companies which are engaged in operating only American flag vessels. Most of the responsible shipping representatives and unions will agree with me that such companies should take precedence over those which also operate vessels under foreign flags. This is particularly applicable under limited agency operations. Further, the integrity of existing services must be protected, particularly the subsidized and unsubsidized berth operators serving the essential trade routes. It would be ruinous to the future of the American merchant marine, if as the result of Government operations, regular berth line services were destroyed. Most informed persons agree with me that as soon as the privately owned American fleet is able to transport the emergency cargoes the Government's operation of merchant vessels must end. I have full confidence the administration will follow this course.

With the rapidly expanding need for shipping, a shortage of skilled seamen is developing. Some ships destined for Korea have been delayed because of the nonavailability of seamen in a particular area. The availability of manpower is generally considered as a local problem. Prior war experiences have conclusively proved that this reasoning cannot be applied to the maritime industry. Skilled seamen comprise a national pool. A national policy for deferment of skilled men is necessary if our defense needs are to be met. It is highly important that uniform procedures be set up and that local boards be informed of the facts.

In developing a long-range maritime policy consideration must be given to technological advances. One that may have a revolutionary import is rapidly shaping up in the atomic field. Our scientists report that a submarine engine using atomic energy will be completed within the year. The speed of a submarine with atomic propulsion is theoretically limited only by its construction features. This being so, ship speed as a defense factor is greatly minimized. We may have to convoy every ship if Russian scientists keep pace with ours. Of greater import will be the ultimate effect on the design of ships following the adaptation of atomic propulsion to surface ships. The step from subs to ships is short. I do not wish to hold out the hope the development is just around the corner. But good sense dictates we keep in mind all possibilities. A merchant fleet is costly and expensive. It lasts a long time. Planning ahead is necessary.

On the whole the outlook in maritime matters is brighter. The Federal Maritime Board and Administrator report progress in formulating methods and procedures for calculating construction and operating subsidies. A new spirit of cooperation with the GAO and other interested Government agencies is developing. The new keynote of constructive criticism augurs well for the future of shipping. But a lot of work remains to be done. A well-planned long-range program is a must. We are a great commercial Nation. Shipping is one of the principal cornerstones of our greatness. We must protect it. The Merchant Marine Act, 1936, recognizes the precept this can be best accomplished by a privately owned and operated merchant fleet. It expresses the sound national policy in keeping with our concept of life as a free people. We must strongly resist the encroachment of Government competition in shipping be it civilian or military.

You know the outstanding job the privately owned American merchant marine has done and can do in peacetime or in any emergency that may arise. It is incumbent on you as an individual, as a member of this club and as a patriotic citizen to tell the story. With your help and assistance we can build up a strong merchant marine—the fourth arm of defense.

Father Prudell, Chaplain in Korea, Fights for Men's Souls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in bringing to the attention of the House of Representatives and the American people the outstanding record of a fighting man in Korea, a fellow Milwaukeean of mine, who fights not with guns against a material enemy on the battle fronts but rather against the enemies of the soul.

I am speaking of Chaplain Harold O. Prudell, recently promoted to lieutenant colonel, chaplain, United States Army. Under unanimous consent, I include an account of Father Prudell's outstanding work in the RECORD.

Father Prudell, the son of Capt. and Mrs. J. A. Prudell, Veterans' Administration, Wood, Wis., was born in Manila, Philippine Islands, August 1, 1912. Upon his return to this country in 1915, his father was given a post at the Soldier's Home and he has lived there ever since.

He attended St. Florian's grade school and was graduated from St. John's Cathedral School. He attended Marquette University High School, graduating in 1931. After graduation he entered St. Francis Seminary and was awarded the bachelor of arts and master of arts degrees. He was ordained to the holy priesthood by Archbishop Stritch on June 3, 1939, in St. Anne's Church. His first solemn mass was celebrated at the Soldier's Home chapel on June 11, 1939.

During his vacation periods, while attending Marquette University High School and St. Francis Seminary, he attended the citizen's military training camp at Fort Sheridan—red, white, and blue course—from which he was graduated with high honors and was commissioned a second lieutenant of infantry in 1937. This rank he carried until his ordination to the holy priesthood.

In 1940, at the age of 28, he was the youngest chaplain in the United States Army, and the first Catholic priest of the Milwaukee archdiocese to enter the service with the rank of first lieutenant. He was promoted to the rank of captain on August 12, 1943, and later promoted to the rank of major in 1944.

His tour of service in the United States Army began at Camp McCoy, Wis. He

If Congress and the United Nations will definitely recommend that The Perpetual Calendar be universally adopted beginning with 1956, there should be plenty of time between now and then to prepare the American Ephemeris and other advance publications.

There is no valid objection to the adoption of The Perpetual Calendar, and nothing is accomplished by defending or cherishing our present irrational calendar. We make progress through adopting better methods, and if human inertia and natural resistance to change can be overcome, we may all be able to enjoy the time- and money-saving convenience of having a more useful calendar.

Reprinting The Perpetual Calendar itself creates reader interest and provides a clearer understanding of it. People always like to look at it to see on what day of the week their birthdays and other anniversaries will always fall. It is freely offered for the use of all nations and races, and no permission is necessary in order to reproduce it.

Under unanimous consent, I ask that The Perpetual Calendar be reproduced at this point in the RECORD.

The Perpetual Calendar is as follows:

The Democracies Must Unite to Survive

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. F. D. ROOSEVELT, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to include herewith the following text of an address delivered recently before the Washington Chapter of the Atlantic Union Committee by the well-known motion-picture actor, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.:

THE DEMOCRACIES MUST UNITE TO SURVIVE

Today the free world in general, and the United States in particular, are indulging themselves in the luxury of a great debate, a vast discussion involving the very survival of those privileges upon which the life of our society depends. These privileges are so fundamental in our philosophy that we call them rights, but as such a large part of humanity either denies them as rights or has never heard of them, it is perhaps more realistic to call them privileges. The arguments stem from a common agreement on the need to preserve—and even enlarge upon—these privileges. One of our biggest current handicaps in deciding what and how is of having to advertise in advance every possible line of national action to our potential enemies. When, say, we decide to resist at one point but give way at another, when we decide how many we will requisition for our defense forces and where and how we will deploy them, when we decide what the limits of our economy are, these and other vital military and political statistics are publicly analyzed down to the last decimal point and presented to the rest of the world on a platter. So-called secret conferences and off-the-record briefings of officials, presumably concerned with the Nation's welfare, find their way, all or in part, to someone's favorite column. To make matters worse, divergencies between friendly powers on matters of emphasis and procedure provide our enemies with a good hint as to where allied weaknesses can be exploited. We will certainly agree that these charges against the privileges we enjoy can be written off. They are deductible. We would not, if we could, curtail any one of our freedoms. Decisions arrived at via responsible public and parliamentary argument is still the soundest method of providing an intelligent community with the means of determining, and then supporting, its policy.

Though taking our own habits for granted it must be confusing to less blessed lands, immovably placed in the shadow of a militant tyranny; yet listening to our great debate from afar, to know whose voice means business, on whom to depend, on which side of them lies consistency and purpose. This confusion is, of course, abetted by our enemies. We have seen how the Soviets sneer at our achievements and seek to disillusion the well-founded hopes of friends. Our Puritan conscience obliges us to pause from time to time, take stock of ourselves, and, as at a public confessional, openly acknowledge our own weaknesses and assume a defensive stance.

Surely, we can sympathize with those of our friends who during the great debate hear of proposals to assign what is left of their bodies to a loose fraternity of nations whose strongest member speaks with many mouths, first proposing to stand with them, then behind them, then to withdraw (in the hope of being a "last fortress"), then (the other extreme) to disperse its forces on any front where trouble may start. Promises of eventual success are apt to sound ephemeral and less immediately tempting than peace and a loaf of bread.

If a modern Rip van Winkle were to awake from a 20-year sleep on the banks of the Hudson today, he would undoubtedly be as shocked as was the old Van Winkle of a century and a half ago. He would not, I think, be so shocked by the screaming headlines, the blaring radio, or the publicity seekers. "These," he would say nostalgically, "are but the old methods with new trimmings." What would disturb him is the apparent substitution of American faith and purpose with self-queries of whether democracy's destiny is indeed manifest. He would ask: "What happened? Was a great war lost? Has the productivity of the free world lessened? Are the masses of people restive and worse off? Have the hopes for a fear-free world been dashed for a lack of a champion, for lack of incentive? Whence comes this apprehension at home, this trepidation abroad? Where has the great revolutionary vigor of Magna Carta days, of Puritan days, or the eighteenth century, gone? What has become of the great sense of mission which united the people of the world in the idea of freedom? Why do so many either embrace an old, reactionary idea like Russian communism or are paralyzed by the fear of it?"

Surely our reply to old Rip would be plain: First, we could assure him that insofar as America's resistance is concerned the people are not divided on anything but method, that they are fearful because they know that no one nation or system can stand alone for long and survive, that the American community is more a system than a nation, and that until we are more seriously articulate about our objectives we cannot rekindle that flame in men's hearts which makes for greatness and without which our survival is questionable. Second, we could point out the poignant dilemma faced by other friendly communities, severely bled and weakened by war, which see their homes as prospective battlegrounds for giants—one giant, disciplined and dedicated, forcefully imposing regimented order in dynamic terms, while the other giant, prosperous, content, fearful of discipline and unsure of its goal, proposes more obligations and sacrifices as the road to an unspelled-out freedom. Third, we could remind him that each community, understandably, views threats to its accustomed, or desired, ways of life primarily from the vantage-point of its own interests. These interests are rarely appreciated by its neighbors and friends. On an international scale, the British, for example, look to the security of their home islands and commonwealth; Hong Kong and the Mid-East are as important to them as Panama and Hawaii are to us. The French, for their part, are rightfully concerned about internal insecurity, about welcoming an ancient enemy as an ally against a new one and about their tremendous military investments halfway around the world. The numerically weak but gallant Dutch have global problems vital to their very existence. Each one of us has problems peculiar to his own life and tends to put these first things first, considering his friend's problems only afterward.

These, then, are some of the reasons for our doubts and fears. To understand them is at least a step toward coping with them. We are obliged to recognize the frailties and humanisms of the world of independent nations which are attempting to meet the challenge of a great and ambitious power whose objectives and philosophy are well known. This power and its bonded associates receive direction from a single source and no means are too sinister, too pitiless, to distract its attention from its ends. The forces resisting it are, (a) the United States—also a great power, but whose potential strength is weakened by a deficiency of clearly stated objectives, and (b) the rest of the free world—some strong, some weak, though, as a whole, rich in manpower and resources and culture, but uncoordinated and uninspired. Both (a) and (b) are together far stronger than the combination which threatens them. But our modern Van Winkle would never believe it by the way all these people are kept separated and disunited, internally and externally. He would remember Thomas Jefferson's admonition that a civilization's real greatness depend not on statistics but on the

The dilemma of all writers, young or old, is in reconciling those problems of the human heart with a world state of mind that appears to become increasingly inhuman.

Some of the brutal, barbaric censorship which is imposed on writers and artists of all kinds in the Soviet Union is imposed on writers everywhere. There is certainly plenty of it in this country. It is imposed not by law, not by any arbitrary theoreticians in the White House or the Pentagon Building or even by Senator McCARTHY; it is imposed by inward fear.

It is not necessarily fear that at any moment we may all be fissioned.

It is fear that all of our highest hopes and our deepest convictions may be subject to change without notice.

I believe it is no exaggeration to say that those of us who have lived through the first half of the twentieth century have seen more violent changes on the face of this earth than there were in all of the preceding 50 centuries of recorded history. The only pattern that we have known is a pattern of unmitigated and unpredictable instability and turbulence.

The writer who is old enough has distant memories of tranquillity, of the calm afterglow of the Victorian era, the calm that was forever shattered by the shots fired at Sarajevo.

The young writer may have memories of the apparent tranquillity of the 1920's, but he now knows how utterly phony and deceptive and ultimately disillusioning that was.

As Mr. Faulkner has said, we have known this fear—this instability, this awful uncertainty as to what the morrow may bring—we have known it so long that we can bear it.

Mr. Faulkner's career, and the high honors that he has won and earned, prove that we can do more than bear it, we can eventually conquer it and end it.

Just as we have been sorely tried in this age, we have been greatly tested. I think that the way in which the human race has met that test is sufficient proof of its durability.

In a play that I wrote 11 years ago, at the outbreak of the Second World War, I quoted some words from the Epistles of St. Paul, and I should like to quote those words now: "We glory in tribulation; knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope."

I think that is sufficient text for any writer in the free world today.

The Perpetual Calendar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. FARRINGTON

DELEGATE FROM HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. FARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I am proposing in a bill that I have introduced today the adoption on New Year's Day, 1956, of The Perpetual Calendar devised by Willard E. Edwards, an electrical engineer of Honolulu.

Mr. Edwards has devoted many years to the study of calendar reform. He was born at Chatham, Mass., in 1903. He attended the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the University of Oklahoma where he received his degree in engineering. He later was a graduate student at the University of Southern California. He was called into the service of the Navy during World War II and attained the rank of lieutenant commander. He has had extensive flying and aeronautical experience, and is an expert in radio and telephone communications. He now makes his home in Honolulu.

The Perpetual Calendar of 12 months and equal quarters is regarded by Mr. Edwards as the logical successor to the 13-month calendar proposed 20 years ago by George Eastman of the Eastman Kodak Co. At that time Mr. Eastman was actively engaged in furthering the adoption of a 13-month calendar to replace our present irrational one. He regarded this movement as a natural evolution in modern life and succeeded in getting more than 100 corporations to adopt the 13-period calendar for their internal accounting purposes.

But auditing, inventories, production, dividends, taxes, etc., are largely and increasingly being accounted for on a quarterly basis, and most of these concerns have now returned to the customary calendar system. Thirteen cannot be split into quarters, and a double system of bookkeeping proved too costly and inconvenient in most cases.

Moreover, to the average individual, 13 identical months of 4 weeks each is exceedingly monotonous, and the fact that there are 13 Fridays-the-13th in the 13-month calendar is very unattractive from a popular viewpoint. Also, with the 1st and 15th always on Sundays, this would cause many monthly and semimonthly payments to be postponed or advanced and would often cause needless expense, confusion, and embarrassment.

The Edwards Perpetual Calendar is described by its supporters as the simplest, the most practical, the easiest to use and to remember of any equal-quarter calendar yet offered for adoption.

The Perpetual Calendar has regularity without monotony, contains 26 working days (plus Sundays) in each month, and allows holidays and anniversaries to fall always on the same day of the week, year after year. This is accomplished by the simple operation of removing 1 day out of 365 from the regular count of the week after its adoption.

To begin with, New Year's Day, an already well-known and internationally celebrated holiday, is proposed not as January 1 but as a "day apart." This is like the "extra day" we now have on crossing the date line from west to east, where two succeeding days of the week occur with the same name. This system has been successfully employed at the one hundred and eightieth meridian, for our convenience in reckoning days, ever since 1884 without any apparent hardship occurring to anyone.

This "day apart" in The Perpetual Calendar is thus taken care of painlessly at the beginning of each year, allowing the remaining 364 days to be divided exactly into 52 weeks and into 4 quarters of 91 days each. It also becomes the 3d day of a 3-day week end, since it follows a Saturday and Sunday (December 30 and 31), and it will not interfere with church attendance. This is more practical than having the "day apart" at the end of the year, since such an arrangement would interfere with Sunday observance and cause a 4-day holiday which would be too disruptive to business.

The second day of the new year, a Monday in The Perpetual Calendar, thus becomes January 1 and will always be the first business or working day of the new year.

In fact, Monday is shown in this calendar as the first day of every week, with Saturday and Sunday at the end, where a "week end" belongs. Three arguments for this are that it is a real and natural need of human nature to rest after a period of work, the seventh day was the Biblical day of rest, and in actual business practice the week is already considered as beginning on Monday. However, for those who prefer it that way, The Perpetual Calendar may be readily printed with Sunday as the first day.

In this up-to-date calendar, the month lengths fall into the easily remembered pattern of 30–30–31, and the starting days into the well-known sequence of Monday-Wednesday-Friday, days on which many weekly events regularly occur. The day of the week for any day in the year can be easily figured in a few seconds by remembering "30, 30, 31; Monday, Wednesday, Friday." No other rhyme or "jingle" is necessary to compute any future date.

The first and the fifteenth, important monthly and semimonthly payroll, bill-paying and accounting days, always fall on weekdays in The Perpetual Calendar. This plan thus becomes the most practical one for a new fixed up-to-date international civil calendar.

There is no unlucky Friday the 13th, or Black Friday, in The Perpetual Calendar to worry the superstitious or to deter them from business sales and the signing of contracts. The elimination of this ancient bugaboo will actually help in many businesses. Executives know that a great many people are not willing to sign contracts, buy insurance or transact business on a Friday the 13th. The elimination of all Fridays the 13th on this calendar has been favorably noted and commented on by thousands of people. This is important to businessmen. Even though they themselves are not superstitious, their customers often are.

Leap-Year Day in leap years comes between June 31 and July 1, and is a second day apart, the first day of the second half-year. It is proposed as a new international summer holiday but may also be considered as a second Sunday. This is a great advantage, for if 2 days apart are to occur in any fixed calendar, it is better for them to be rest days than to be working days, both for workers and for business accounting purposes.

The Perpetual Calendar is offered to the United Nations for international adoption as the simplest and the most practical of any 12-month fixed calendar yet proposed. It is an up-to-date civil calendar, entirely suitable for everyday business, social, judicial, governmental, and school use. It has the main advantages of other proposals, but not their inherent disadvantages.

quality of human being it produces. Yet even this commodity is vouchsafed the Western World in overwhelming abundance.

The United States has done a great deal to promote the general welfare—its own and others—and to throw light onto dark corners. To help heal the wounds of two wars and to reinvigorate ourselves and our friends, the American people wholeheartedly supported vast international economic projects, and, in large part, they have succeeded in their purpose. The Marshall plan halted and, in places, hurled back the rapid epidemic spread of the Soviet virus. An increase in material welfare and moral self-respect were pitted against Marxist dialectic. Also, after years of hampering world trade by selling a lot but buying only a little, we made a wise though tentative beginning sometime back toward a lowering of tariffs. We have spurred postwar foreign reconstruction and rehabilitation, encouraged a military alliance in the form of the Atlantic Pact and put ourselves in the vanguard of those who, despite all, will fight for a principle. But, as the potency of today's threat to our survival is unprecedented, as the power and will alined against the things we are pledged to is relentless and as the test to our nerves and patience is wracking, what we have done so far is clearly not enough. Somehow, our program needs greater and more positive definition.

This deadly germ of the Soviet ideology works its way into the blood stream of the free world's body politic. Like crime, it is not enough to punish or suppress it. We must do more than merely contain the Marxist disease. We must eliminate its causes. Only by a positive policy of set objectives, executed by concerted community action, can we hope to succeed. But how can we and our friends take any initiative unless we know, within limits, what we want?

Obviously, everyone prefers a life of opportunity to one of resignation to direction—to be independent and not dependent. Less obviously, do we realize that successful independence requires the cooperation of the other fellow. It is by mutual indulgence and consideration that individual independence can peacefully be practiced. Independence is a proud and heady brew and is difficult to achieve and maintain. It must be based on common interests, exercised by a common authority, commonly supported. Only in that way can the potential of any free fraternity be realized.

Full and comprehensive agreement appears to be a long way off. We have not yet agreed even between ourselves on where or how or how much to resist; nor do we know quite where we are heading for should our resistance prove successful. What are our long-range, future plans? Are we to recreate the past, withdraw to our arbitrary, man-made borders, let dog eat dog? Are the nations of the world again to vie for trade privileges and jockey for economic advantages?

I wonder if we could, perhaps, hope to ease world problems in a way similar to the method we have evolved on this continent, where, for instance, a Texas cattleman has a stake in the prosperity of a Michigan car manufacturer who is, in turn, dependent on the Pennsylvania coal miner who helps support the Ohio farmer? Would it be too farfetched to dream of a time when a Lancashire cotton spinner will share his vote with a steel worker in the Saar, whose efforts somehow relieve an Italian farmer's bad harvest? As the Californian and Arizonian resolve their local differences on, say, water supply when voting on purely Federal matters, would not the free world's welfare be enhanced if Parisians, Romans, and New Yorkers were also to pool their hopes and interests? Could not, to bring the conjecture down to earth, General Eisenhower's burden be considerably eased if he were able to report to one body capable of issuing precise directives with the speed which the situation will require? Could not western diplomats speak and act for one group, with one set of objectives, or is unity of interest and purpose only for members of the Soviet Empire?

Of course, no proud community wishes to be absorbed by any alien one. Our own Colonies, after uniting in revolution, were some time deciding that their interests lay in federation. Though I venture to say that most men now believe in union—at least in theory—they hesitate today when even wider union is proposed. It is less surprising that this should be so abroad than it is here, in the United States.

There is a curious apprehension of exploring and exploiting a basic element of our own greatness, the greatness inherent in our national motto: "E Pluribus Unum." We know our strength lies in unity—our kind of unity, a voluntary, self-imposed and supported unity. Furthermore, circumstances oblige us, however reluctantly, to recognize that only by unity with Western Europe can we achieve the necesary balance of power to restrain the Soviet combination.

Who, then, argues against binding ourselves in all necessary respects to each other? The American? The European? Americans do not ask for empire. We do not seek to impose the American or any other form of government on anyone. It is proposed to create some compatible form of union—a union of basic and common interests. Better yet, it is proposed that, within the Charter of the United Nations, a convention of democratic and like-minded associates investigate the feasibility of setting up an authority which can speak for its peoples with one voice. It need not and it should not, at this time, dot every "i" and cross every "t." It could, as I see it, begin on a purely provisional and limited basis. It would concern itself for a moment merely with exploring the potential advantage and efficiency which such an authority could achieve. Without something of the sort, we can be sure that no amount of national military power or economic sustenance can or will avail us. Without the double-edged weapon of basic common interests and a spiritual urge, we cannot hope to sustain ourselves.

We have seen how the Soviets identify themselves and their cause with the international workingman. Taking the world at large, this has been a fertile field, because when the international workingman's concern is to exist, he sometimes finds it hard to enthuse over a promise of free votes and free speech. We know, by instinct and experience, that there is at once both a subtler and a more dynamic key to the mutual identification of mankind's fate. We must somehow identify our fate with the fate of others, theirs with ours. It is our own lack of emphasis on such motives for policy that affords the Marxist sloganeers such a widely receptive audience.

When we are asked what America is for, let us say that our first concern is for all peoples to live according to their own needs and desires, not as mere numbers in a soulless, totalitarian state. Let us say that we are for a standard of moral decency and behavior for and between all men and nations, not for a life of spying on our families and the distortion of truths in order that the unholy holy state shall survive. Though famously abjuring the use of violence or the threat of it to obtain our ends, we should make it unmistakably clear that should we or our friends be threatened by violence, in any form, we will reciprocate in kind. Let us say that we are for the further extension of economic freedom and opportunity, and for the system by which every man's right to live his life, enjoy his liberties and, armed with basic security, to pursue happiness as he sees it, protected and encouraged by laws of his consent. Let us then trumpet those ideas around the world till they echo and reecho. Then let us expose the great lie which makes slavery and terror appear to be the only hope, the only security and salvation. Let others from far places assert the same theme in their own tongue and take up the cry in a spirit of fanaticism and revolt against the great conspiracy against mankind. After all, this theme is not an American idea. It is as old as humanity itself. It is as old as sin. Man has always fought for one and against the other.

Having well and truly stated what we are for, we should indicate the way permanently to establish it. My own view is that we need a roof under which all men can find shelter. Once having taken into account ancient prides and prejudices, we should take the first step in proposing to the free world the creed of union by which we live. Let us by all means move cautiously. Everyone else will, you may be sure, do likewise. We must first explore what should be done and then what could be done—then do it.

As I see it, members of an international democratic union would, in the common interest, surrender only those facets of national decision required to make the union a recognizable and effective force. To spell it out, the proposers for Atlantic Union ask now only for a convention of the sponsors of the North Atlantic Pact (and any other free countries that the group wishes to invite) to explore together the extent to which they might apply among themselves the principles of a limited federation, all within the framework of the United Nations Organization. The convention would then report back its findings and recommendations to the governments and peoples represented. The union could be established only after those recommendations had been accepted, which, in our country, would require an amendment of the Constitution.

It is important to point out that this convention would not interfere with the efforts we are already making to meet the present emergency. In no wise do I see it is a substitute for existing diplomatic machinery, be it that of the Atlantic Pact, the United Nations, or any other. It would merely investigate the possibility of finding a stronger "situation of strength" in federation by law than in alliance by treaty.

It is true that many deeply ingrained national interests appear at variance. Britain hesitates to commit her precious resources to a continental plan, because she fears an association from which, if it doesn't succeed, she might not be able to extricate herself. France finds it difficult to lead a movement toward European commonality without Britain. America treads gently on the feelings of Latin-America, yet scolds wounded Europe for not seeing all international problems through our eyes. Union is difficult to achieve, but once established it would provide the tangible machinery of pooling these problems on the basis of common interests. The convention I speak of would study the means by which the differences on procedure and emphasis could be reconciled; it would recommend the method by which the democratic peoples can integrate their strength; it would provide the spiritual inspiration for which the mind and soul of the world hunger. We, in the United States, can give the lead. We shall require patience, wisdom, imagination, and courage. We shall have to persevere without hatred or malice. What are we afraid of? Ourselves? The Soviet Empire? Our friends? No, of course not. Then let us take the initiative on all fronts; not only in armaments and economic aid, not only in military leadership, but in concrete proposals for a better life for ourselves and for mankind than any which the Comintern can supply. Let us propose the revolution of all individuals against tyranny of some, let us propose the oneness of mankind, the spirit and the fact of a real and workable association of peoples. The time has come when we must provide these peoples of the world with a vested interest in freedom.

If we are for international decency, let us state it. If we are for the dignity of man, let us profess it. If we are for honest and direct dealings, let us proclaim it. If we are for strength and an ever fuller life through unity, let us build it. If we are for our faith, faith in our God and our fellow men, let us fight for it.

An Attempt To Come to Agreement With the Masters of the Kremlin Abandons Their Victims, the Peoples of the Soviet Union and of Satellite Nations, Who Want To Get Rid of Those Masters Who Now Enslave Them

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, I submit a series of articles which were published in the Milwaukee Sentinel February 26, 27, and 28 on the Russian underground movement aimed at the overthrow of Soviet tyranny. These articles show how the Russian underground could be developed to the extent that it may be possible for the Russians to overthrow their Communist oppressors:

TRIDENT SPREADS WORD TO RUSS OF REBELLION AGAINST RULERS—KERSTEN SEEKS UNITED STATES AID IN MOVE TO OVERTHROW REDS

(By Edward P. Halline)

The Communist land of the hammer and sickle is now seeing the sign of the trident in public places everywhere.

The trident is the sign with which the growing underground resistance in Soviet Russia is showing an oppressed people that there is a revolt in the making, that there is hope they can be rid of the bloody tyranny that has ruled them for 30 years.

An American policy which would take advantage of that revolutionary movement and encourage the Russian people to fight to regain their liberties is being urged by Representative CHARLES J. KERSTEN, Republican, of Milwaukee's Fifth District.

KERSTEN has been in communication with anti Communist Russians in this country and has in his possession samples of anti-Communist underground literature which has been circulated behind the iron curtain by every kind of trick and wile.

The desperate efforts of the secret police have not availed to keep these bitter attacks on Stalin and his tyrannical regime from getting into the hands of the people of Russia.

KERSTEN said:

"In the past 30 years the Communist regime has murdered 40,000,000 Russians. It has put another 15,000,000 in slave-labor camps. There is hardly a family that has not felt the whip or the club of this police state."

REVOLT LOGICAL

To KERSTEN, to many other Congressmen, to the Russians here in touch with the revolutionary movement, the only policy that makes sense is the policy that will help the Russian people overthrow their oppressors.

The vast potential of hatred built among the Russian people by 30 years of suffering hasn't yet been tapped. It must be if America and the Western World are going to win the cold war, say Kersten, Constantine W. Boldyreff, professor of Russian at Georgetown University, Washington, and Prof. Vladimir N. Petrov, Yale.

SEEKS CONGRESS ACTION

So KERSTEN is going to propose that Congress go on record to express its sympathy with the oppressed people of Russia and satellite countries, to say that the governments that rule them are not legitimate governments and to offer every possible assistance to the movement for freedom.

Congress currently has before it a resolution, on Russian relations, introduced by Senator MCMAHON, Democrat, of Connecticut, and other Senators of both parties, including Senator WILEY, of Wisconsin.

REAFFIRMS FRIENDSHIP

This reaffirms the friendship of the American people for all other peoples including the people of the Soviet Union, regrets the artificial barrier that separates them from those peoples and says America desires "neither war with the Soviet Union nor the terrible consequences of such a war."

But then comes a declaration which KERSTEN says will antagonize the great mass of Russians who long for freedom. Here is the wording of the McMahon resolution:

"Although they are firmly determined to defend their freedom and security, the American people welcome all honorable efforts to compose the differences between them and the Soviet government."

SEEN AS VAIN HOPE

To the Russians yearning to be rid of the Red tyranny, that is nothing more than an expression of a vain hope for friendship with a regime relentlessly determined to extend its tyranny over the whole world.

Would KERSTEN's substitute for the McMahon resolution provoke the Communist government into a full-scale war?

"No," says KERSTEN. "Russia would march today if the Communists thought they could win a war."

In last November's Reader's Digest, Professor Boldyreff wrote:

"World war III can be prevented by an immediate and vigorous psychological attack aimed at the enemy's weakest spot—smoldering opposition of the Russian people against their oppressors in the Kremlin. The masters of the Kremlin dread most a movement that will show their victims how to shake off Communist control."

(Future articles will tell how the underground functions behind the iron curtain, how hope is being instilled into the victims of the Red tyranny, how the fighters for freedom are strengthening their cause while waiting for the strategic day to strike off their chains.)

HOW ANTI-RED RUSS UNDERGROUND OUTSMARTS SOVIET OFFICIALS—KERSTEN REVEALS REVOLT TRICKS

(By Edward P. Halline)

In Leningrad a few weeks ago a slightly tipsy worker boarded a streetcar in the central part of the city. He started talking to the guard stationed on board and gave him a drink from a bottle of vodka.

The guard quickly warmed up and a friendly conversation was proceeding when the worker suddenly handed him a package of cookies to have with the drinks. Then the worker got off the car as fast as he could.

The guard, immediately suspicious, shouted an order for his new acquaintance to stop. But the man vanished in the crowd on the street.

Then the guard opened the package. The contents exploded all over the car and out into the street. They were anti-Red, anti-Stalin leaflets put out by NTS (initials of the Russian name, variously translated as National Toilers' Society and National Alliance of Russian Solidarists).

The worker was an NTS agent, and this was just one of the tricks by which the underground makes Soviet officials themselves the unwitting allies in the distribution of anti-Communist literature, said Representative KERSTEN in telling of the revolutionary movement behind the iron curtain.

Most of the literature is printed outside the iron curtain. It is smuggled into Russia and the satellite countries and distributed by every means that will avoid detection.

Copies of the Posev, the Russian anti-Communist paper printed in West Berlin, have been circulated all through Russia, sometimes by use of balloons and rockets. (Posev translates to "sowing" or "seeding time.")

Rockets can be fired about 2 miles. When they land leaflets are scattered. Balloons, too, are loaded with anti-Communist literature and usually they land where the literature will be found.

Plenty of Russians are naturally afraid to pick up or read the underground leaflets, especially in public places, said KERSTEN.

But the fact that such literature gets through shows the people the secret police are far from invincible. This raises hopes of even the most fearful and, at the same time, helps undermine the morale of the police and the Communist officials.

That is the reason for marking the sign of the trident in public places. It is the way a Russian publicly shows his allegiance to the cause without exposing himself to the vengeance of the Communists.

Other Russians may not know who put the sign there, but they know there is another patriot pledged to join the uprising when the time comes to act.

As the sign of the trident spreads over Russia and the satellite countries the psychological effect increases in intensity, KERSTEN has been told by Russian leaders in the movement.

Behind the iron curtain KERSTEN said, the underground is not yet organized in cells or groups. NTS leaders are waiting until the time is ripe for concerted action.

It still is too dangerous to act in groups or even meet in secret. One member, if arrested, can be tortured by the secret police into revealing names and plans. So even the fighters in the underground are not told the names. Their instructions come from the anti-Communist paper printed in Berlin and from the leaflets scattered everywhere.

LEAFLET MESSAGE TRANSLATED

Here is the translation of the instructions to prospective workers in the anti-Communist underground:

"Comrade, friends, if you will read everything written here, and read it again, honestly and sincerely, will think it over, and will decide to take part in the struggle for truth among the people, you are already halfway to victory. The main thing: you will decide to cross the line of lies and hypnotism of Stalin propaganda. If you succeed in doing it, you are already a freeman. Free at this moment within yourself, free in heart and soul. You will see the world about you peace and recognized the hard fact that power can be matched only with power, and that only a strong nation can speak with authority. At the council table as well as in the field "God is on the side of the big battalions." He had no patience with those idealists who closed their eyes to realities and whose rhetorical ecstasies would have and, in part did, strip us of our armed strength. He did not associate weakness with righteousness and saw no reason why the strong cannot entertain and defend high ideals as well as the weak.

Great as were his mental endowments they were fully matched by his political and moral courage. It is doubtful if any Member of either Chamber in Congress during the last 20 years has stood up for his convictions at the peril of his political life as often as has Virgil Chapman. It can be truthfully said of him that he never betrayed a conviction or a friend for the sake of expediency or gain. This firmness and courage attracted and held the thousands of devoted friends who loyally followed him to the end. He had justified their faith in him. This was expressed by one of them on hearing of his death in an old expression of the mountains: "You can swim the river and ride the mountain with old Virgil," the ultimate tribute to his dependability.

A great Kentuckian, a great American, a great human being sleeps in that newly made grave at Paris. May his slumbers be as sweet as the memories he leaves behind him.

PARIS CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, INC.,
Paris, Ky.

RESOLUTION

Whereas Virgil M. Chapman was, up until the time of his death, a valued and esteemed Senator of the United States Senate and a tenacious defender of the political principles in which we all believe; and

Whereas for many years Virgil M. Chapman contributed freely of his time and energy for the betterment of Kentucky farmers as well as farmers in other parts of the Nation, and contributed freely of his time in the interest of all of his constituents; and

Whereas although Virgil M. Chapman was serving his first term in the United States Senate, he had gained a reputation among his fellow colleagues as a man of rugged honesty, high integrity, and intense loyalty; and

Whereas Virgil M. Chapman's associates on the Senate Armed Services Committee and Public Service Committee have lost a man of great intellect and a strong advocate of sound legislation; and

Whereas the city of Paris and Bourbon County have benefited greatly by his lofty purpose and sterling character; and

Whereas the people of the city of Paris and Bourbon County have received an irreparable loss to their community: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Paris Chamber of Commerce does hereby in this manner take official notice of the important facts hereinbefore set forth; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the faithful wife and family of Virgil M. Chapman; and that a copy hereof be published in each of the newspapers of general circulation in this city; and that a copy be transmitted to the United States Senate.

This resolution passed this 10th day of March 1951.

[From the Radio program Americans, Speak Up, March 11, 1951]

Each Sunday afternoon at this time, Associated Industries of Kentucky brings you these interviews by Bill Slater with prominent and loyal Americans in the interest of defending and strengthening our American heritage of freedom.

Death came Thursday to the senior Senator from Kentucky, Virgil Chapman, of Paris. All of us may not have agreed with Senator Chapman's views and opinions on the pressing problems of our time. But Senator Chapman was a loyal American and Kentuckian who had the courage of his convictions. He was a man who would stand up and be counted for the things he thought were right. And he did not hesitate to put the good of his country before his political party.

Associated Industries regrets deeply the tragic and untimely death of a man of this kind. Perhaps as never before, America needs men who stand for principle, men who believe that the welfare of our Nation must not be substituted for political expediency; men who believe that our Constitution and our Bill of Rights are sacred to the American heritage of freedom and liberty.

Jewish Persecution Increasing Behind the Iron Curtain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Jewish persecution is increasing under the Communist rule behind the iron curtain, according to many reports in the press recently. This is in accord with what might be expected under the Communist creed which demands that there be no other gods but communism. Communism is determined to crush all expression of religious and national feelings.

Lenin, in the gobbledygook of Communist phraseology, expressed his hatred of the Jews as follows:

The idea of a Jewish nationality is contrary to the interests of the Jewish workers and engenders in them a feelirg of hostility toward assimilation.

And in 1937 Stalin expressed his hatred more plainly when he remarked to the German writer, Feuchtwanger:

You Jews have created one eternally true legend—that of Judas.

I wish to include herewith recent news items which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor and the New York Times:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of February 3, 1951]

ANTI-SEMITISM REPORTED MOUNTING INSIDE RUSSIA

(By J. L. Teller)

For the first time in Soviet history persons of Jewish faith are apparently in physical danger from anti-Semitic violence.

According to reports from inside the Soviet Union and reaching Jewish leaders in both Israel and the United States, anti-Semitic outbreaks have assumed the size of minor riots in some of the smaller towns in the Ukraine.

Even more disturbing, there have been assaults on individual Jews in such large cities as Moscow, with its 300,000 Jews, and Odessa, with its 100,000 Jews.

COMPLAINTS DISREGARDED?

Soviet officials are reported reliably to have shown indifference to the complaints of the Jewish victims and to have taken no steps to curb the mounting frequency of these incidents, notwithstanding the formal ban on anti-Semitism in the Soviet Constitution.

Benjamin West, writing in Israel's best-informed newspaper, Davar, says there is no reason to doubt the authenticity of reports that Jews have been deported from Russian frontier areas. Since, however, figures on these deportations are not available, reports of mass deportations may be exaggerated.

There also have been new round-ups of Zionists and since Zionism has been illegal in the Soviet Union for more than three decades, the arrested men are not youngsters.

They are judged to be mainly veterans of penal servitude, who were released after 10 to 20 years at hard labor in Siberia, but were rearrested when the Moscow radio and the newspaper Pravda began their attacks, just about a year ago, on Ben-Gurion's Marshall plan government.

KIN TOLD NOT TO WRITE

Israeli residents have received letters from their kin in the Soviet Union advising that they no longer wished to receive correspondence from overseas. The Kremlin had encouraged correspondence with overseas relatives during the war years and immediately following the Soviet delegation's support of the United Nation's General Assembly's Palestine partition resolution, under which the State of Israel came into being.

Israeli newspapers report also that Jewish lay representatives and rabbis are no longer to be seen at official Soviet functions, although it is government practice to invite representatives of all ethnic groups residing in the Soviet Union, and to encourage all clergy, both Christian and Moslem, to attend in clerical garb.

Jewish leaders disagree, however, in defining these phenomena of Soviet behavior toward Jews. Some charge that the Soviet authorities have embarked on an outright anti-Semitic policy, tacitly encouraging every form of persecution against persons of the Jewish faith.

Others are somewhat less drastic in their appraisal. One Jewish leader, sharing the second view, asserted this week in an open letter to the Soviet Ambassador to the United States that while the individual Jew still may be physically secure in Russia, the Soviet Union is apparently determined on spiritual genocide of the Jewish group.

SPIRITUAL GENOCIDE CHARGED

The genocide charge has been leveled by Hayim Greenberg in an open-letter article in Der Yiddisher Kemfer, official organ of the Labor Zionist Organization of America, of which he is editor. Mr. Greenberg is also a member of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Palestine and head of its culture department, and his opinion is highly valued by Israel's top government leaders.

Asserting that he was writing only in his own name, as an American Jew with Russian background, and not in the name of any organization, Mr. Greenberg listed the following evidence of spiritual genocide against Soviet Jewry:

There is not a single Yiddish publication left in the Soviet Union (the former Israel Ambassador to Russia, Mordecai Namid, said there was a Yiddish publication in Birobidjan).

in an entirely different light—as it is, and not as presented to you by that incessant and agonizing 'toothache'—government propaganda.

"If in your soul you surmount that propaganda, you are no longer a slave of Stalin's, but a free fighter in the cause of liberation for your motherland.

"If you decide to take a personal oath to your conscience, when alone think and feel each word of this:

" THE OATH

"'As a true and honest son of Russia, I give my word, and swear truly and truthfully to serve the cause of freedom for my people in the National Toilers Society. I swear in all my actions to be guided by the honor and welfare of my country, sparing no effort during the revolutionary struggle to fulfill the instructions of the revolutionary staff of the Pitchfork (Trident) NTS (The Sign).'

"Then, if you are a believer, make the sign of the cross. If not, go into the field and kiss the earth that gave you life, the earth that is drenched with the blood of our martyrs and our heroes, the earth which you must free. From this moment you are a charter member of this association of the free.

"What are you to do when you set out on the road to fight for liberty?

"The revolutionary staff is sending throughout the country these first battle instructions:

"1. With all means available to you, spread the word of the fight for liberation. Multiply our pamphlets and articles from our news-sheets; compose revolutionary tracts yourself; copy them by hand—using printed letters so that your handiwork will not be recognized; and carefully, so as not to be discovered, leave them where they are sure to attract someone's attention later—in the cars of the trains, in the streetcars and metros (subways); on the tables of eating houses; in offices; and on the work benches in factories. Pin or paste them on the walls of houses and on fences. If you are abroad in the army of occupation, send pamphlets to your motherland. Already thousands of fighters spread our word of liberation in these ways.

"2. Whenever you can, without risk of discovery, draw with chalk, pencil, or lime—or paint—the recognized sign of our association, the sign of our unity—the Pitchfork (Trident) of the people's anger; or draw the letters NTS (which also mean: 'We bring death to tyrants; and: we carry freedom to the toilers).' Do one, or the other, or both. Repeat it. Be not disturbed if at first results are not immediately apparent; sooner or later you will find at the same place, beside your sign or letter, additional signs or letters drawn by other hands. They are your unknown confederates letting you know of their presence. If walking in the street, you see our fighting sign, look to see if no passersby are close, and extend your greetings to your friends by drawing a sign yourself. In order to appraise the significance of this step, remember how such acknowledgment will encourage him, knowing that he is not alone.

"In our motherland, even now in many cities our friends signal, one to another. The 'power,' while it can, conceals all information about the fight against it; but soon it will be able to conceal no longer. Soon throughout the entire land will blink and twinkle the lights of our cause, our struggle for liberation. Soon the fighters will force the 'power' to reckon with us, and then to retreat before the revolutionary force. That day will be the beginning of the end of Bolshevik tyranny. Limit your action, for the time, to limited deeds; but know that from millions of limited actions, great deeds spring."

ANTI-RED UNDERGROUND SPREADS TO RUSS ARMY

(By Edward P. Halline)

Copies of the Russian anti-Communist paper, Possev, printed in the western zone of Berlin, get to millions of Soviet officers and soldiers in Russia, and in Russian-occupied countries.

The Russian secret police, more than anyone else, would like to know how it's done.

The underground edition of Possev has the same format as the Red army newspaper, Sovietskaya Armiya. So once the contraband sheet got into the distribution channels, it wasn't too hard for countless copies to slip through to the soldiers.

STILL BEING DONE

That was first reported last summer and it is still being done in the face of the most desperate efforts by the Reds to stop it, said Representative KERSTEN.

When Soviet officials ordered a Government stamp on all copies of the Army newspaper, the underground issues carried the stamp, too. This certainly is an indication that plenty of Russian Army officers and men are agents of NTS, the Russian underground organization, or at least are sympathizers.

Leaflets going to Russian officers and soldiers in the Soviet-occupied zones of Austria and Germany stress the questions those men must be forever asking themselves.

Why do the conquered peoples live better than the Russians at home? Why are the Russian soldiers not allowed out of their barracks? Why are they forbidden to fraternize with the Austrians and Germans?

LEAFLET SHOWS MAP

An Austrian leaflet in Representative KERSTEN's possession has a map for the benefit of sympathizers in danger of discovery and arrest. It shows the Soviet and western zones of Vienna, the Danube River, and also portions of Czechoslovakia and Austria.

But it tells the anti-Communist Russians not to escape unless it is necessary to save themselves.

"The fighters for freedom in the army and in the motherland are needed more there than abroad," the leaflet says.

That is the type of propaganda the underground is carrying on and with little money or technical facilities, Representative KERSTEN said.

With such a revolutionary group at work, with the great majority of Russians opposed to the red regime, the American Government cannot afford not to profess its friendship for the Russian people and give them every assistance possible, he declared.

WILL UPSET STALIN PLAN

The increasing strength of the underground will upset Stalin's military plans and prevent world war III, KERSTEN said.

A letter from Russian-born Vladimir N. Petrov, Yale professor, told KERSTEN that Stalin probably fears his own people more than the A-bomb. Another Russian, Prof. Constantine W. Boldyreff, who helped organize the underground in 1930, said in the Reader's Digest last November that Stalin fears a revolt more than American rearmament.

Revolt is brewing in Red China, where the peasants who were promised land are facing collectivization, KERSTEN said. And in Russia a new collectivization drive is planned that will uproot 12,000,000 peasant families. Now is the time, he said, for the Western World to take advantage of rising tide of hatred for communism in Communist lands.

The Late Honorable Virgil M. Chapman, of Kentucky

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARLE C. CLEMENTS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD some statements made relative to my good friend and deceased colleague, Virgil M. Chapman. The first is an editorial by Mr. Charles Finnell, writing for the Cynthiana Democrat, published at Cynthiana, Ky. Second is a resolution of the Paris Chamber of Commerce, Paris, Ky., and the third an introduction to a radio program sponsored by the Associated Industries of Kentucky, given on March 11, 1951, shortly after the funeral services at Paris, Ky.

There being no objection, the editorial, resolution, and introduction were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR VIRGIL M. CHAPMAN

(By Charles Fennell)

The death of Senator Virgil M. Chapman was tragic and untimely. He had entered upon a career in the Senate which gave fuller scope to his powers and in which he was fast winning the admiration, respect, and confidence of his colleagues and the country. Had his services continued he would have added his name to the top five or six greatest men that Kentucky has contributed to the public life of America.

He had the finest mind of any man we have known. The scope of his intellectual interests was wide and scholarly. His knowledge of history and of literature was amazing. He could quote from the classics by the hour.

The basic political principal of his life can be summed up in one word—balance. To him the general welfare and happiness of our country depends upon achieving and maintaining a practical balance among the great segments of our economy—agriculture, labor, industry, commerce, and finance. When viewed in this light his political career has the unity and singleness of purpose of a drama. At its beginning in 1924 the industrial, commercial, and financial interest had achieved a domination of the national economy. This had destroyed its balance and had left agriculture a sick economy as President Coolidge called it. Among the victims of this imbalance none were harder hit than the tobacco growers of his district and State whose champion he became.

A life-long friend of labor as another victim of the imbalance, he refused to go along with the dictatorship of the labor bosses when they sought domination of the economy as he had previously fought other such attempts by industry and finance. He knew that their success would be ruinous to all including our laborers. In this he was a truer friend of the laborer than these power crazy bosses. He would have opposed any similar attempt at domination by agriculture for the same reason.

His long-time advocacy of military and naval preparedness sprang from the same principle. He knew that a balance of power among nations is necessary to international genocide now being practiced by Communist dictatorship in its drive to destroy physically, culturally and spiritually the Jewish people, who internationally constitute the most active anti-Communist racial minority.

"This Communist drive to exterminate Jews as a people within the U. S. S. R. and its satellites foreshadows an effort to liquidate other political, racial and cultural minorities."

Harry N. Rosenfield, a member of the Displaced Persons Commission, reported that under the Displaced Persons Act, 220,000 DP's had arrived in this country since October 30, 1948, or were on the way, and that thousands of others were departing daily.

He gave the following distribution on the basis of religious affiliations: Catholics, 98,400, or 45 percent of the total; Protestants, 74,500, or 34 percent; Jews, 44,300, or 20 percent; others, 2,800, or 1 percent.

"In American foreign policy," he said, "the displaced persons program is the symbol of American determination to stand by fighters for freedom; in domestic affairs, the displaced persons program adds to our sinews of strength for arming ourselves and our allies to protect and preserve the peace."

Adolph Held of New York was re-elected national chairman of the Jewish Labor Committee, a post he has had since 1938. Also renamed were Joseph Baskin, secretary; David Dubinsky, treasurer; Jacob Pat, executive secretary; Nathan Chanin, chairman of the administrative committee, and Benjamin Tabachinsky, national campaign director. All are from New York.

The Death of Franklin Delano Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MATTHEW M. NEELY
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The Calvary of the Great," by N. E. Nicoladies, printed in the June issue of the Voice of KEPA, commenting on the death of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON THE DEATH OF FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT—THE CALVARY OF THE GREAT

It is the fate of the great to ascend their Calvary wearing a crown of thorns.

It is the fate of the great, who were born to lead humanity forward, never to enjoy the fruit of their labors. The same fate was destined for our great friend, the helper of those who suffer, the man who loved humanity more than himself, our great and beloved of the people, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

He worked and toiled; blood was the sweat of his brow, his only compensation having been that he did his duty. He ascended calmly his Calvary, the place destined for all those who work and suffer for us, for our liberties, for the morrow, for the future generations.

The whole of humanity, all right-thinking people, those who suffer from pain and privations, who are struggling and distressed, turn their eyes toward the fresh grave of the great humanitarian.

No tears, sobs, or words are adequate to express our pain for the loss of this great man.

The extinct personality of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt was the paragon of all virtue and goodness, kindness and love, of every healthy thought. Since the day he became conscious of life, his concern was how to secure a better life for the future generations of humanity. His whole life was expended in all directions in the struggle for the success of this idea. And, fatally wounded in this struggle, he fell on the eve of the day that the crown of laurel, the only crown that was fit for him, was ready to adorn his work.

His teaching, the beautiful teaching of love and peaceful coexistence of all peoples under one great, homogenous democracy, springing from the people, existing for the people, and working for the people, shall predominate throughout the ages as the most radiant ray of light on earth and as an eternal memorial of the man who taught it. His teaching shall become the axis around which shall move from now on the nations and the communities of the earth which is inhabited by us, whom he aspired to lead to the safest haven of life, the haven of equality and justice.

This lucid intellect, endowed with an enormous strength of tolerance, foresight, perspicacity, and absolute and unblemished justice, was the intellect for which the masses of mortals were waiting for thousands of years.

Rest in peace, our great President. Rest not only from your labors and toil for us, but rest also in the thought that it is no longer possible for those who rule today, and those who will come tomorrow, to overlook the righteousness, the goodness, and the divinity of the direction toward which you guided us, holding us by the hand like a great father of the whole humanity.

You were the greatest warrior of the ages and you fell more than heroically on the eve of the day when the great battle for true civilization, in which you were the protagonist, was to be crowned with the eternal crown of victory and glory.

But the crown of thorns on your brow has deeply wounded you during these years and you succumbed, but not before you laid down the unshaken foundations of the edifice you wished to build. The first cornerstones of the edifice, in which humanity will dwell in the future, shall bear your traces—the traces and the seal of your great personality as a guaranty that this edifice of yours will last forever.

You have been the great statesman, the best head of family, the great philanthropist, our friend, and greatest fellowman. You have been the father of all humanity—of the poor, the suffering, the workers, the orphans, the weak and the meek in spirit—and for them you lived and worked and toiled and gave your life.

Your sermons are destined to live throughout the ages—engraved in gold letters on the metope of the earth.

No words in poetry or prose, in speech or writing, can adequately praise your deeds.

No voice can express precisely what you have done for us. Only the combined voice of humanity—only this united voice—is able to express in two words to you, Oh, great and unforgettable President, something fitting: We thank, we thank you for everything you have done for us, for the peoples of this earth, for those who hunger and thirst for liberty, for the fatigued and the unfortunate, the distressed and the oppressed.

Rest in peace forever, our great President. Your spirit will be our guide from now on. Rest, our great President. A grateful humanity is supporting the load of earth that covers you for everything you have done for it. Hail, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. You have not died. You live and will live as long as the earth on which you were born.

It is your deeds that have carved your immortality.

Farm Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in recent times there has been a considerable amount of unfair criticism in the press as to alleged profiteering on the part of the farmer. In some instances we know that there has been considerable income in the case of large scale farming by a few very wealthy individuals in agriculture. However, that refers to only a very small minority. In the case of the small family type farm which still comprises the great bulk of farms throughout the Nation and in my own State, there is certainly no justification for any allegation that the farmer is profiteering or is gouging the consumer or is getting a disproportionate share of income. On the contrary, the same milk that sells on my farm, for example, for around 7 cents per quart has tripled in price by the time it reaches the consumer. So, obviously the farmer is hardly benefiting from that tremendous price spread; middlemen all along the line are getting the lion's share.

I have in my hands a very illuminating editorial published in the March 15 issue of the Glenwood City Tribune. I ask unanimous consent that its text be reprinted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DAIRY REPORT—CRITICS CONTINUE TO BLAME FARMERS FOR INFLATION

Anyone who reads the large metropolitan dailies and many of the nationally circulated magazines cannot help but gain the impression that farmers are the root of the inflation evil. Every boost in food prices is played up big, and the consumers gain the impression that farmers are waxing rich at the expense of further inflation.

No one can deny that the farmers are receiving slightly higher prices for their products, but who is responsible? Meat prices are high because consumers are eating more meat than ever before and are bidding the price up high. The unfortunate thing is that farmers seldom receive anywhere near as large a part of food price increases as do the processors and the people who work for the processors.

Unless agriculture is to suffer some pretty bad black eyes, there must be started very soon a program to educate consumers. Agriculture is merely beginning to catch up with the boom that never ended for other branches of the economy. Since 1948, the peak year for agriculture, net farm income has dropped, but profits of industry and wages of industrial workers have continued to climb to new peaks in that period.

In other words, farmers' prices have been dropping while the cost of goods farmers must buy has been increasing as a result of higher wages and higher profits in industry. Now that consumer demand, again affected by higher wages is putting upward pressure on farm prices, farmers are being blamed for the inflationary spiral. Labor and industry want to freeze food prices just as those prices are beginning to bring agriculture near other branches of the economy in buying power.

Nothing has been heard, in nearly 2 years, from any of the Yiddish writers in the Soviet Union. Assuming there is no longer an audience for Yiddish publications, surely there must be sufficient interest among Soviet Jews to warrant publication of at least one Russian-language magazine dealing with Jewish affairs for the nearly 2,000,000 Jews in the Soviet Union.

SILENCE IMPLIES GUILT

Mr. Greenberg notes that the Yiddish theater has received no mention recently in the columns of the Soviet press. He asks, furthermore, what has happened to the Jewish schools in Russia, and notes that these questions have been addressed many times in the past to the Soviet ambassadors in various countries, but no answer has been received to date. Their silence must be regarded as implied confession of the charge of spiritual genocide.

The American Jewish Committee has prepared a memorandum on the persecution of religious Jews in Russia. According to this memorandum and testimony from other sources, the few synagogues functioning in Moscow are administered by persons of dubious rabbinical status and by sextons that are party agents. Performance of certain religious rites brands individuals as suspect in the eyes of the party, and instruction in Hebrew is given clandestinely because use of the language is illegal.

The amazing thing is that these clandestine schools, where instruction is largely from memory rather than books, which are unavailable, have produced some brilliant Talmudic scholars, according to wartime orthodox Jewish refugees from Poland who have come out of Russia since the end of the war. Because Soviet workers are granted days off on a rotating basis, orothodox Jews find it impossible to observe the Sabbath.

HUNGARY TO DEPORT JEWS—COUNCIL MEMBER HERE SAYS ANTI-SEMITIC DRIVE IS STEPPED UP

Dr. Bela Fabian, member of the Hungarian National Council, disclosed yesterday that he had received news from the Hungarian underground that the anti-Semitic campaign had been stepped up in Hungary and that preparations were being made by the Communist dictatorship to deport 20,000 persons, many of them Jews, to Soviet forced-labor camps.

Dr. Fabian also made public an article that he will publish in the current issue of the New Leader, liberal weekly, in which he gives details on the ground for fears by members of the council that the anti-Semitic campaign is the prelude to wholesale deportation of Hungarian Jews.

The Hungarian underground reported that it had received news of wholesale deportations to eastern Siberia of "almost the entire Jewish population of the Ukraine, White Russia, and the Crimea," Dr. Fabian said.

PURGING OF JEWS IN SOVIET LANDS DECRIED IN PLEA FOR ACTION BY UN

ATLANTIC CITY, February 16.—The national executive board of the Jewish Labor Committee called here tonight for a thorough inquiry by the United Nations of the cultural and spiritual destruction of Jewish life in Russia and other Soviet-dominated countries behind the iron curtain.

The action was taken by 250 members of the board at their annual conference here after they had heard a detailed report showing that no sign of Jewish life remains in the Soviet Union today and that the spiritual liquidation of the Jewish people in the satellite countries goes on at a rapid pace.

The board, representing half a million persons, adopted a resolution authorizing the administrative committee to the Jewish Labor Committee to present before the Commission of Human Rights of the United Nations all known facts concerning the situation.

Adolph Held, national chairman of the Jewish Labor Committee; Jacob S. Potofsky, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union, CIO; and David Dubinsky, president of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, A. F. of L., were appointed to present the matter to the United Nations.

The report on Jewish life behind the iron curtain and in Western Europe, made by Nathan Chanin, of the labor committee's administrative committee and educational director of the Workmen's Circle, contained the following findings:

Russia: No trace is left of Jewish culture. All Jewish schools have been closed; Yiddish newspapers and periodicals silenced; Yiddish writers have been liquidated; Biro-Bidjan, proclaimed an autonomous Jewish republic in 1926, no longer exists in a true sense.

Rumania: The Rumanian Communist Party is almost completely purged of its Jewish members—68,000 being expelled when the party was consolidated early in 1950. A stop has been put to the emigration of Jews to Israel. Antisemitism has not died in Rumania, nor has the Communist government considered it necessary to conduct a fight against it. In the past 2 years all Jewish schools, synagogues, and newspapers have been closed down.

Poland: There are no more than 50,000 Jews left in Poland. Emigration to Israel has been banned. Zionism is regarded as a crime and treason, and Israel is a hated country, regarded as ideologically bound with the United States and Great Britain. The Jewish community, its cultural institutions, and its religious activities have been placed under the supervision of Jewish Communists.

Hungary and Czechoslovakia: Life is no better for the Jews in these countries than it is in Rumania or Poland.

In contrast, it was reported that the conditions of the Jews in Western Europe were more secure and that there were great expectations that of all the Western European Jewish communities, France would remain the largest. Nearly 250,000 Jews are now in France.

UNDERGROUND BUSY BEHIND CURTAIN—MACHINERY THAT AIDED JEWS IN ESCAPING HITLER AGAIN HELPS OPPRESSED TO ESCAPE

ATLANTIC CITY, February 17.—More than 1,000 endangered Jews, including former labor and governmental officials, have been rescued from countries behind the iron curtain by members of an underground operated by the Jewish Labor Committee, it was reported here today.

Jacob Pat, of New York, executive secretary, told members of the committee's national executive board at their annual conference here that its agents both in the United States and Europe were arranging the escape of many thousands more—all under the noses of the Soviet-dominated secret police.

He emphasized that Jewish agents are risking their lives to rescue victims of Polish, Rumanian, Hungarian, Bulgarian, and Czechoslovak communism and help them to freedom.

"Outstanding among the activities of the Jewish Labor Committee during 1950 were the efforts to rescue endangered persons from countries behind the iron curtain," Mr. Pat said. "Once again we have been forced to set up our underground machinery in Europe."

1940 WORK REPORTED

"In 1940, just 10 years ago, we set up an underground operation that rescued thousands of important fighters for freedom from Hitler's slave Europe, and today we are again working and saving the lives of democratic opponents of Stalin's tyranny.

Mr. Pat said, "The underground agents rescue those Jews who are refused clearance by the Soviet-dominated Government to emigrate to Israel.

"Many of these people, and there are thousands of them, have been active in the free labor movement, in civil groups and social welfare work," he noted. "For these Jews a hopeless future existence in Soviet land is the price demanded by the Communists."

Mr. Pat emphasized that tightened lines and Soviet-commanded reinforced border patrols make it virtually impossible to successfully find a rear exit to the dungeon-like bleakness of Sovietland.

"The emphasis in escaping Stalin's inferno as of November 1950, had turned to extensive use of misleading identification papers to smuggle these Jews, and their families in many cases, to a friendly neighboring European country and then to Israel and permanent freedom," he declared.

COST OF CREDENTIALS

Illegal credentials sell for approximately $100 each on the black market and elsewhere in certain Soviet-controlled states, it was explained, but as agents work inward toward the Soviet itself, the price for such credentials becomes even costlier, the existence of such escape papers more scarce.

Mr. Pat said that in Russia itself the Jewish underground is not operating its rescue network because, among other reasons, it is felt that there would be very few trustworthy agents to help with the work.

Head of the Jewish underground is an unidentified man in his late fifties who handled the underground operations against Hitler, Mr. Pat said. He works out of the committee headquarters in New York City.

Several of the European agents of the underground have been imprisoned or simply disappeared, it was revealed.

The executive board adopted a resolution calling upon the United States Government and other democratic nations joined by the Atlantic Pact not to rearm Germany and to hold firmly to the oath they took at the end of the war to liquidate all of Germany's armed forces.

[From the New York Times of February 19, 1951]

VOICE IS INVOKED IN ABUSE OF JEWS—LABOR COMMITTEE ASKS STRESS ON THE PLIGHT OF MINORITIES IN THE SOVIET'S DOMAINS

ATLANTIC CITY, February 18.—The Jewish Labor Committee, representing 500,000 persons, urged here today that Voice of America broadcasts give greater emphasis to the mistreatment of Jews and other minorities within the Soviet sphere.

The action was taken in a resolution approved unanimously by the 250 members of the committee's national executive board at the final session of a 3-day annual conference.

Observing that the thousands of refugees who have sought asylum in the West agree that the Voice of America is doing an essential and increasingly effective job, the resolution continued:

"The policies, attitude toward and treatment of minorities—racial, cultural and political—by any government is the acid test of whether it is genuinely democratic and civilized.

"Just as the conscience of the civilized world was aroused by the Hitlerite policy of genocide, so also the conscience of everyone who believes in decency, justice and the dignity of man must be aroused against the

The temptation to bring back wartime subsidies is great for the politicians who think they can go on forever fooling the people into believing that when you pay part of the bill in taxes you pay nothing. Somebody must tell the consumer that subsidies are more expensive than paying their bills in the market place, for the simple reason that you cannot dish out subsidies without a huge administrative cost.

There is a big job to be done, too, in waking up Mrs. America to the fact that eating must remain as the primary expense in any family budget. That food costs have not been out of line is proved by the figures: In 1950 American families spent only 19 percent of the family income for food, as compared with an average of 23 percent in the 1935-39 period.

Farmers are being made the scapegoats in the present inflationary spiral. Farm prices have increased in recent months, but they have increased from a previous drop during which industrial prices and wages were constantly going up. Farmers are the only major economic group who suffered a decline in income since the end of World War II. The public, however, is not being told the entire story, and farmers are suffering very adverse criticism as a result.

The Late Honorable Virgil M. Chapman, of Kentucky

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARLE C. CLEMENTS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Paris, Ky., newspaper, the Paris Kentuckian-Citizen, and also one from the Oldham Era, of La Grange, Ky., relative to my good friend and deceased colleague Virgil M. Chapman:

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Paris Kentuckian-Citizen]

WE SHALL NEVER SEE HIS LIKE AGAIN

The sad news of the death of Senator Virgil Chapman in Washington Thursday morning was received in his home community of Bourbon County a short while later as a shock which has been, perhaps, without parallel in the history of the county.

The impact of the almost unbelievable loss has been such that expression is still difficult under the stunning realization that his eloquent voice has been finally stilled, that his stout heart no longer beats and that his strong hand has been removed from the shoulders of his beloved people.

Through the untimely death of Virgil Chapman, we are sure that a great statesman has been lost to the Nation in a trying hour. We know that the people of Kentucky have lost a great advocate. The people of his home community have lost, indeed, a great friend.

The Kentuckian-Citizen, his home-town newspaper, leaves the larger tributes the hour seems to demand to other associates of Senator Chapman, hoping to remain, rather, on the plane of simplicity reserved for his old-time friends and neighbors. We who knew him best here at home knew him for traits of sterling character which will be the truest measure of his worth—for his rugged honesty, for his high integrity, for his intense loyalty, and for his lofty purpose. We remember him through many years since first he enlisted his services under the banner of exalted principle—a banner which fluttered to the ground Thursday on what seems to us to have been the very threshold of an even greater stewardship, unsullied still by the sacrifice of a single conviction.

His fine virtues far transcended his faults, to a degree only recording of the scroll will reveal eventually. He was our friend, tried and true. Our hearts are heavy today here in Bourbon County because of his death.

[From the Oldham (Ky.) Era of March 16, 1951]

A NOBLEMAN STRICKEN FROM THE SENATE ROLLS

The untimely death of Senator Virgil M. Chapman is not only a loss to Kentucky but to the United States Senate and to the Nation. After a long and distinguished service in the House of Representatives he brought to the Senate that wealth of legislative experience, sound judgment, and wise counsel so necessary to fulfill prudently the obligations of a Senator and he was daily growing in political stature.

One had to know him to appreciate what he really was and to appraise his true character. The people have had few servants more honest, more conscientious, more loyal and dependable. It is difficult to find a deeper student of the history of our colonial ancestors who were responsible for the birth of this Nation.

His first visits to Oldham County were in the days of the organization of the Burley Tobacco Cooperative Association. He made friends among the farmers and businessmen of this country and they were his friends forever. When Oldham County was a part of the district he so ably represented his visits were frequent and he continued to add friends.

Virgil Chapman was an experienced, illustrious statesman, a peerless orator, and a great patriot who knew no dictator but his conscience, no guide but his judgment and no purpose but to serve his country. While on the mountaintop of success, in the very heyday of manhood, while all the tides of life and joy and hope were flowing full and fair, from an environment of prosperity, comfort, love and peace he was abruptly summoned to take his journey to that mysterious country from which no traveler ever returns. With courage and hope he went from the restless land of the living into the silent land of the dead.

He was a man who thought clearly, who considered questions logically, and who possessed the virtue of thinking straight. He arrived at decisions quickly, and once having arrived at a decision as to what was right, he could not be changed. He would not tolerate what he believed to be wrong.

During his legislative experience his fine character, intellectual integrity, far-seeing statesmanship, and wise counsel were outstanding. He loved his country and realized its great power and influence in world affairs.

There was nothing narrow about his vision. He saw with uncanny accuracy the likely unfolding of world events and threw his great vision and statesmanship into the struggle to bring his countrymen and men and women everywhere a chance for peace and prosperity on a world-wide scale.

His convictions were founded on deep thought. Compromises were not a part of his nature. He began and ended his career with the same basic philosophy of government. The illustrious son of a great State, beloved by all who knew him, he left footprints that will endure for all time. The legislative annals of the Nation have been enriched by the eloquence, the persuasion, and the logic of his oratory.

"And when he fell in whirlwind, he went down
As when a lordly cedar, green with boughs,
Goes down with a great shout upon the hills,
And leaves a lonesome place against the sky."

Confirmation of Nomination of Thomas Fairchild To Be United States Attorney for Western District of Wisconsin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of a statement which I have prepared on the subject of the confirmation of the nomination of Hon. Thomas Fairchild to be United States attorney for the western district of Wisconsin, together with certain correspondence on the same subject.

There being no objection, the statement and correspondence were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, last night the Senate confirmed the nomination of the Honorable Thomas E. Fairchild to be United States attorney for the western district of Wisconsin.

This nomination was of interest to the people of Wisconsin because last November, our people rejected the political philosophy of Mr. Fairchild when they returned me, as his opponent, to another term in the United States Senate.

This is the fourth such occasion in which I have entered no objection to those who were either candidates against me in an election or were previously active participants in such opposition. The first such occasion was the nomination of the Honorable F. Ryan Duffy to a United States district judgeship. Judge Duffy had, as the Senatorial incumbent, opposed me in the November 1938 elections and was defeated. Later he was elevated to the appellate judgeship without any objection on my part.

The third such occasion was the nomination to a Federal judgeship of the Honorable Robert Tehan, Democratic national committeeman for the State of Wisconsin.

The fourth was the nomination of Thomas E. Fairchild for this United States attorneyship.

Some folks in the State of Wisconsin have wondered at what might seem to them the peculiar sight of a Republican Senator not objecting to the nomination to important posts of his former opponents. I, however, feel that no Senator, including this Senator, should hold a man personally obnoxious to him, merely because in good faith he happens to have opposed the Senator in a political campaign.

When I was chairman of the Judiciary Committee during the Republican Eightieth Congress, I set up three standards—ability, integrity, and Americanism—for screening all nominees. I insisted, moreover, that no nomination be considered by our committee until the nomination had been taken up prior to submittal to us with the State Bar Association and the American Bar Association for clearance. We thus succeeded in securing the nomination, after several alternatives had been submitted to and rejected by the New York State bar, of a great Federal judge, the Honorable Harold Medina.

Prior to the Judiciary Committee's consideration of Mr. Fairchild, I corresponded with him, asking if he would faithfully apply the laws of the United States, even a law such as the Taft-Hartley statute which was a crucial issue in the 1950 campaign in that he had urged its repeal whereas I had supported its continuation. Mr. Fairchild wrote back, stating that as a faithful public servant, he would fully carry out his legal responsibilities.

I felt that on that basis there was no substantial basis for me to seek rejection of his nomination. To be sure, I would have hoped that the President might have seen fit to nominate a man of more conservative viewpoint. I have pointed out on a number of occasions on the floor of the Senate that the Federal bench is literally packed with individuals of one particular political belief, namely, the left wing of the Democratic Party. If the President feels that he has to appoint practically exclusively Democrats, let him at least appoint some members within that sizable branch of his own party who are conservative in their approach.

Back in 1947 and 1948, if we Republicans had been of a mind to do so during the Eightieth Congress, we could have voted down every single Democratic nomination sent to us. But we did not take the partisan approach then, and I, for one, do not propose that we take the partisan approach now.

The American Bar Association has in the past enthusiastically endorsed the viewpoint which I have expressed on the imperative necessity of security a greater balance in the Federal courts; a balance between parties, a balance within the Democratic Party. I, for one, pledge my continued efforts along this line. It is my judgment that there would be a tremendous shot in the arm to American unity if President Truman, during this national emergency, were to abandon his purely partisan approach to this matter of judicial and quasi-judicial nominations.

I want the people of the United States to have complete and unreserved faith in the Federal courts and in United States attorneys. I want them to feel that when they go before a United States attorney or a judge, they are going to be assured complete justice, regardless of their own particular political background. I do not see how individuals can have such complete faith and confidence so long as the courts continue to be packed with such a complete unbalance in personnel.

There follows now the complete text of my correspondence exchange with Mr. Fairchild. As will be noted, I have commended him for his very constructive answer to my inquiry. It was an answer worthy of the name Fairchild which through previous generations has come to denote integrity and sound leadership in our State.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
March 1, 1951.

Hon. THOMAS FAIRCHILD,
Verona, Wis.

DEAR MR. FAIRCHILD: I have seen a number of the endorsements sent by your friends to the Judiciary Committee in connection with your nomination. On the other hand, I have a number of letters from very distinguished attorneys in the State and others, who have personally talked to me on one particular issue about which they and I are in doubt and which they and I think is very important.

You will remember that during the campaign you were very outspoken for repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. I was wondering therefore, if your nomination for United States attorney should be confirmed, whether in view of your expressed attitude and in view of your affiliation with those who have made the Taft-Hartley law a political issue—whether you believe you could faithfully prosecute any and all violations of the Taft-Hartley statute.

The letters in your favor on file generally speak of your good character and your ability, but do not cover the answer to this question. I should appreciate hearing from you on it.

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

VERONA, WIS., March 6, 1951.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: Thank you very much for your letter of March 1. You refer to the fact that during my campaign for election to the Senate I said I would vote for repeal of the Taft-Hartley law, and you ask whether I believe that as United States attorney I could faithfully prosecute violations of that law.

I can assure you that I will faithfully perform the duties of United States attorney arising under any law of the United States, without exception. When I take my oath to do so, it will be without reservation of any kind. If circumstances should occur under which it is my duty to take some action under the Taft-Hartley law, I would perform that duty just as I would if it arose under the Criminal Code, the Internal Revenue Code, the Defense Production Act, or any other statute of the United States.

You have served as district attorney. I am sure you will agree that the prosecutor's personal opinion that a law is a bad law would not justify his failure to enforce it. Under our American system of separation of powers, it often happens that a judge decides a case in a certain way solely because that result is required by a statute with which he disagrees. He would vote to repeal or change the law if he were a legislator, but as a judge he is bound to give effect to it. An officer in the executive department often performs a duty required by a law he would vote to repeal or amend if he had the chance.

When a Senator casts a vote, he necessarily decides whether a law is wise and desirable. But a United States attorney who withholds action under a particular law because of his belief that the law is unwise would be trespassing on the legislative function.

You note in your letter that I am affiliated with those who have advocated repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. Had I been elected a Senator, I would have voted for repeal. No affiliation, however, could influence me to attempt, as United States attorney, to nullify a law by failure to perform a duty.

I hope that I have satisfactorily answered your question. I very much appreciate your giving me the opportunity to do so.

Very truly yours,

THOMAS E. FAIRCHILD.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
March 8, 1951.

Hon. THOMAS FAIRCHILD,
Verona, Wis.

MY DEAR MR. FAIRCHILD: Thank you for your letter of March 6 responding to my inquiry.

I think that your reply is very reasonable and commendable. While I obviously do not share your basic political thinking, I do believe that you have approached the problem of fulfilling the duties of your future office in a very judicious way.

I shall, therefore, not offer any objection in the Senate Judiciary Committee to your nomination, and I shall seek to expedite it to the greatest extent possible.

I am sure that you share my feeling of gratitude that you and I live in a blessed country where former political foes, however wide they are apart in their basic thinking, can agree as to essentials of what constitutes the duty of a public official.

There is one basic fact that, as you know, concerns me and that is the practical monopoly of appointments to United States attorneyships, to the office of United States Marshall, and most important, to the position of Federal judge, which have gone to one wing of one political party in the last 17 years.

I think that such a situation is most regrettable and that it would be infinitely preferable: (a) to secure a balance in such appointments among both parties—getting men of ability, integrity and Americanism, and, (b) getting a balance of appointments within the Democratic Party so that faithful members of conservative philosophy are represented.

While I shall continue to point out the necessity for such dual balance in appointments, I do not feel that it would justify opposition to your confirmation. In this respect, therefore, I shall continue the policy that I have laid down previously in voting for confirmation of the nominations of Judge Duffy and Judge Tehan, as well as of other members of the Wisconsin Democratic Party.

The President makes the nominations, we in the Senate can only confirm or reject, but I trust that some day, the President will see the wisdom in a more equitable basis for those nominations.

With all good wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

VERONA, WIS., March 12, 1951.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: Thank you very much for your letter of March 8.

Needless to say, I am happy to learn that you see fit to make no objection to my nomination as United States attorney for the western district of Wisconsin.

I look forward to this new work with a great deal of interest.

Very truly yours,

THOMAS E. FAIRCHILD.

The Record of the Second Division in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OWEN BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter from a private in the Army from the State of Maine who is now serving in Korea, regarding the record of the Second Division.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHUNGJU, KOREA, January 23, 1951.

DEAR MR. BREWSTER: I sure hope that this letter gets to you.

My name is William N. Young, Jr., and I was born in Mexico, Maine, and I have lived in Rumford all my life.

I am writing to you because you are a Representative from the State I am from.

I would like to call to your attention a recent column by Drew Pearson. I don't have the date of the column but the heading was "Calculated Retreat" taken from Drew Pearson's Washington Merry Go Round. With reference to the above-mentioned article, Mr. Pearson referred to the "Panic Stricken Second Infantry Division" which I am a member of.

My buddies and I are in the Twenty-third Infantry Regiment, a member of the Second Division.

Now, Mr. BREWSTER, I am primarily concerned with the exploits of the Twenty-third Infantry Regiment, a part of the Second Infantry Division as referred to in Mr. Pearson's column pertaining to the withdrawal from Kunuri.

The records will show that the Twenty-third Infantry fought a delaying action for 4 days after the other UN elements had withdrawn. Does that look like a panic-stricken rout?

During the battle of Kunuri the Second Division suffered between four and six thousand casualties.

It doesn't seem probable that those men were injured by falling off trucks whenever they saw the enemy.

Korea is a very miserable place and it doesn't boost the morale of the fighting troops to read articles as written by Mr. Pearson which we who were there know that the report is erroneous.

Very truly yours,

Private First Class YOUNG.

Resolutions Adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Glen Rock, N. J.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. ALEXANDER SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I present for printing the resolutions adopted on March 13 by the Chamber of Commerce of Glen Rock, N. J.:

First. Resolution having to do with the recent Supreme Court decision declaring the State of Wisconsin anti-strike law unconstitutional.

Second. Resolution opposing levying of taxes by the State of New York on income earned in New York by New Jersey residents.

Earlier in the day, in the course of the proceedings of the Senate, the resolutions were submitted and were ordered to be printed in the Appendix.

The resolutions are as follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States, in a 6–3 decision has declared that a utility antistrike law in the State of Wisconsin conflicts with the Taft-Hartley Law and, therefore, the Wisconsin law may not be used in disputes affecting interstate commerce; and

Whereas the National Labor Relations Board in October 1950, arbitrarily decided, as a matter of general policy, to assume jurisdiction over all public utility and transit systems; and

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce, Inc., of Glen Rock, N. J., senses an immediate danger to the citizens of the State of New Jersey should existing legislation prohibiting strikes in public utilities in the State of New Jersey be voided or otherwise limited in effectiveness: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the considered opinion of the Chamber of Commerce, Inc., of Glen Rock, N. J., that the right to work and to enjoy the fruits of one's labor is paramount to the right to strike; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the considered opinion of the Chamber of Commerce, Inc., of Glen Rock, N. J., that the best public interest would be served by the prohibition of strikes in industries which are essential to the public health, safety or convenience, under penalty of immediate and permanent dismissal from employment in any and all such industries; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution shall be forwarded to the attorney general of the State of New Jersey, to the Governor of the State of New Jersey, to our Representatives in Congress, to the New Jersey State Chamber of Commerce, and to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

RESOLUTION

Whereas the Department of Taxation and Finance of the State of New York imposes an income tax upon that portion of the earnings of residents of the State of New Jersey derived from employment within the State of New York; and

Whereas the said residents of the State of New Jersey who pay taxes to the State of New York are denied the right of franchise in elections held in the State of New York; and

Whereas it is the considered opinion of the Chamber of Commerce, Inc., of Glen Rock, that such taxation and denial of the right of franchise constitutes taxation without representation, which is the identical principle upon which our revolutionary forefathers sought and gained our freedom from a tyrannical monarch: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce, Inc., of Glen Rock, declares it is in opposition to the practice of the State of New York in imposing income taxes upon the residents of the State of New Jersey; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution shall be forwarded to the attorney general of the State of New Jersey, to the Governor of the State of New Jersey, to our Representatives in Congress, to the New Jersey State Chamber of Commerce, and to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Tennessee Pays Tribute to Native Son, Gen. Clifton B. Cates, Commandant of United States Marine Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, the General Assembly of Tennessee in a joint resolution recently paid fitting and deserved tribute and homage to that distinguished general—now serving as Commandant of the United States Marine Corps—Clifton Bledsoe Cates.

The entire State of Tennessee, which so proudly has given to the Nation many another great and distinguished personage, joins with our representatives in the general assembly in this act of tribute.

General Cates is a native son of Tennessee. He ascended through the ranks of the Marine Corps to the rank of full general and his service to his country includes World War I, in which he was twice wounded, through the grueling campaigns of the Pacific in World War II. He commanded the gallant and intrepid irst Marine Regiment at Guadalcanal, Solomons Islands, in that harrowing and unparalleled campaign which will never be forgotten in the annals of our country. He led in the Saipan and Tinian invasions; and also Iwo Jima. Truly he is one of our distinguished and valorous Americans to whom we owe a great measure of gratitude.

As a Tennessean, I proudly salute General Cates—a military genius and a great man.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I desire to have included with my remarks an editorial from the March 14, 1951, issue of the Nashville Banner entitled "Tennessee's General Cates."

The editorial is as follows:

TENNESSEE'S GENERAL CATES

That joint resolution by the general assembly in praise and recognition of Gen. Clifton B. Cates expresses the esteem of all Tennessee for this distinguished native son. Through it, an honor is accorded one richly deserving it; and to him we would convey, as well, his State's regard for the United States Marine Corps, which he commands.

Our compliments to a great general—stalwart defender of his country in two world wars, whose career embodies the proud motto of his service unit, "Semper Fidelis."

We could not overlook, in a discussion of the Marine Corps or its commanding officer, the propriety of that urgent demand—still before Congress—that the Marine Commandant be made a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, thus giving this unit direct representation there; and that the chairmanship of the Joint Chiefs of Staff be rotated on a fixed schedule to alternate that key office between the services.

In reality, Tennessee's esteem is expressive of the Nation's esteem; and Senate bill 677, providing this Joint Chiefs of Staff representation, has the popular support to demand enactment if Congress will heed it.

Why Americans Don't Vote—A Helpful Suggestion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 13, 1951

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the whole country is being aroused about the fact that 40 percent of our country's eligible voters failed to vote in 1950, particularly at this time of crises for democracy. In connection with my sponsorship of House Resolution 89 seeking the establishment of a special House committee to investigate why Americans do not vote, I have received a considerable number of suggestions about what the Federal Government can do to help with the problem. I found one of these suggestions as part of a radio broadcast script—radio talk by Alfred Nilson, Station WOR, New York City—and considered it so highly that I am today introducing a bill to carry it out.

The bill requires each postmaster to make available in his post office equal facilites for equal-sized pictures, biographical and other descriptive information regarding the State Governor, each Senator, each Representative in Congress, each representative in the several houses of the State legislature and each mayor or equivalent municipal chief executive from the area within which such post office is located together with maps and descriptions of the areas which they represent respectively. It provides also that each postmaster shall maintain and post on the bulletin board information on the laws regarding voting and the places for registration and voting within such area. These regulations are entirely practical and are designed to bring the voter and prospective voter in closer touch with public officials and to establish a central and convenient place where voting information can be available.

The bill seeks to reach the two reasons assigned by a majority—62 percent—of nonvoters for their failure to vote in the surveys which I have made on this subject. These reasons are the alleged lack of reliable information on candidates—37 percent—and the fact that nonvoters feel they have little choice in selecting the candidates—25 percent. These disadvantages are, it is true, entirely within the power of any voter to correct today for reliable information can be secured from the press and the radio and the voter in the great majority of the States can freely participate in primary elections, but measures must be taken to deal with these problems just the same as they are so widely considered a reason or excuse for not voting.

The President has been much interested in the situation as shown by his letter to me of February 14 on this subject and his request to the American Political Science Association of December 25 last to investigate the question.

Priesthood of Believers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a sermon delivered by the United States Ambassador to Uruguay, Christian M. Ravndal, at the Emmanuel Methodist Church, Montevideo, July 23, 1950. The sermon is entitled "Priesthood of Believers." I hope that especially the membership of the House will take time to read this most excellent sermon. It is gratifying to know that we have men like Ambassador Ravndal representing our Government in international relationships:

PRIESTHOOD OF BELIEVERS

Some 2,000 years ago Christ Jesus brought into being the most adventurous, the most dynamic, the most enlightened idea ever to seize the mind of man—the idea of man's inherent dignity and importance as an individual. From it sprang the ideas of freedom, individuality and tolerance. Freedom—freedom to achieve a larger and fuller life through government of the people, by the people, for the people. Individuality—the right to be different as we inevitably will be if we may think and act as our conscience, reason, and circumstances dictate. And, finally, a feeling of tolerance—tolerance of faith, of color, of race—and tolerance of the fact that many people simply do not think and act the way we do. These three great concepts—freedom, individuality and tolerance have been the dynamic force in our whole development. They, together with the basic concept underlying them, the Golden Rule (the doctrine of love, of brotherhood, of the good neighbor) have given us the way of life we believe in as fundamentally as we believe anything in this world.

Today we are celebrating a laymen's Sunday for the purpose of bringing to the forefront the fact of the priesthood of all believers. What does priesthood mean? It means the office of a priest, his function, his mission. How does that concern us? In the New Testament all Christians are designated priests.

Today, also, the way of life which is our heritage and our responsibility to protect is in desperate danger. It is threatened by the cancerous evil of totalitarianism—something which now is clothed as Soviet communism—something which denies every premise we hold valid—something which turns the face of man away from God—something which is unremitting terror against religion, and ethics, and morality.

Let us not fool ourselves. Let us not pretend that the situation is not critical. Let us not be lulled into thinking the danger is not to us and that we have no responsibility in this struggle.

We are in fact in the midst of a crucial struggle for the continued existence of our way of life. And we are in this condition because we have been indifferent. We have not cared to understand the signs—we have been a tepid people, negligent in our priesthood. The time has come when we may well ask ourselves whether we are losing our heritage by default—whether we are in fact Christians. For clearly we are not utilizing our total resources toward winning this struggle. And our responsibility, the obligation inherent in the priesthood of Christian believers, is to do everything we possibly can to further the way of our Lord, God Almighty.

What can we do that we are not doing? Let us see first what we are up against.

We are up against a deadly serious adversary, one who is playing for keeps. We are up against an enemy whose mechanism of threats, lies, infiltration, planned chaos, despair, and confusion is terrible beyond belief, and one, further, whose use of informers, secret police, thugs, and gunmen represents the deadliest weapon ever brought against freedom.

This adversary (Soviet communism) holds in it the denial of every premise we hold valid. It denies the sovereignty of God. It denies freedom, individuality, tolerance—the Golden Rule. Freedom, the Communists say, is an evil thing. And as for individuality—all people must be alike. The state is supreme—the lot of the people, servility.

Soviet spokesmen claim a monopoly of the knowledge of what is right and what is wrong for human beings. They maintain the pretense that they are the interpreters of the aspirations of all peoples. They would speak for great masses of human beings whose opinions they have never solicited—and who have never selected them as their spokesmen. They arrogate to themselves powers and pretenses which you and I are willing to concede only to the infinite wisdom and compassion of Almighty God. They use the great resources of modern science (particularly those that have to do with an understanding of the human mind) to pervert the human mind. They resort to every trick, to every insidious and brutal device to destroy what we think is essential—the self-respect of the individual, the itegrity of his mind and of his spirit. And if someone should exercise freedom of thought, should dare to depart from the doctrine laid down in the Kremlin, he is a criminal—and must be placed behind bars or put to death.

Let us not forget that the objective of Soviet communism—a force which controls a great world power and many satellites—which wields authority over hundreds of millions of people—a major industrial empire, the greatest armed strength in the world today, and a force which has the fanatical devotion of fifth columnists in every country not yet within its terrible orbit, let us not forget that the objective of Soviet communism is to make all the world's people subservient to the Soviet regime. Soviet communism has devoted a major portion of its energies and resources to the attempt to impose its system on other people. And since under its thesis the end justifies the means, we are fighting an unbelievably evil force to which all methods of achieving its objectives are permissible.

What can we do about it? As President Truman said recently, there are many things we can do and two things we cannot do. We cannot compromise our principles and we cannot withdraw from the world.

We can, together with other nations of the free world, clearly demonstrate the superiority of the ideals of freedom over the iron hand of tyranny. We can make clear that democracy and freedom, which have evolved from the teachings of Christ, bring to each individual each day more of what he wants than any other system. The free world has the resources to demonstrate both moral and material superiority. It has the tremendous advantage that always adheres to the cause of justice, liberty and respect for human dignity. With leadership, with unity, with steadfastness, that demonstration of moral and material superiority can be made. And as the strength and effectiveness of the system of freedom are made clear over the globe—as the people who now stand in doubt turn to our way of life—the danger of Communist domination will dwindle and finally disappear. The struggle for peace, security and stability in world affairs can be won. But only if each Christian is productive in his priesthood.

The threat is to our kind of civilization. Each one of us is an ambassador of that civilization. And therefore each of us has a part to play in what our Secretary of State Dean Acheson has called total diplomacy. There is no longer any difference between foreign questions and domestic questions. They are all parts of the same question. When we consider any matter, whether it is the size of the budget or the amount of taxes we pay, or the regulation of our commerce—or the regulation of immigration—or military policy—or foreign aid—it is all part of the same thing. Each one of these things is a part of the problem of our safety—and every part of the problem is serious.

We need to take a greater personal interest in government. In the past, except in national emergencies, we have never taken governmental activities as seriously as we should. We have regarded them as someone else's responsibility and have shrugged our shoulders over their shortcomings and faults, saying, "Well, politics is politics." As a result, our representation has not always been as clean, as wise, and as efficient as it might have been. If each one of us will take a genuine, abiding, intelligent interest in how and by whom we are represented, we shall strengthen our defenses against Soviet Communist encroachment. And if we have the dynamic faith, the strong convictions, the sense of mission envisaged by Lincoln, we will give reality to his dream of government of the people, by the people, for the people.

I know that you and I want to do something constructive about the basic wants of man. There is a tremendous and spontaneous pressure within us to help men everywhere in the world satisfy basic social and economic needs. The urge is there. All of us are conscious of the fact that one of the most pleasant feelings we are privileged to enjoy is to meet a person (whether friend, acquaintance, or stranger), knowing that we have done him no wrong and that we wish him well. We feel so good we want to be helpful, if possible. We want to share his troubles and to better the situation, if he will let us. As I have said, the urge is there. The challenge of Soviet communism merely increases that urge. And the feeling of the individual becomes that of the family; that of the family, the community; and that of the community—the State.

Actually the basic wants are about the same for every individual. For one thing, we want a sense of security—we don't want to live in a society where the fear of bandits (local or international), has to be uppermost in our minds. Secondly, we want a sense of productive achievement, for man must feel that he is performing somewhere near the top of the range of his capabilities. Thirdly, we want a sense of equity or justice, particularly as regards our standard of living. Fourthly, we want a sense of participation, some degree of control over the decisions that directly affect our own living and our own destiny. And I should add what Gen. George Marshall has described as the most important need for the world today—"a spiritual regeneration which would restore a feeling of good faith and good will among men generally."

Discouraged people are sorely in need of the inspiration of great principles. Such inspiration, such leadership can be the rallying point against intolerance, against distrust, and against that fatal insecurity that leads to war. I hope that you and I may participate in providing that leadership. But we shall have to get back to first principles if we are to speak with a voice that will kindle the imagination and rouse the spirit. We must present our way of life as a force holding within itself the seeds of unlimited progress for the human race. We must make clear that it is a means to a beter way of life within nations and to a better understanding among nations.

However, it is not enough that one should have faith and should make that faith articulate. It is also essential that we, and those who think like us, should have the power to make safe the area in which we carry that faith into action. And beyond faith and preachment and defense there lies the necessity of translating all of these into terms of the daily lives of hundreds of millions of people who live in this free world of ours.

We must create those economic, political, social, and psychological conditions that strengthen and create confidence in our way of life. One obstacle to the realization of the kind of world in which we can live in peace, is that great areas of the world are breeding grounds of conflict simply because their people lack the means of a tolerable existence. It is hard for us to realize just how bad economic conditions are for many peoples of the world. Famine, disease, and poverty are the scourge of vast areas. Hundreds of millions of people have a life expectancy of 30 years or less and many of these people live on inadequate diets, unable to perform the tasks necessary to earn even their daily bread. Animal plagues and plant pests carry away their livestock and their crops. Misuse of natural resources exposes their land to flood and drought. Conditions such as these are the seedbeds of political unrest and instability. And it is in areas where these conditions exist that Soviet communism makes its greatest inroads. In such areas, Soviet Communists are attempting to turn people's honest dissatisfaction with their present conditions into support for Communist efforts to dominate their nations. Because of their hopelessness, people turn to the false promises of dictators—anything promises better than the miserable existence they endure. Let us not fool ourselves, democratic principles do not flourish easily on empty stomachs.

And so we must work to bring about better living conditions in the free nations. We must help them to help themselves. We must help them to make progress in agriculture, in industry, in health, and in the education of their children. Our missionary groups—our philanthropic and charitable agencies must continue the efforts they have been making over the years for the improvement of conditions. Our young people can find careers in the pioneering work of bringing technical assistance to needy countries. Trade-unions and business organizations might profitably enlarge their contacts and bring the benefits of their experience to others.

If we fail to give material help now we run the risk of losing to Soviet communism by default hundreds of millions of people who look to us for help in their struggle against hunger and despair. The so-called point 4 program could demonstrate that capitalism is energetic, intelligent, and humane.

Summing up, there are several things we can do to meet the threat of Soviet communism. No one of them will be the answer, because there is no answer. There is no quick or easy way to subdue an evil force. It will be with us until Christ comes again. But we can and must contain it. And here our individual, our personal responsibility, the priesthood of the Christian believer comes into play.

Let us dedicate ourselves to the business of total displomacy. Let us see to it that we get the right people to represent us in government. Let us jealously guard the implementation of the great concepts that underlie the whole development of our civilization: freedom, individuality, tolerance, the Golden Rule. Let us help people to help themselves. Let us build a world society that possesses the richness of individuality. That concept will attract a following great enough to put to rout those who seek a world of servility. Let us not forget that if the free world is to be big enough and strong enough to survive the inevitable thrusts of those who believe in a totalitarian world, the free world must be built upon a foundation of tolerance of difference rather than imposition of conformity. Let us make our free world a safe area in which to practice our faith. Let us thus be prepared for any eventuality. Let us be ready at all times for war, if necessary. War is better than appeasement of aggression—because appeasing encourages the very aggression it seeks to prevent. And it is far better than submission to tyranny, because without freedom and respect for human dignity life would not be worth living. Let us be constructively productive in our Christian priesthood.

We want a peaceful world, but our conception of peace is not the kind of condition one finds in the still and terrifying center of a hurricane. We do not want peace at any price, for we know that peace cannot be bought at the price of freedom.

Let us work for an evermore effective United Nations. That organization symbolizes one of mankind's highest aspirations—an international house of democracy, a true brotherhood of the nations.

Let us preach the inherent dignity and importance of the individual—the dynamic idea we have from Christ Jesus. Our strength will be invincible with the voluntary adherence of free men and free minds to the great concepts of our civilization. And in the end, tyranny must fall back before the tremendous moral strength of the gospel of freedom and self-respect, the gospel we have from Christ Jesus, our Lord.

Let us pray. O Lord in Thine infinite wisdom Thou has determined that good and evil shall exist concurrently in the whole reach of human life; that they shall exist within every individual, within every nation and within every human group; that the struggle between them cannot be confined to governments, but must go on, as it always has, in the wider theater of the human spirit itself.

Enable us to understand that this is so and that we who want to qualify as Christians must accept and discharge the responsibilities inherent in the priesthood of Christianity.

Forgive us O Lord that because of our indifference, our negligence, our hypocrisy many people less fortunate than we have strayed from Thy way. Give us a passionate desire to serve. Give us a burning, dynamic feeling of our mission. Give us the strength to withstand and defeat the onslaught of evil, the force that is constantly probing our resistance. Let us at all times, like Thy Son's parable of the talents, be careful about multiplying the good of our heritage. Make the meaning of our priesthood a clear and living thing. O Lord, in the name of Jesus Christ we pray. Amen.

The St. Lawrence Seaway Project Is as Unsound as Ever

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, from the State of Alabama comes the following editorial taken from the December 26, 1950, issue of the Mobile Register in which it points out that proponents of the St. Lawrence seaway are trying to sell America something that does not have the merit to justify the investment.

The editorial follows:

MORE TALK FOR ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY BUT PROJECT IS AS UNSOUND AS EVER

Lately, United States Senator EDWARD J. THYE, of Minnesota, and United States Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN, of Vermont, have invited attention to renewed arguments for construction of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway, the route which would extend from the Great Lakes region to the Atlantic Ocean via Canada.

We take it for granted that the active manner in which the St. Lawrence project is being talked up again is the forerunner of another congressional move to commit the United States to the expenditure of untold millions of dollars for its construction.

The important point, and the point which should be borne in mind in Congress, is that arguments offered today for the St. Lawrence seaway are just as unconvincing as the arguments which have been offered heretofore.

We observe that one article on the subject says the project first came before Congress about a half century ago. It has been brought before Congress time after time since then. In fact it has become sort of a perennial question.

Yet never once has a convincing case been made for the project during the long and persistent fight which has been carried on for it.

There is good reason why no convincing case has ever been made for the St. Lawrence seaway project. The good reason is that no convincing case can be made for it.

Plain irrefutable fact is that the project was unsound when first thought up, has remained unsound ever since and will still be unsound the next time it is placed before Congress. Proponents of the St. Lawrence seaway simply are trying to sell something which does not have the merit to justify the investment.

It would seem that eventually the proponents of the project would wake up to the lack of market for the costly white elephant they have to offer. But apparently not. Apparently the St. Lawrence seaway project is on the way to another session of Congress, and will return to still other sessions.

It is unfortunate that so much congressional time must be spent on this unsound St. Lawrence seaway project when much that is worthy needs more congressional attention than is given.

Thoughts by the Printer's Wife

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY W. WIER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Isanti (Minn.) News:

THOUGHTS BY THE PRINTER'S WIFE

ISANTI, MINN., March 12, 1951.

Hon. ROY W. WIER,
Third Congressional District of Minnesota, Washington, D. C.:

During my limited experience in correspondence I have written letters to Sears, Roebuck & Co., my Aunt Florence, the Minneapolis Tribune, and the county attorney, all of which were promptly answered to my satisfaction. This is my first letter to a Congressman and I am writing it in the faith that all Congressmen take seriously the matters brought to their notice through the mail.

Our society reporter has called it to my attention that there is a movement in Congress to abolish the penny post card. Now, whether she got this information from the women on her calling list (who also are your constituents) or if she read it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I did not take time to ask. I was so thoroughly alarmed I made straight for the typewriter to take up this matter with someone who could do something about it. If the letter is not ready by mail time I will flag the train so as to get it off this evening.

Mr. WIER, as far as I can estimate, there are only two bargains left; one is the penny post card and the other is a subscription to this newspaper. The way things are going it looks like we might have to raise the price of the subscription so let's keep the penny post card privilege for present and future economy.

The penny postcard is so necessary to my personal activities. I have a choir about whom I feel like a mother hen feels about her chicks. Sometimes during the week I must send messages to the members. Take for instance that as I ponder over the anthem for Sunday, I suddenly reconsider the second movement and decide it should be done pianissimo instead of fortissimo. I couldn't afford to spend 3 cents for mailing out the one-line messages but somehow 1 cent seems entirely within my circumstances. As publicity chairman for the PTA, I may want to send notices to all the members, "Please come to the next meeting to hear Mr. Morgenthau speak on the Penny Postcard Must Live Forever. The activities I promote do not allow me an expense account—this makes the penny postcard an absolute necessity.

I honestly feel that it is perfectly all right for Congress to receive suggestions on budgets and appropriations from women because through money management on a small scale, housewives have learned foresightedness. A quick example of this comes to my mind. When Dr. and Mrs. Hedenstrom were a young couple and the children were tots, every time the doctor set out to buy a new business suit, Mrs. Hedenstrom would remind him, "Be sure, dear, to choose a pattern that can be suitably made over for Phil after you are through wearing it."

Of course I wouldn't be able to offer any suggestions as to making money go farther in the military department but if you need any ideas, Mr. Hoover has lots of them written down in his reports. However, I will come right out and say a couple of things about the Government printing department.

For instance, in direct competition to my husband's business, the Government Office prints stamped envelopes with a return card in the upper left-hand corner. I have seen printing so crooked on these envelopes which have been ordered locally that I have been embarrassed lest people might think they came from our shop. I believe that some good printing authority has figured that these are printed at a ridiculous loss per order. If I am wrong, be sure to correct me, because I find this envelope business particularly interesting.

Oh yes, far be it from me to make suggestions but I thought maybe a few of the bulletins and leaflets printed for free distribution might be eliminated from your list which I have read very carefully. For instance, leaflet 1852 on Lespedeza Culture and Utilization, I wouldn't imagine would be too popular inasmuch as neither my dictionaries nor encyclopedia columns list lespedezias. Oh, I do assume they are important inasmuch as there are publications about them. I find listed some booklets which sound extremely useful but I do think the "ABC's of mending" is sort of silly. If a woman can't patch instinctively, she isn't going to bother to learn from a book.

Of course, as I said, I am entirely unable to offer any suggestions in big-time finances because I am so busy with my household budget but it is just on account of this budget that I can't get along without a 1-cent postcard.

I know a war is very expensive—it must take a mint of money. But, if our fighting men need more supplies and equipment, go ahead and raise our taxes but please, let us keep the penny postcard!

Yours respectfully,

THE PRINTER'S WIFE.

Labor Should Be Given Real Voice in Formulation of Defense Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the following statement issued by the United Labor Policy Committee on February 28, 1951, which appeared in the March issue of the American Federationist:

THE PLAIN PEOPLE GET A RAW DEAL

The United Labor Policy Committee decided unanimously today that all labor representatives of our respective organizations serving on existing defense mobilization agencies shall resign immediately.

We fully realize the gravity of this decision. It was arrived at only after exhaustive exploration of all the facts and after almost continuous conferences with the leaders of our Government and of the defense program during the past 2 weeks.

We have come to the conclusion that in no other way can we effectively impress upon the American people the great wrongs being perpetrated against them.

On February 16 we announced that we had become thoroughly disillusioned with the conduct of the defense mobilization program. We made the deliberate charge that big business was dominating the program, that the interests of the plain people of this country were being ignored and that the basic principles of equality of sacrifice in the national effort to protect freedom against Communist aggression had been abandoned.

Since then we have spelled out our indictment in detail to the President of the United States and to the heads of agencies under him. We have talked and we have listened. After full and complete exchanges of information, our original convictions have been more than confirmed.

We are today confronted with a price order which amounts to legalized robbery of every American consumer, together with a wage order which denies justice and fair play to every American who works for wages. The door has been slammed in our faces on the vital problem of manpower, which directly affects the workers we represent. We are offered the lame excuse that on other important policies the decisions must be made by a Congress which is not cooperating with the administration. There has been no affirmative action to meet our basic position—that equality of sacrifice must be the guiding and indispensable principle in the defense program in order to obtain full cooperation and maximum results.

We have also arrived at the inescapable conclusion that such representation which already has been accorded to labor in defense agencies and such further representation as is now offered are merely for the purpose of window dressing. There is absolutely no desire on the part of Mobilization Director Charles E. Wilson to give labor a real voice in the formulation of defense policy.

Under these circumstances, we have decided that to continue to serve on defense agencies would bring about no constructive results and would merely delude the public and the wage earners we represent into believing that labor acquiesces in what is being done.

In the interests of our country and the cause of international peace and freedom to which it is committed, we stand ready to meet with responsible representatives of our Government to continue to seek a remedy for the insupportable conditions facing us.

WAGES

The Director of Economic Stabilization has signed a wage order which we know to be unfair, unworkable, and unjust. Wages and salaries of all Americans are now bound under the most rigid controls in the history of our country.

Wage Order No. 6 has been given the force of law by Mr. Eric Johnston's signature. Yet, even as he did so, he admitted that this order requires fundamental revision and improvement to correct some of the grave inequities apparent on its face.

Mr. Johnston's suggestions for correcting these grave injustices are inadequate. They do not meet the needs of American workers. Mr. Johnston's recommendations freeze injustice by denying less privileged workers the right to obtain through collective bargaining the benefits enjoyed in substantial segments of industry.

Labor's representatives cannot in good conscience return to the Wage Stabilization Board which voted Order No. 6, nor can we acquiesce in the unfair wage policy enunciated by Mr. Johnston.

We have, however, publicly stated, and we now reiterate, that we are prepared to participate in a reconstituted tripartite wage stabilization and disputes board which would administer a fair and equitable wage policy.

PRICES

While wages and salaries are being brought under strict control, the price freeze has been revoked. The Price Stabilization Administrator, with the full approval of the Director of Economic Stabilization, has issued a price order under which 200,000 stores will establish their own price ceilings on the basis of their own bookkeeping and on the basis of their past margin of profit on each item sold.

By officially validating the margin of profit in effect on February 24, the order legalizes every illegal price mark-up since the January 25 freeze order. Higher and higher prices are built into the price formula by its reliance on margin of profit for computing the legal price.

For example, the wholesale cost of a workshirt to the retailer was $2 and has now gone to $2.50. The retailer's price to the consumer was $3. Under the price order, the new ceiling price will be $3.75. In other words, an extra 25 cents of profit not reflected by cost has been added by the retailer with official sanction.

No customer will be able to check whether the retailer is selling his product at a price based on the regulation. There will be no such thing as a dollar-and-cent price ceiling for any commodity, except the price which the retailer sets. There will be no posting of ceiling prices. Enforcement is obviously impossible, even if it were intended.

At a time when fixed formulas are being applied to wages, business is being allowed to write its own ceiling prices. Wages are frozen. Nothing else in the economy has been frozen.

MANPOWER

During the past 2 weeks we have been unable to achieve an iota of progress toward the establishment of administrative machinery and policies on manpower that would most effectively help the Nation's defense effort.

Control of manpower was seized several weeks ago by Mr. Charles E. Wilson and centralized in his already-powerful Office of Defense Mobilization, without ever discussing the matter with his labor advisory committee. Both by correspondence and by several hours of discussion, we have sought to show Mr. Wilson that manpower policies would best be formulated in the Department of Labor. We pointed out that a labor-management committee in the Department of Labor had been functioning harmoniously and satisfactorily on manpower problems until its effectiveness was arbitrarily and suddenly ended by Mr. Wilson's action.

Speaking for millions of wage earners who will be most directly affected as our manpower problems increase, we asked Mr. Wilson to reconsider that decision. He refused flatly and finally, and without atempting to offer any logical reasons for his refusal.

The United Labor Policy Committee is deeply concerned at Mr. Wilson's arrogant seizure of control over manpower and by his equally arrogant refusal to give more than the most superficial consideration to our plea for reversal of his action. So long as the control of manpower rests in the Office of Defense Mobilization, no American wage or salary earner may feel safe that the big business clique in control of that agency may not suddenly seek to achieve a compulsory draft of the Nation's workers. Such an action, under big business control and supervision, would endanger our traditional concepts of free labor and voluntary cooperation. We do not believe that free Americans want civilian labor to be conscripted.

LABOR PARTICIPATION AT ODM

Our conferences and correspondence with Charles E. Wilson have demonstrated that he has little understanding of the needs of the plain folks throughout America. Mr. Wilson has clearly failed to recognize that voluntary cooperation among the various groups in our population has always been attainable in times of national emergency, and that such cooperation has been a foundation of our national strength. To the contrary, Mr. Wilson has demonstrated time and again that he considers the mobilization program his private preserve, in which he may order directives and ukases without consideration of the public need or the public wishes.

But our America is not a private corporation. Authority in our America does not flow down from the front office. It rises from the great common sense and deep patriotism of all the people. The Office of Defense Mobilization, however, is staffed at its top level exclusively with men from the executive offices of big business.

To give voice to the needs of the public, including all workers—on whom our defense production depends—we have asked Mr. Wilson for an opportunity for labor to participate at the top policy level of the ODM. That request was not voiced merely in order to provide a job for a leader of labor; it was advanced in the hope that labor's experience, skill, and viewpoint could help to advance the interests of the total defense effort.

Mr. Wilson has made it clear by his actions that he wants no such broadening of the ODM structure. He does not want suggestions or advice from outside the ranks of big business. It is amply clear to the United Labor Policy Committee that Mr. Wilson does not want labor participation in the mobilization program; he now would accept window dressing, supplied by labor, to cover the backroom activities of the leaders of industry who staff the ODM. He will get no such window dressing from the men and women of American labor. Under these circumstances, his belated offer to appoint a man from labor on his staff is meaningless.

CONCLUSION

Two weeks ago the United Labor Policy Committee voiced alarm over the crisis in our defense program. The crisis has not lessened; it has become more acute.

The road is greased for higher prices. The present wage formula will act like a vise on the aspirations of Americans for decent living standards and equality of sacrifice in the defense effort. Rents are climbing steadily upward, while effective rent-control legislation lags in Congress. An unbalanced tax program, which would place its heaviest burdens on the lower income groups, is in the process of enactment.

Nowhere in the defense mobilization program is there evidence of enlightened and militant leadership to meet these problems, act upon them and help the country develop the strength necessary to met the threat of Communist aggression.

We of the United Labor Policy Committee have voiced these criticisms not to impair our defense program but to improve it. We seek, actively and earnestly, an effective mobilization program which is imperatively required for the defense of our free institutions and of our great democratic traditions.

We shall continue, with all the strength and persuasion at our command, to work toward our goal—the preservation of human liberty throughout the democratic world. We believe that in that American effort the aims and aspirations of free labor—which has never faltered in its opposition to Communist aggression—can play a major, constructive part.

A Veterans' Administration Domiciliary Facility Is Needed in Massachusetts

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1951, I introduced H. R. 3147, to provide for the establishment of a Veterans' Administration domiciliary facility in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

There is a very definite and pressing need for such a facility in Massachusetts. Our veteran population in New England is greater than many other sections of the country and suffers from the lack of a domiciliary home of this nature. Veterans who are eligible for such care are obliged to enter facilities far from their families and friends, with the resultant breaking of home ties and the usual feeling of loneliness occasioned thereby.

I have received a letter from the commandant of the Soldiers' Home, at Chelsea, which is maintained by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It gives pertinent information concerning the need for such a facility, and I include it herein:

DEAR CONGRESSWOMAN ROGERS: It was with considerable pleasure that I read of your having introduced a bill to the House calling for the construction of a domiciliary home here in Massachusetts.

I feel that there is no question but what the New England area, and Massachusetts particularly, is far worse off than any other section in the entire country with reference to domiciliary units.

For your information, there are 26 States which operate soldiers' homes in this country, or an average of almost one soldiers' home for every two States. Here in New England, we have every State, with the exception of Maine, operating a soldiers' home, so that our average is five out of six States; and I think the Veterans' Administration has not aided this problem by the construction of even one Federal domiciliary home here in New England. The nearest domiciliary facility, as you know, is at Bath, N. Y.

The waiting list for admission is approximately 18 months.

The States here in New England were forced into the maintaining of soldiers' homes for the care of their veterans since the Federal Government failed in this respect. It would, indeed, be a pleasure for me to appear in support of this very worthwhile measure which you have introduced. Once again, you have taken the leadership in seeking a practical solution to one of the more vexing problems of our veterans, particularly those of World War I and the Spanish-American War.

With very best regards to you, I remain,

Yours very truly,

JOHN L. QUIGLEY,
Commandant, Commonwealth of Massachusetts Soldiers' Home, Chelsea.

Martin College, Pulaski, Tenn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, in a recent issue of the Nashville Tennessean Sunday magazine there appeared a most excellent article written by Mrs. Helen P. Abernathy, outstanding writer and journalist, of Pulaski, Tenn., in the district which I have the honor to represent. Mrs. Abernathy's fine article was on the history of Martin College, in Pulaski, one of the finest of our educational institutions and a source of inspiration to thousands of students over the course of 5 generations.

Because of the excellence of this article and because of the widespread interest in Martin College of Pulaski, I desire to have the text of this article included with my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

THOMAS MARTIN'S COLLEGE

(By Helen P. Abernathy)

Pulaski, Tenn., is a town of 6,500 inhabitants, but there is not one of its native-born citizens who considers it strange that there should once have lived there a man who flatly rejected the offer of President James K. Polk to make him Secretary of the Treasury, and became town mayor instead.

The gentleman, they will tell you, was only exhibiting his extremely good sense in preferring to handle the hearthstone politics of a purring municipality instead of the purse-strings of a Nation, especially in a period plagued with the expansive notions of the aggressive Polk administration.

Whether or not Thomas Martin forfeited national fame for himself, his name has continued to be a familiar one throughout Tennessee, and, at least in Pulaski, no one has challenged his leadership as a financial power, cotton merchant, banker, railroad president, church worker and founder of Martin College.

It was to carry out the wish of his daughter, Virginia, who died at the age of 20 that he bequeathed $30,000 in State bonds for the establishment of a school for girls. Although at the time of its debut, the school was indeed "the answer to a maiden's prayer," it has perhaps become even more so in later years, for since 1937 young men have been admitted also, and Faith chapel has become the scene of many a wedding planned on proper strolls about the campus.

Since the advent of coeducation, male students, too, have learned to appreciate the independent ability of Thomas Martin. It is not recorded, however, that any student, male or female, with present-day campus financial worries, has ever been deterred from writing home for money by having read of the college founder that: "He never cost his father a cent after he reached the age of 15, clerked in a store until he was 18, and at 25, had accumulated $150,000. He died worth more than a million—his unusual success the result of fine judgment, foresight and splendid integrity."

The first high school for girls in Giles County began its existence under the name of "The Martin Female College" in the basement of the Methodist Church, one block north of the public square in a building now occupied by the Church of Christ. The first president, according to the records, was a teacher of wide experience and a Christian gentleman, Prof. William K. Jones. When he left to head a school in Texas, Dr. R. H. Rivers of Louisville, Ky., became president for a five-year period, until Professor Jones resumed the presidency of Martin for several more years. However, in 1884, Professor Jones again was prevailed upon to go to Dallas, Tex., as head of a school there, and the college records of this incident are notably doleful as the board members gave their consent to his leaving.

The purchase of the Gov. John C. Brown property, an ornate colonial-style residence on a seven-acre plot, was acomplished in 1874, and under the beautiful magnolias shading the box-bordered flowerbeds, girls of all ages were taught the importance of being gentle ladies as well as intelligent scholars.

In 1876 uniforms for all boarding students were adopted. The board, whose president at that time was Governor Brown, voted the measure in order to prevent extravagance and promote economy, and recommended that "exercises of this school shall hereafter be conducted in uniform, calico or lawn for summer, and some cheap worsted goods for winter, or something equally inexpensive, the uniform to be adopted by Mrs. Menefee and Mrs. Nathan Adams subject to the ratification of this board. This rule may be modified as to permit the graduating class to dress otherwise by the consent of parents."

Mrs. Adams, one of the eminent educators of her day, had operated a private school of her own in her home, and when she became associated with Martin College as a teacher, brought with her 20 young women who were her patrons. In good weather, all boarding pupils went for long walks, and the uniformed line, two by two, was chaperoned by a member of the faculty.

In 1885 the Misses Ida E. Hood and Susan L. Heron, of Philadelphia and Boston, later of Belmont and Ward-Belmont College fame, took over the principalship of Martin College. According to the contract, they were to pay as rental for said college building, grounds, and furniture, the sum of $500 per annum.

When the Misses Hood and Heron, in 1887, asked for and received a renewal of their lease for another term, the church, through her presiding elder, brought suit to invalidate the contract between the trustees and these copresidents. Their contention was that the board had no right to elect anyone but Methodists as head of the school, and that the right of choice was implicit in the official board of the Methodist church. (Miss Hood was a Quaker, and Miss Heron a Presbyterian.)

The board minutes reveal the members as being pleased with the management of said principals, feel satisfied it would be to the best interests of the school that it be released to them. John S. Wilkes, then president of the trustees, a skilled lawyer, and afterward member of the Supreme Court of the State of Tennessee, defended the case. The chancelor in Pulaski ruled in favor of the trustees, that Martin College is not a denominational school, as did the Supreme Court when the church appealed the case.

To this day Martin opens her doors to all denominations, and while her students and faculty are predominantly Methodist, many visit and worship in eight other churches.

In 1888 Martin received a threat to her continuance when Mrs. Spofford, daughter of Thomas Martin, sought to recover to her father's estate the 30 State bonds, claiming it was his purpose to do this when they matured, with only the interest to go to Martin. That suit also was successfully fought by the college in the lower courts and the Supreme Court, and to the present time, the corpus of the bonds has been kept intact, with only the interest, as stipulated in the donor's will, being used for expenses of the school.

Ten years later, Judge John S. Wilkes voiced the courage of Martin's trustees at the cornerstone laying of the $25,000 new pressed-brick building. "Many have said to me, 'You are building too much; you can never fill it up. This is the same song I have heard ever since Prof. William Jones moved from the basement of the Methodist church to this location. The same doubters have been predicting disaster with every change in principals and faculty. No, Martin College will never die."

The new building boasted broad stairways, wide corridors, fire escapes, freight elevator, covered galleries, city water, water closets, bathrooms, and floral-patterned carpeting in the huge, ornately furnished parlors. According to the catalog of 1900, the climate is mild, free from the rigors of northern winters and the debilitating influences of southern summers. The dormitories are amply supplied with ventiducts, transoms, and windows; there is an abundance of pure, fresh air, so essential to healthy growth and action; the building is comfortably heated, the bedrooms having open grates with wire protectors. The place is entirely free from all malarial influences.

Disaster visited the school the first in January 1900, when a slight case of smallpox caused the closing of the school for several months. A second catastrophe came when fire destroyed the building on October 16, 1904.

Martin became a junior college when one of the best dormitories in the State was ready for occupancy in 1914, and Prof. W. T. Wynn was the school's president. Five years before the Tennessee Conference of the Methodist Church had taken over the college, and it remains today under that organization's leadership.

Today, the college is headed by the Reverend Joseph D. Quillian, Jr., who assumed his duties September 1, succeeding E. H. Elam, who was its president for 5 years.

It has an enrollment of approximately 180 students.

The campus is alive presently with crew haircuts, checkered shirts, abbreviated tennis shorts, bobbed curls and socks. Such activities as big-, little-sister-and-brother parties, Sadie Hawkins days, and recreational gymnasium parties vie with the cultural offerings of the art, music, and dramatics departments.

Contrasted with these interests are the restrictions of another day at Martin, when the college catalog stated: "Parents are requested to furnish the president with a list of correspondents of their daughter. Excessive letter writing should be discouraged. Each boarding pupil must provide herself with rubbers, and an umbrella or gossamer, and in winter with a black wrap. Friday afternoon and night, the lace-curtained parlors are open for teachers and pupils to receive their friends, but at no other time. No one, teachers, family, or pupils entertains company on the Sabbath. Boarding pupils are expected to wear a plain black uniform when they go out from the college in winter and plain white for summer. This discourages extravagant dressing."

Tiny Faith Chapel is the spiritual hub of Martin College. Concerning the chapel, a bulletin board in the college hall states, "Someone prays in Faith Chapel every night at 10 o'clock." The shrine was effected through the late Dr. Franklin H. Clapp and Mrs. Clapp, former teachers at the school.

Of the college, Pedro Sota of Cuba, a student, remarked: "After being at Martin for 1 month, my first month in the United States, I am finding this college, though small, a wonderful place. In its homelike, friendly, and Christian atmosphere, I know, indeed, there is something here."

It is doubtful if Thomas Martin, founder of "a school for girls," could have wished his bequest to accomplish more.

Why Labor Resigned

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, appearing in the March issue of the American Federationist entitled "Why Labor Resigned." The editorial follows:

WHY LABOR RESIGNED

In our present emergency, which is the result of Stalin's refusal to respect the rights of other peoples, and when our whole Nation is called upon to make sacrifices to maintain human freedom against the military and psychological moves of the Kremlin for world domination, it is fitting and natural that national groups whose functions are essential to national life should want to participate equally with other groups.

Labor was one of the first groups in this country to realize the ruthless nature of the organization that seized power in Russia in 1917 and to realize the menace it presented to free people everywhere.

When the President of the United States asked for authority to meet open defiance of law and order in world relations, the American Federation of Labor supported his proposal wholeheartedly and stood ready to cooperate.

Organization for the defense of the Nation and our national institutions means the temporary subordination of the goals of individual progress to the national program. Labor, with the experience of all-out cooperation in two World Wars, wants to put that experience at the service of the Nation. Conscious of the fact that divisions in the ranks of workers had resulted in unwieldy organization in World War II, representatives of the principal groups organized a committee through which to handle the collective interests of trade-union organizations.

Labor realizes the menace which inflation holds. Workers have watched the dwindling purchasing value of dollars earned and have had only one way by which they could protect standards of living in their homes—increased wage rates to compensate for increased prices. Wage rate increases, however, only reflected inflation and were not a primary cause.

We knew that the expansion of our economy, as manifested in increased national production and national income, increases in exports, increased employment, and greater stability of employment, were inflationary in nature, stimulating price rises and larger profits. Sustained high-level production, with high levels of employment, provided the funds for Government expenditure unparalleled during peace. High national indebtedness due to World War II in the form of bonds at low interest rates became a ready source of credit expansion, adding to the flood of volume of money. Taxes, already at peak with only wartime precedents, were increased to meet defense needs and to serve as an inflation brake.

Taxation alone cannot check inflation or restore normal relationships within our economy. Only the coordinated, sustained, and purposeful cooperation of all whose acts affect the economy can check the flood of inflation and restore the value of our dollars.

We were moving toward organized cooperation until the President reorganized the defense administration under the Office of Defense Mobilization. The President selected a Director of Defense Mobilization and delegated to him powers second only to his own, along with responsibility for the weapons of defense. Big business, with its peak profits, was in a position to send its experts to Washington on a loan basis to put their management experience at the service of the Government as it took over duties and responsibilities formerly performed by competitive enterprise and other private agencies. Labor logically expected an opportunity to supply representatives of experience to aid in developing the policies and regulations for defense production and to contribute its experience in mobilizing and assuring the cooperation of workers who transform work orders into needed products. Power, tools, materials, blueprints, and work orders get into operation through hands skilled by work experience and directed by judgment evolved in production.

When labor saw defense manpower shifted from administration by an agency whose basic function is the promotion of the welfare of human beings to an agency where manpower is subordinated to production, and policies conditioning our standard of living entrusted to an agency in which we had but a minority voice, our first responsibility was to secure adequate and competent representation and to assure justice in defense production.

Without waiting to determine all problems of functions and operation, the Economic Stabilization Agency initiated its program with a price and wage freeze. The wage freeze was to be succeeded on March 15 by a permanent wage formula. The public and the employer members of the Wage Stabilization Board agreed together upon a wage formula as follows: To limit wage increases to 10 percent of the wage of January 15, 1950. It included within this permitted wage range pensions, health and welfare funds, vacations with pay, paid holidays, etc.

Welfare and pension plans are clearly noninflationary. Their current value cannot be estimated. Therefore they should not be blanketed into the 10 percent.

The old formula had provided an adjustment on the basis of the April 1951 consumers' price index, while the new regulation merely provides a review in the light of a rising index. There is no provision for time inequities or for those due to industrial change and growth. Neither was there provision for determining disputes over interpretation or application of the formula.

This formula was proposed as a substitute for collective bargaining which deals with all phases of work relationships in changing and developing industries. It would result in freezing workers' compensation for work done. This proposal to penalize labor, while the prices of articles included in workers' living costs continued to soar and while agricultural prices were uncurbed, was so flagrantly unjust that labor representatives refused to stay on the Board and be a party to it. Their resignation was a protest against injustice which they were powerless to correct.

Labor expects to do its share for national defense and to bear its share of the burden of controlling inflation. Everyone knows increases in wages are not a primary cause of inflation. Until the Government attacks primary causes and gives equitable and effective machinery to compensate for the loss of effective freedom of contract, it may expect our protests against arbitrary determination of workers' pay. Freedom of contract is the instrumentality that maintains that delicate balance within our intricate and interrelated production system. Outside tampering with that freedom creates injustices which destroy balance and injure individuals.

As the representatives of organized labor told the Director of Defense Mobilization in the beginning:

No wage stabilization should be imposed or can succeed unless an over-all system of anti-inflation controls is simultaneously imposed—on the basis of the principle of equality of sacrifice.

Wage stabilization must be a supplement to, not a substitute for, collective bargaining.

Practically continuous conferences failed to result in proposals to assure workers rights necessary for equality of sacrifice and for wholehearted participation in defense of the Nation and our American way of life. We then withdrew the few representatives labor did have from the defense mobilization agencies.

The American Federation of Labor will continue to work for the preservation of human liberty and democratic institutions throughout the world.

LABOR REPRESENTATION

American wage-earners have learned the lesson that the price of liberty, opportunity and justice is "eternal vigilance." The master key is the right and the fact of representation in decisions on matters affecting the welfare of persons concerned. Wage-earners have given their tears, blood, and even lives to secure recognition in work relationships of their right to representation through agents of their own choosing. Congress finally stripped employers of the power to use injunctions against workers seeking better standards of life and work, and employers were told they must not interfere with workers' right to representation.

Under the emergency situation the government has set up administrative bureaus to perform some of the functions normally performed by private individuals or agencies. Since the emergency takes from workers not only freedom of contract but also of decision on policies to promote their future welfare, labor naturally expected representation of its own choosing at the top level to keep the Office of Defense Mobilization mindful of the working people's interests and welfare as over-all policies were determined. Such representation at the top level, to supplement representation in specialized agencies, would assure wage-earners a degree of justice in the defense emergency.

The emergency itself is a changing situation of unknown duration, subject to modification by changes in world diplomacy and international strategy. It commits our Nation to a way of life necessary for preparedness for national defense in a possible atomic war.

Workers as well as citizens in other walks of life realize that national interests and welfare must take precedence over individual welfare. However, those principles and institutions necessary for individual integrity must remain operative. The most fundamental of these principles is representation. Upon this principle our Nation set up a government charged with assuring every person inalienable and equal rights which give dignity and purpose to human life. Under such a government, tyranny has no place.

THE CONSPIRATORS

Because the international conspiratorial organization which the Kremlin has built up is a military body controlled from Moscow, it represents a threat which no country can safely disregard. It operates in the economic, social and political fields. It employs the methods of organized violence.

Regardless of the place of operation, the Kremlin's method is always the same: centralized authority with orders to constituent bodies with detailed procedures for enforcing them. Plans are developed at the GHQ and carried by agents to the groups selected to execute them. Plans are based on central intelligence built up by Communist agents all over the world.

The Kremlin plans to seize control over all peoples who do not "peacefully" yield. In all fields these plans follow the strategy of armed forces and are directed at gaining control over strategic industries, strategic groups of people, strategic powers of government, and strategic informational and cultural agencies.

With such termites following over-all orders busily battling their way into so many institutions and with the warning of the growing list of nations that have succumbed to termite traitors, the United States has been trying to develop greater legal protection against the treachery of United States Communists as well as the Soviet agents who direct them to carry out Stalin's purposes.

In the economic field our trade-unions were battling the philosophy of communism when it was advocating national socialism as developed by Karl Marx. Our democratic unions knew that labor alone did not create all wealth and that our most constructive policy was to concentrate on getting a fairer share of the returns from the production to which we contributed. We fought and defeated the Marxian advocates, so that we could have American trade-unions to serve us in getting higher standards of living in our democratic society.

When Lenin, the heir of Marxian socialism, molded it into a military organization to battle competitive enterprise, we recognized a deadly enemy in this International Communist Party called the Comintern. We turned against Communists who had infiltrated some strategic unions and drove them out. We insistently and repeatedly urged our Government not to establish diplomatic relations with the U. S. S. R., pointing out that the Communist Party, although posing as a political organization, was in reality not a political party at all but an organization seeking conquest by treachery, subversion, and force, that it was not an honest institution but an agency of the Kremlin rulers seeking to delude our citizens into substituting dictatorship for freedom.

The position of the American Federation of Labor has been justified by events of the past two decades. All efforts of the free nations to cooperate with the Communist Government of Russia, in World War II and in the United Nations, have been regarded by the Kremlin as merely opportunities to advance Communist control in order to establish the reactionary despotism of past ages. It is difficult to legislate against communism without impairing our own freedoms. We can, however, deal with it as an illegal conspiracy and outlaw the tactics of conspirators. We shall have to develop the machinery for necessary security and see to it that our judges learn the facts of the Communist way of life.

The shock of finding Communists in the executive branch of our own Government and the trial of a confidential assistant to a President of the United States have resulted in checks on civil-service employees to establish their loyalty, and in some agencies to establish that employees are not security risks. The President in 1947, by Executive order, set up a Loyalty Board of Review to assure Government employees protection against arbitrary action.

Last year Congress enacted the Internal Security Act of 1950, which sought to outlaw subversive activities. This law requires Communist organizations and fronts to register as agents of a foreign government and to make regular reports on their activities. The names of party members must also be registered. Registered organizations can use the mails only by labeling their documents as disseminated by a Communist organization. The President was directed to appoint a Subversive Activities Control Board of five members to enforce this law against conspiratorial acts.

This law also denies passports to Communists and denies admission to Communist immigrants. There are other provisions in the act which have aroused controversy.

The President, by Executive order, has recently established a Commission on Internal Security and Individual Rights to study the problem of providing for internal security while conserving individual rights and freedoms, to examine present loyalty and security programs, and to report its findings and conclusions.

More protection and security should result from these various efforts so that our national defense may proceed more effectively both in cold and in hot wars.

Report of Tariff Committee of the New Jersey Blueberry Farmers Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT C. HENDRICKSON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, March 21 (legislative day of Friday, March 16), 1951

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I present for printing the report of the tariff committee of the New Jersey Blueberry Farmers Association, which during the course of the Senate proceedings today was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the Appendix.

The report is as follows:

REPORT SUBMITTED BY THE TARIFF COMMITTEE OF THE NEW JERSEY BLUEBERRY FARMERS ASSOCIATION

(The following report is submitted by the tariff committee on the New Jersey Blueberry Farmers Association, the policy organization for the New Jersey cultivated blueberry industry, for the purpose of expressing its opposition to the extension of the 1934 Trade Agreements Act. A careful reading of this report will convey to you and your distinguished colleagues the extreme hardship that threatens our welfare because of the existing low tariffs on our products.)

With the mounting stress of mobilization, it seems mandatory to both Government and citizens to maintain every branch of American business enterprise at the peak of health and vigor so that the national effort shall not want for needed revenue. In this respect the cultivated blueberry farming enterprise of my State is one of the hundreds of small consumer industries which our Government hopes will prosper greatly so that it will be able to assume more of the sharply increased tax burden.

As we know, steel, aircraft, and related war industries working on a cost-plus basis will have to be fed colossal rations of tax dollars to arm the Western World. It is up to industries like this one from my State which will have to contribute more dollars to the tax purse in order to pay these munitions industries as well as maintain normal cost of Government. Unfortunately, industries like this will be unable to share directly in any Government expenditures, yet it will be expected to increase its production and revenue in the steadily restricted buying sphere of the American consumer. There is no doubt but that is going to be a mighty strenuous schedule—more dollar revenue without sharing in the Government largess.

Another thing to be considered is the fact that the blueberry industry has built up its unique and valuable contribution to our farm economy without any Government assistance such as farm subsidies and stabilized parity prices. It is totally dependent upon the whims of the greatly fluctuating produce market. Here, I might point out, the blueberry grower is one of a category of several million farmers in this Nation who have never cashed a fat subsidy check in one shape or another to swell his normal farm earnings. These are the people who produce the perishable crops of fruits and vegetables. Since the completion of World War II, these farmers, with unsupported prices, have frequently suffered a very rough time. Speaking of the blueberry industry, I am able to say that in recent years the margin of profit has been so narrow that there now exists a state of alarm among its growers. As if domestic problems were not enough, this industry is now threatened by a sizable invasion of their markets from several foreign quarters at prices which they are unable to meet without courting bankruptcy. Gentlemen, if this condition is allowed to continue unabated, do not count on the blueberry industry to supply any fat to the sinews of war. We think it is relevant to give you a brief history of this industry in order to impress upon you its modest value in the American economy.

Twenty-five years ago this food did not exist in American commerce. In the wooded pine barrens of New Jersey it has converted thousands of acres of land, long considered unworthy of dollar valuation, into profitable farm ground valued at more than $5,000,000 at present and recently producing an annual crop worth $2,500,000. To emphasize this accomplishment in a short quarter century, I give you the recent report of the New Jersey Department of Agriculture: The cultivated blueberry has replaced the cranberry as New Jersey's first-ranking small fruit. In fact, the value of the State's cultivated blueberry crop exceeded the value of all other berry crops in New Jersey in 1950.

Where once nothing but deer and rabbits roamed, prosperous communities are growing and thousands earn good wages harvesting and maintaining the plantations. More hundreds profit through the processing of this new fruit in canneries and freezers. From this enterprise in three counties of south Jersey has sprung rapidly growing industries in the States of Michigan, North Carolina, Maryland, Washington, and Oregon—offsprings that are bringing greatly appreciated revenue of additional millions to the former waste lands of those States. It has been a promising effort until now.

These people have created something that is new and valuable to American farming, and we in New Jersey are proud of their efforts. But as they stand at this moment they do not have much more reward than pride. Theirs is a costly industry. It defies partial mechanization. To maintain quality nearly every operation demands human labor. The bulk of the plantations are small family enterprises. This is necessitated by the heavy capitalization and the need for constant personal supervision to maintain the crop at peak efficiency. The day when this fruit was considered a rich man's luxury is past. They now have to supply the increasing demand of the average man for this fruit at a price he can afford to pay. The fixed costs which amount to two-thirds of their sales revenue have relentlessly mounted while competition has forced them to lower their prices. The end result is that few in this industry last year earned enough after a year's work to pay Uncle Sam more than a token income tax. The average blueberry farmer made less on his investment of thousands of dollars per farm than an ordinary worker in a munitions plant. Yet today he has to pay farm labor $1 per hour, and his pickers won't come to the field unless they are assured of from $8 to $10 per day for harvesting, plus their transportation. Every item of production needed to market one pint of blueberries has sharply increased in cost.

There is, however, a note of brightness. There is no optimist quite like the farmer. When a workman finds his job is unprofitable, he quits; when a businessman finds his business is unprofitable, he liquidates; when a farmer finds the crop unprofitable, he goes right back and takes another swat at it.

The blueberry farmers, I can assure you, are not afraid of their domestic problems. They figure that they will have to organize more cooperatively, build up wider markets, strive to control their distribution and improve their already fine product. That is a man-sized job, but they figure that they can do it; eat and still pay those taxes. What has them worried is a threat from a different quarter and they are powerless to meet that one on equal terms. But the United States Government can. Their problem is this:

One of the reasons they have been able to expand has been the development of what is called "bulk" sales as a companion to the sales of fresh fruit, limited to two short months of the summer season. Gradually they have encouraged the processors to can the product, freeze it for the family table and also freeze it in larger quantities for the bakery and allied industries. This represents several millions of pounds of business each year that formerly did not exist. The public likes it and is going more for this high-quality product each season. For this market, growers of cultivated blueberries have had competition from the harvesters of huckleberries, a similar wild fruit abundant in a few sections of the United States where this enterprise is carried on commercially. But there has always been room for both of them. Unfortunately, the wild huckleberry grows prolifically in Canada and nearly every country of North Europe.

We have been informed that the Government of Norway has assisted one of the Norwegian import companies to process its abundant harvest of wild huckleberries with the idea of entering the American market. Norwegian agronomists came to America to study our markets and industry. They obtained the most modern blast freezing equipment, installing it in a modern plant and are now set up in business to go for our markets. According to our information, they planned last year to start with a modest 500 long tons of frozen fruit, packed in tin, to be made available to the American consumer at the rate of 21 cents per pound delivered. This first plant has a maximum capacity of 2,000 long tons, or 4,500,000 pounds, which they anticipate shipping to us by 1952. That about equals the amount of the present bulk sales from Jersey. Recently we learned that the Swedish canning industry is now making available for the American market canned Swedish huckleberries at a price of $2.50 per dozen to the retailer.

These are only the most recent invasions of our markets. For some time now the Canadians have shipped several millions of pounds of fresh fruit annually across the border to compete against the native product at a delivered price below that which the American farmer can profitably produce the cultivated variety.

In this uneven contest some of the elements the American grower has had to fight are these: It costs a thousand dollars to bring an acre of cultivated blueberries into production; the foreign competitor gets his free from nature. We pay high American wages to gather, process, maintain insect control, package and transport our product; the foreign competition does this at labor costs far below ours.

This is tough enough competition but the straw that breaks the camel's back is the fact that the tariff established some years ago to protect the blueberry and huckleberry industries has been slashed from a sound 35 percent to 10 percent since 1930. There is a move on now by our foreign competitors to whittle it to 8¾ percent.

Since the completion of World War II the blueberry grower, like many of his fellows in the perishable-foods line, has been fighting a losing battle with the processor who insists each year that he must have the product cheaper. In 1945 they were paid 28 cents per pound for cultivated "blues." Last year they were paid 20 cents and were warned to expect a farm price of 18 cents for the coming year. The club which the processor sometimes uses is something called competitive price—meaning that he must buy the article cheap enough to assure himself ample profit, plus mark-ups of the wholesaler and retailer, and then deliver it to the consumer at an attractive price. There has been hope up to now that the blueberry farmer could meet with the processor and convince him that there is still room for a few cents more per pound to the farmer without jeopardizing the attractive price for the consumer. Inflationary prices in food, the realization that our costs will jump at least 2 cents more per pound for the coming season, the reasonable assumption that the spread between the farmer and the consumer can be reduced—these have been factors which encouraged the farmers to believe that they might obtain a better break from the processing industry.

These hopes seem pretty dim now with sizable importations of Norwegian blueberries available at 21 cents per pound and canned Swedish berries at $2.50 per dozen. On a 20-cent per pound basis, the processing trade has made bulk frozen berries available to the retail trade at 28 cents per pound. The canning trade has made available its product to the retail trade at from $2.65 per dozen to $3.00 per dozen. The blueberry farmer fears that processors and jobbers are going to be mighty tough when they are faced with competition that undersells the frozen product by 7 cents per pound and the canned product by at least 15 percent per dozen below what is considered an irreducible minimum.

With this situation the blueberry farmers feel they are with their backs to the wall. They cannot afford to give any more ground on price and stay in business. I am informed that an accurate cost accounting of one of the big plantations—a small group of about 25 of these producing 200,000 or more pounds annually—revealed that it had cost the grower 19.2 cents per pound to get the fruit off the bush and to the buyer. This was done on a 20-cent sales price. You can see that margin of profit if you look closely on a very clear day. Several smaller growers toted up their bush-to-market costs and they came out with a 16-cent cost per pound The 4-cent per pound profit does not add up to much when one considers that the small-type plantations produced only from 50,000 to 75,000 pounds last year. Remember, these figures do not include capitalization costs such as new plantings, new machinery and new buildings.

In the face of the Norwegian importations being introduced last year they lost and expect to lose a lot more business. The importers and jobbers report they plan to increase sharply their use of Norwegian fruit this coming year, while active canvassing is under way for the Swedish product expected for the coming season.

Canada, which has already established itself in the American market, has been reported as expecting to ship a bumper crop across the border. I might add that growing of the cultivated American blueberry is going apace in northern Germany and Holland, and that there are several hundred acres under cultivation already. We understand that this endeavor is also aimed eventually at the attractive low-tariff American market.

In the coming years we gather you want this industry to grow in the United States, expand and produce more revenue so that the blueberry farmers can provide for and pay the taxes necessary for the increased mobilization. To do this they will have to have more than a line-holding operation by the Government on tariffs. It is essential that the tariff be raised back to its original level of 35 percent.

There is no desire by this industry to totally exclude competition, either foreign or domestic. The American, I think, is adult enough now to realize that such aims in the long run produce more harm than good. However, the blueberry grower—knowing that science, nature and good farming techniques have endowed him with a superior product—merely wants to fight for his own markets under the Marquis of Queensberry rules. The 35 percent tariff will enable him to meet the foreign frozen fruit on the basis of 26½ cents as compared to 21 cents. The canned fruit entering the country would have to be sold at a comparative price which would bring it within range of the lowest production price of the processors. This does not improve the meager profits of 20-cent fruit but it does allow us to tackle our domestic problems without being sandbagged from abroad.

In presenting their plea, I have shown you a rendering rather than a blueprint—a picture with over-all color and perspective that graphically shows how important it is to protect a struggling, average American farm industry in these trying times. Further statistics are available from the more detailed documents which we presented with sympathetic reception before the Reciprocity Commission some months ago.

JOHN GOODMAN,
Secretary, New Jersey Blueberry Farmers Association.

Amalgamation of the State Department and Foreign Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRED E. BUSBEY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. BUSBEY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the gentleman from North Carolina, the Honorable THURMOND CHATHAM, chairman of the Subcommittee on Foreign Affairs for the State Department, made a reply to my speeches in the House of Representatives on Wednesday and Thursday of last week. I regret that I was not present at the time he made his remarks, but that was entirely my fault. He had taken the trouble to notify my office that he intended to make such a reply. We had under discussion the appropriation bill for the Post Office and Treasury Departments and I had to return to my office to meet with some people. His time for special orders came 2 hours sooner than either of us anticipated, in view of the fact that the committee rose and the members having the time which would consume 1 hour of special orders prior to Mr. CHATHAM did not use it.

I do not propose to make a complete comment on Mr. CHATHAM's remarks at this time as I am about to catch a plane for Chicago to keep an appointment with the district attorney in the hope that I may be permitted to appear before the grand jury tomorrow afternoon in connection with a situation in which I am intensely interested. I shall ask for permission for a special order to make a detailed analysis of Mr. CHATHAM's remarks immediately following the Easter recess.

Briefly, I would like to compliment the gentleman from North Carolina for a very good summary of my fears. I wish everyone in the country could read and digest it because, in my opinion, it substantiates exactly what I was fearful would happen. The important thing accomplished by my speeches is that the State Department agreed to withhold the effective date of the amalgamation of the State Department and the Foreign Service until such time as appropriate committees of Congress can thoroughly study its effects.

I am making a formal request today of Mr. CHATHAM, chairman of the Subcommittee on Foreign Affairs for the Department of State, for permission to appear before his committee as a witness. I am also directing a request to Chairman DAWSON, of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, to appear as a witness if the reorganization comes before his committee for consideration.

The American Selling-Price Principle

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, Congress is being asked to consider legislation which would overhaul customs procedures to conform more nearly to standard practices. This is a worthy objective and should result in the lessening of injustices and confusion.

However, section 14 of H. R. 1535 eliminates the American selling-price principle, which has afforded some measure of protection to domestic rubber-footwear producers. Should this provision remain in the bill, it will grant to slave-labor employees in Czechoslovakia concessions which will allow the unrestrained importation of foreign-made rubber footwear.

If this repealer section should become the law of the land, the State Department will have accomplished what they failed to do in the Torquay Conference last September. The rubber-footwear industry will be injured through congressional enactment, after public outcry staved off tariff concessions at Torquay.

I warned against the evils of this legislative language in the Eighty-first Congress, and now forewarn those who are interested in the maintenance of a strong, virile, American rubber-footwear industry.

There follows a letter on this subject voicing the concern of industry and labor officials intimately associated with the problem:

UNITED STATES RUBBER CO.,
Naugatuck, Conn., March 13, 1951.
The Honorable JAMES T. PATTERSON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PATTERSON: Both labor and management involved in the manufacture and distribution of rubber footwear devoted much study last year to H. R. 8304 (81st Cong., 2d sess.), the proposed Customs Simplification Act of 1950. It was our feeling the bill proposed in general many constructive and long overdue changes in customs procedures.

We did, however, take vigorous exception to one provision in the measure. That was section 14 which, if it had been enacted, would have jettisoned the American selling price principle as a basis for computing import duties on rubber and canvas footwear. The bill would have substituted a foreign export value as the basis for computing duty. It was our contention that this involved a substantive change in the law and was not for that reason germane to a measure pointed otherwise at streamlining customs procedure.

This bill has now been reintroduced in the Eighty-second Congress, H. R. 1535. It contains the same objectionable provision (sec. 14), eliminating the American selling price principle. This section of the bill provides that the Tariff Commission shall certify to the President a rate of duty for each classification of articles "which the Commission estimates to be reasonably equivalent."

It is our contention that even if the authors of the bill sincerely intended to provide the same level of relief under the proposed revisions, they could not make good. Experts in customs matters support us in this view. The proposed bill does not outline a detailed procedure for converting the tariff protection to the same level under the proposed revision. The Tariff Commission, as far as we can learn, has not agreed on a procedure of any kind to meet the new proposed provisions, much less one that will guarantee our industry the same protection as it now has under the American selling price. We have had no information from Tariff Commission or State Department to persuade us from our opinion that no workable scheme can be devised under the new law to give us this same protection.

If we are to have the same protection as under American selling price, how would the Tariff Commission set up a schedule of tariffs which would take account of the fluctuations in the price of imported goods and the price of like or similar American goods?

When it is realized that there are hundreds of different rubber footwear items, each with its own price level, it becomes clear that there is no workable substitute for the American selling-price method which will give the industry the same level of protection.

Some of the letters last year from the State Department indicated a misunderstanding of the American selling price principle and the conditions under which it was enacted into law by Congress about 25 years ago. It was implied that the United States Government, apparently upon the urging of American industry, adopted the American selling price as a "device to conceal the real amount of protection actually enjoyed by this and the other industries concerned."

Congress set the American selling price as a basis for duty valuation because other methods of valuation were not adequate; and one of the inadequacies was the inability of American officials to obtain accurate information on foreign costs. This was particularly true with reference to rubber footwear. In this respect the situation is even worse today.

The American rubber footwear industry's most serious competitor for the domestic market is Czechoslovakia. Can the Tariff Commission or the State Department get trustworthy data on costs of production in Czechoslovakia today? Does any one in our Government have accurate figures on the labor and material costs represented in a pair of rubber gaiters from a Czech factory landed in New York today?

Instead of "concealing" the facts about the amount of duty, the American selling price makes it easy for a foreign competitor to determine the amount of duty he has to pay in relation to his costs of production.

From whom are the facts as to the "real amount of protection" concealed? Not from the Czech manufacturer. Under the American selling price he is the only person who knows the actual rate of duty based on his export value or any other value. And under the American selling price usually he can determine what his duty will be even before he begins to manufacture. The only thing that would change his estimate would be a change in the selling price of the American article like or similar to the one he is producing, and the adjustment in any event would be negligible.

The American rubber footwear industry can stand no further cuts. In fact competitive footwear made in low-wage countries abroad is seriously threatening the industry under the existing duties. Labor constitutes approximately 47 percent of the factory cost of canvas and waterproof footwear. This is the labor of American workmen and wages paid in this industry in this country are far higher than those in any other country. The materials used by American manufacturers of canvas and waterproof rubber footwear are, with the exception of natural rubber, American made and here again this industry is at a disadvantage as against the use of materials produced in foreign low-labor-cost countries.

The manufacture of rubber footwear is an essential part of our national economy. It is vital to our national defense. During the last war this industry furnished our Armed Forces with more than 45,000,000 pairs of rubber footwear. In the same facilities, it also made life rafts, fuel cells, raincoats, life vests, and other similar war products. Without a going rubber-footwear industry our national defense program would be seriously impaired.

Thirteen companies are engaged in the manufacture of rubber and canvas footwear and employ more than 20,000 men and women with sales of approximately $100,000,000.

It is one of the truly American industries, foreign manufacturers having copied its styles and methods. The low-labor rates and cheaper materials costs of foreign manufacturers, particularly Czechoslovakian and Japanese, combined with lower tariffs, would mean the loss of jobs to thousands, not alone in this industry, but in the factories of its suppliers and in the stores and shops in the communities which serve its workers.

It is clear that the elimination of the American selling price, through H. R. 1535 or any other measure, would adversely affect the American rubber footwear industry, its stockholders and its employees, and eventually the American public who look to this industry to supply it with essential waterproof rubber and rubber-soled canvas shoes.

We earnestly solicit your support for the elimination of this section 14 from the bill which is now under consideration in the House Ways and Means Committee.

Very truly yours,

T. R. BEHRMAN,
Industrial Relations Manager, Naugatuck Footwear Plant.

GEORGE T. FROEHLICH,
President, Local 45, United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum, Plastic Workers of America, CIO.

Pennsylvania's Governors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on a very personal matter, because as a Pennsylvanian I am, naturally, tremendously proud of Pennsylvania's long and honored history.

What I consider to be a lamentable understatement in our Commonwealth's history has been corrected by a new book which was published on Monday entitled "Shelter for His Excellency" and written by Le Roy Greene, veteran Philadelphia newspaperman, author, and historian.

The book makes the point that Pennsylvania, which had its beginnings of colonization in 1624, has had in the line of historic sequence a total of one hundred governors.

Among other colonial States there may well be others which have had one hundred chief executives since their history began, but I believe Pennsylvania is the first State to have had them recorded and accounted for in a single book.

It has been the unfortunate tendency, as we inaugurate each Governor to the State Capitol at Harrisburg every 4 years, as we did with Governor John S. Fine this year, to refer to the Governor as the such-and-such number since the constitution of 1750.

This habit has grown upon us, for reasons which are apocryphal, with the result, for example, that our incumbent Governor Fine was described as Pennsylvania's thirty-fifth Governor since the constitution. The fact of the matter is that Governor Fine is the one hundredth Governor since the beginnings of our Commonwealth.

As a result, this unhappy custom of referring to governors only since the second constitution, almost wipes out in a stroke the long line of great men, among them the founders of our Nation, who were the chief executives of Pennsylvania long before there was such an instrument as a constitution.

Under such reasoning we have ignored such intellectual giants as Benjamin Franklin, David Rittenhouse, and William Penn, who were the Governors of Pennsylvania during the provincial and Revolutionary times.

So, too, we have ignored such established historical colonial figures as Peter Minuit, Peter Stuyvesant, and Johan Printz who were also Governors of Pennsylvania.

This new book, which has already become a best seller, sets all this straight and starts at the very beginning of Pennsylvania. That is where the start should be made, and that is why this book makes such an important contribution and why I want to spread it upon the record of this session.

It has also been a tendency in the past to number persons and dates in Pennsylvania, in addition to using the constitution of 1790 as a milestone, from the Revolution, or from the proprietorship of William Penn, or from the rule of Sweden.

The beginnings of Pennsylvania history are with the Dutch colonization which preceded them all. The colonies on the Delaware River and the Hudson River were encompassed in the area then known as the New Netherlands. Hence, the early history of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and Delaware are naturally tied in together. The early Dutch Governors ruled the land of all of these future States together, with some of them even appointing resident governors in each of the areas while they themselves assumed a master control from wherever they established their own capital in the new land. Every school child knows of Peter Minuit's purchase of the island of Manhattan for $24. Now, as a result of this new book our Pennsylvania school children will have an opportunity to learn also that Peter Minuit made an equally sensational purchase when he bought all of the land along the west bank of the Delaware from Delaware clear up to Trenton, N. J., for an almost equally ridiculous sum. Minuit's fame is well established as a foremost New Yorker when he was also Pennsylvania's third Governor. We see again reestablished the fact that for a time the capital of all New Netherlands, well known to have been in New York, was also for a time in Pennsylvania.

I, for one, am delighted that all of this history has been brought together in a single book. I am especially happy that the job was not intended to be a dry, dull history reference book, which it is not, but is what it was intended to be—a fascinating, colorful, exciting story for general reader interest and aimed at the average citizen who has neither the time nor the inclination to pull out reference books to learn the history of our State. It is the usual thing for books like this to be reference books, which keeps them out of the hands of all those except scholars, but fortunately that is not the case here.

How this book came to be written is almost as interesting as the book itself. The author, Le Roy Greene, was a young but already veteran newspaperman on the Philadelphia Public Ledger and Evening Public Ledger when he was summoned to Harrisburg by Governor Arthur H. James to be press secretary to the Governor. Greene accepted the summons and took a 4-year leave of absence from his newspaper where he had been a reporter, rewriteman, and editor on assignments which took him over a good part of the world.

He had been with Governor James but a short time in 1939, when Governor James asked him about the history of the executive mansion on Harrisburg's Front Street, at the bend of the Susquehanna, which had been the home of the State's chief executives since the great Civil War governor, Andrew Curtin.

Greene went looking for the history and found that nothing had ever been written except in newspaper stories reporting the day-by-day activities. Nothing had ever been compiled. Shortly thereafter Governor James inquired of Greene as to what number governor he was in the line of historic sequence and Greene found that nothing had been done on that subject since the mid-1800's and that even so, the line of succession had never been established. Greene expressed the thought at the time that if anyone was entitled to know how many governors there had been, that person should certainly be the Governor of Pennsylvania.

With the insatiable curiosity for ferreting out facts which is typical of qualified and trained newspapermen, Greene undertook the job which he was to finish some 12 years later. During those years, however, he was in the Army for more than four, serving in the Philippines as a lieutenant colonel in the infantry.

I quote from a recent review of his book, published in newspapers, in which the reviewer said: "It is the story of a great State told by the State's best storyteller in his finest reportorial style."

I could go on at some length about the stories of our great governors and their altogether human idiosyncrasies, including the one who kicked a Supreme Court Justice in the seat of the pants, the one who inadvertently drank a jug of water which had been sent to the State Capitol to be tested for typhoid fever; the one who was only 21 years of age; the one who was one of America's great baseball players; the one who drove a committee of the General Assembly from his door; or even the one who kept a pet skunk named Charlie in the executive mansion at Harrisburg; but those are the human touches which make this book so fascinating. But what I want to do before closing these remarks is to point out two more historical inaccuracies which have been corrected in this book. The eighth Governor of Pennsylvania has gone down in history as Peter Hollender, whereas actually his name is Peter Hollender Ridder. One governor has been overlooked entirely in history but Greene puts him in his rightful place. He was Derck Smidt, of Holland, who ruled Pennsylvania during the year 1655.

Letter From Rev. Lawrence L. Lacour

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, the Reverend Lawrence L. Lacour, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, in the district which I have the honor to represent, and a man who served with distinction as a chaplain in the Navy during the late war, had an opportunity to observe at close hand the moral conditions in Japan, and recently has written me a very enlightening letter.

Members may recall that our colleague, Hon. JOSEPH P. O'HARA, the gentleman from Minnesota, in 1945, inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Reverend Lawrence L. Lacour, written from Japan in which he described an unspeakable moral breakdown, and the letter commanded attention in all parts of the United States. Under unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I include the letter from the Reverend Lawrence L. Lacour setting forth his conclusions after careful study and close observation.

The letter is as follows:

MOUNT PLEASANT, IOWA,
February 26, 1951.

The Honorable KARL M. LECOMPTE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: It was most thoughtful of you to send your favor of February 2. Many times I have wanted to thank you for the support you gave our moral crusade project when I was a chaplain in the Navy. The action in Washington brought immediate response in Japan with a personal order from the Secretary of the Navy making all houses of prostitution out of bounds. After that order of November 1 the incidence of venereal disease began to decline.

It was also most gracious of you to recommend that I be honored by the Legion of Merit. It is most understandable why such a recommendation was never passed since I would have been decorated for attacking a situation that had been accepted as a part of the Navy policy.

As you may know, our group recently concluded a 5½-month tour of Japan. This tour took us to every prefecture of Japan where we appeared before over a half million people in 130 different cities. In many of these cities we were entertained by both the mayors and governors of the prefectures. All of these contacts gave us some feel of the pulse in Japan. Some of these observations may be of help to you.

First, there is a deep-seated resentment among the intellectuals toward our talk of rearming Japan. According to the new constitution the Japanese people accepted the terms that they would never again return to military power as a means of settling international disputes, or even for the cause of self-defense. It is a feeling of many of these people that either the original terms of the surrender must be changed, or we must allow the people to make this decision for themselves. Otherwise, they see no consistency in our theories of democracy.

Although General MacArthur has been criticized severely by some sources, his overall policy is commendable. Yet the Japanese feel they cannot openly criticize administrative policies administered by GHQ. This inability of General MacArthur to accept criticism has caused him again and again to be betrayed on administrative matters, and has made it impossible for him to get the total picture. We conducted services for a number of encampments of Japanese police reserves. Among many of these men there was the feeling that they had been recruited under false pretenses. They had agreed to become police reserves but are now undergoing basic infantry training. Such inconsistencies do not help the cause of democracy.

Naturally, no occupation, or any other government for that matter, can be completely void of corruption and abuses. However, there were two phases of the local administrative policies that have not created good will. First, the Army has taken over the finest buildings in the cities where our men are billeting. We have enlisted men over there who enjoy a standard of living beyond anything they could know in America. With servants often more highly educated than themselves, they have found it easy to take a very superior attitude to the Japanese. More recently the Army established more equitable rents for these dwellings, but considerable local resentment has been created by these policies.

The second factor concerns morality. There is no particular problem concerning prostitution any longer in Japan. The Army has solved it in its own way. Many of the men (of course it is impossible to produce statistics for this observation) have taken over Japanese girls and are living with them. These girls are examined to determine freedom from venereal disease and then the men proceed to live with them. Before the Korean incident the situation was so common as to have become accepted as regular occupation routine. This has not created good will with the Japanese people. Nor are all of the girls who have cooperated in this project prostitutes. Many of them are girls from good families, and in some cases exceptionally high-type girls who, being void of any standard of Christian ethics, are attracted by the possibilities of American citizenship and a general good time in the company of the American fellows, who most certainly excel the Japanese men in their treatment of women. So common was this practice among our young men that I strongly oppose the drafting of our 18-year-olds, or the use of our younger men in an army of occupation. If this must be the conduct of the career soldier, we can only plug along through the processes of education and religion for a reform; but in the cases of our younger men who eventually expect to return to civilian status, we have a responsibility at the point of those factors which determine their fitness to be good husbands and substantial citizens.

Kindest personal regards and success to you in your great work.

Yours truly,

LAWRENCE L. LACOUR.

Ninety-seventh Birthday Anniversary of Andrew Furuseth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include herein an address delivered at the celebration of the ninety-seventh birthday anniversary of Andrew Furuseth, on March 12, 1951. The speech was delivered by Mr. Einar Johansen, representative of the Norwegian Seamen's Unions in the United States and was broadcast by courtesy of WNYS, the municipal broadcasting system of the city of New York.

In addition to this address, there was also broadcast a tribute to Mr. Furuseth, written by Mr. George W. Blakeley, a licensed marine engineer and intimate friend of Mr. Furuseth, which was read by Mr. Peter Gravina, a station announcer. The speech and the tribute follow:

On the occasion of Andrew Furuseth's ninety-seventh birthday, I feel greatly honored to be chosen to pay tribute to the grand old man of the sea, and one of the foremost in American labor movement. The memory of "Andy" as he affectionately was called by all who knew him, will remain forever among all seamen, regardless of nationality.

Andrew Furuseth has been called the Abraham Lincoln of the sea, and greater truth has never been spoken. Andrew was born on a small farm at Romedal, Telemark in Norway, the fourth of eight children. Due to poverty in the family, he had to work for his keep from the age of eight. Coming from a seafaring nation, he went to sea at an early age in 1873. At that time the seaman's lot, at the best, could be called a hard one. For years Andrew Furuseth was trained in the hard school of the sea, sailing in ships belonging to five different nations, until he arrived at the Pacific coast on an English ship from Calcutta in 1881. Like thousands of other seamen at that time, he came to America to find freedom, but unlike other men, he dedicated his life to the task of freeing others.

His achievements and what he accomplished in Congress is an old story and should be known to all of you. Before and after the year of 1887, when he was elected secretary of the Pacific Coast Seamen's Union, later the Sailors' Union of the Pacific, he fought a long hard fight to make all men sailing the seven seas, equal to any man ashore. Fighting relentlessly throughout the years, he was the victor in many amendments to the Seamen's Act of 1872. His long uphill fight for freedom, integrity, and better living conditions for the seamen was rewarded on March 4, 1915, when the Seamen's Act of the same date was signed by President Woodrow Wilson. Signature of the bill was witnessed by Andrew Furuseth, on bent knees and with hands lifted in prayers. Thus were destroyed conditions, which at many times were worse than slavery.

It is because of men like Andrew Furuseth and the seafarers trade-unions, that the shackles were removed from men who go down to sea in ships.

It was not due to birth or heritage, Andrew Furuseth succeeded, but by using his long experience at sea, and above all by self-education. He was a student of maritime laws, both ancient and those existing in his time. He was eager to learn from reading history, classics, and other books, helping him to understand people and relationship between them. His life was in itself an example for others.

Whenever he lost a fight, and you could always be sure he made it a good one, he used to say: "Tomorrow is also a day." He was a lonely man, but may be greater because of it. He never asked anything for himself, and often declared that a labor leader to be successful, useful, and efficient should have nothing of his own, and want nothing for himself. He never accepted more in wages than to cover necessities and when traveling, mostly shipped before the mast.

Due to these characteristics, his keen sense of duty and devotion to the seamen's cause, he could not fail. He was truly a great man. He lived only to benefit others. His sincerity and motives could never be questioned, even by those who did not agree with his line of thought.

When Andrew Furuseth passed away in Washington on January 22, 1938, he was laid in state in the Department of Labor Building, an honor never accorded any other labor leader in the United States. According to his wish his ashes were scattered on the ocean as far from land as possible. He came from a seafaring nation, suffered and fought, as freemen always will when necessary.

I have a feeling that wherever ships float old Andy is still with his beloved seamen in their fight for peace, security, and freedom.

Since Andrew Furuseth's time, material achievements have brought changes in international relations and have created new and wonderful opportunities for further progress and welfare of humanity. The seafarers, having gained freedom through him, are well fitted to promote universal respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all human beings without distinction of race, language, or religion. They contact all kinds of people and for the seamen, this world of ours is really one.

In their opinion material achievements should be followed by better international understanding and cooperation.

Mankind's capacity for creative work, should be more displayed in the organization of international life, so that freedom and peace may prevail. This must be done, because today, as in Andrew Furuseth's time, the longing for freedom and security is still the predominant desire of all people.

Many years of war and strife between nations has taught us how precious freedom really is and how easy it can be lost. We have realized that life cannot be lived without freedom. That is why the seafarers and their trade-unions always have been partisans of world progress and emancipation, and why they cannot tolerate concentration camp regimes. There is something greater than peace, and we must be ready to fight for it as men like Furuseth did before us.

We have seen destruction of free trade-unions behind the iron curtain, where freedom is nothing more than a memory. Existing conditions impose strict duties on all free labor. A choice must be made between freedom and servitude. Free labor all around the world has made that choice. The Norwegian Seamen's union together with all other affiliations of the International Transportworkers Federation have taken measures to ensure safe delivery of arms under the Atlantic Treaty, without delay and sabotage. The action of the United Nations in Korea has full support. The ideals and principles for which the United Nations are fighting will not be surrendered. The International Transportworkers Federation and all its affiliates are determined to fight all plans to misuse the seafarers for political ends, and are prepared to take counteraction against all subversive activities and all attempts to destroy free trade-unions.

Andrew Furuseth recognized that background knowledge was essential for those who wanted to build wisely for the future. Much can be learned from reading the history of great men, their achievements and what they fought and often died for. The memory of men like Andrew Furuseth will inspire to give greater and better services to mankind. If he had lived today I am quite certain that he would have been a leader among freedom loving people, because of all men that have dedicated themselves to the welfare of humanity, the name of Andrew Furuseth will always be among the first. He would no doubt be as confident in victory today as he was before, because he would know that he was on the right side and fighting a just cause.

I like to think about Furuseth as a teacher and great humanitarian. His teaching has shown that peace, together with economic and social freedom and security can be won, as long as men are willing to fight for it. I don't say this can be done overnight, but it can and will be done through cooperation between all freedom loving nations and through unity of labor, national as well as international.

Andrew Furuseth has in many ways shown us how to fight and what to fight for. He has given us great hopes and great claims, but we have also inherited his fight for freedom and prosperity. It is because of Andrew Furuseth and men like him that we believe in ourselves, in the future and the cause we are fighting for.

Mr. GRAVINA. In conclusion, I have been asked to read a tribute to Mr. Andrew Furuseth by Mr. George W. Blakeley, licensed marine engineer and intimate friend of Mr. Furuseth:

"It is indeed a privilege and a pleasure to say a few words in honor of Mr. Andrew Furuseth, one of the world's greatest men. He was a giant in crusading for human rights through a social justice that would be void of communistic or of other dictatorial elements, whether of the red, the brown, or the black variety.

"I first met Mr. Furuseth in 1919, during the seamen's strike in New Orleans, and as the years rolled by I came to realize his greatness. He gave of himself without thought of self-gain or egotism, so that his fellow men could enjoy some of the blessings of life that I am sure our good Lord so intended.

"He was indeed a rare jewel in unionism, and in explaining a union to me, he once said, and I quote, 'A union has three important duties to fulfill:

"'1. It must be fair to the employer,

"'2. It must be fair to the employee,

"'3. It must be fair to the employer's customers, the consumers of either merchandise or services.'

"A union must stand for cooperation and fairness, and for the greatest good of all concerned. For this kind of union, Andrew Furuseth devoted his life.

"Today, in a world that is worshiping materialism, in a world of mass murder, and in a world that is forgetting God, our country and the entire world are in dire need of men like Andrew Furuseth who could lead men back to justice for their fellow man through God. Even as I speak, the world seems bent on a complete catastrophe by atheists who will exert every effort to enslave all people, or to bring the world around them down in chaos.

"Andrew Furuseth began a crusade against human enslavers back in 1887, and never once relented his energies in that crusade.

"We are very unfortunate that we did not heed his advice many years ago in guarding against human enslavers."

A Tribute to the Soil of the State of Iowa by Arthur Orr, One of Its Native Sons

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, there has just come to my notice a very fervent tribute to the soil of my State which I believe is worthy to be permanently inscrolled in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is the work of one who has been an employee of this House of Representatives for more than 30 years. I refer to Arthur Orr, who, in point of length of service, is the senior clerk of the House Committee on Appropriations. He is well known by a very large number of the Members because for upward of 25 years he was assigned to the subcommittee in charge of the Agriculture Department appropriation bill.

His tribute to the soil of the great State of Iowa is contained in a letter written more than 15 years ago to his niece, then Miss Margaret Holler, of Van Horne, Iowa. It is my privilege to insert a copy of that letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

Mr. Orr was born in Woodbury County, Iowa, but spent much of his boyhood in my district on a farm near the town of Thurman in Fremont County, where he attended the Thurman public school. He grew up "between the Iowa corn rows," and he knows whereof he speaks of the soil of his native State. Mr. Orr has performed his very responsible duties here as a servant of the people with honor and distinction. He is a fine example of a true Iowan. I am sure his old friends and schoolmates of Thurman, Iowa, will be happy to know that Arthur Orr is in good health and has not forgotten Iowa, his native State. The letter to his niece follows:

ARLINGTON, VA., January 16, 1934.

Miss MARGARET HOLLER,

Van Horne, Iowa.

DEAR NIECE: Several months ago I received from you a small package which you had sent me through the mail. Upon opening the package, I discovered a toy truck, the body of which was occupied by a small burlap bag filled with soil.

I then recalled that during your visit with us the winter before I had told you about the poor qualities of the soil here in Arlington County, Va., and of the difficulties and bitter disappointment experienced by one who had grown up between the Iowa corn rows, and who later in life took up his residence in the Old Dominion State and undertook to do a bit of gardening in the back yard or innocently planted a shrub in the front yard with the expectation that, without other measures, the plants would flourish. I think I told you how often I have longed for a truckload of good, old Iowa soil, which requires no amendment or improvement, and which was endowed by Providence at the time the world was created with all the qualities necessary to produce plant life in boundless abundance.

It is not my purpose to cast any aspersions upon the State of Virgina because, perchance, it is not blessed with soil of the unsurpassing degree of fertility which characterizes that of the States in the Mississippi Valley. Aside from being the Mother of States and the Mother of Presidents, Virginia enjoys a still greater distinction in my esteem because it is the birthplace of my father. That fact alone is sufficient to endear it to me forever.

When I opened the package and discovered its contents, I recalled what I had said to you on this subject during your visit and I realized that my eyes were beholding once more the soil of my native State. I cannot adequately describe the emotions stirred within my breast by your thoughtful act. It was but a small amount of earth, less than a teacupful, and yet the very sight of it recalled the happiest days of my life. In fancy, I lived again the joyous days of childhood and the romantic and glamorous years of youth and early manhood.

It was on that soil my mother gave me birth. It was that soil, untouched as yet by plowshare or other implement of civilized man, which my father, in the bright morning of his early manhood, tilled and sowed and reaped in the providence of God. On that soil he laid the foundations of the humble home, the memory of which is dearer to me than all else besides. In that home, at the knees of a God-fearing mother and a devout father, neither schooled in the learning of man-made institutions, but both richly endowed by providence with the inherent wisdom of the ages, I learned the fundamental precepts which are the essentials of an abundant life.

In that home, and on the soil upon which it rested, they labored and toiled and sacrificed to the end that their children might have better advantages in life than had been theirs. In that home I was blessed with the companionship of brothers and sisters as dear and sweet as has ever been vouchsafed to any human being.

On that soil, stood the little red school house where we spent the happiest days of our childhood, learned to sit at the feet of wisdom. On that soil, I came to manhood's full estate and consummated the rendezvous with life. On that soil, I found the dear, sweet girl who has made the past quarter century the sweetest period of my whole existence and without whom life would be a barren and dreary waste.

From that soil, the vicissitudes of fate decreed, almost two decades ago, I should depart; and, although I dearly love my present abiding place, the State of my birth shall ever remain the Mecca of my fancy and affections.

I am deeply indebted to you for the priceless souvenir of my genesis which came that day in the little toy truck. The truck has enriched the life of my young son whose vivid imagination wields a sorcery whereby it is translated into a real, 10-ton juggernaut of the public highway. But that little bit of soil which came in the truck now reposes in an urn and graces the mantelpiece. It is the most precious item in the lares et penates of the Orr domicile.

How often do I gaze upon it, as upon a crystal, wherein I can see the billowing fields of corn, the cattle on a thousand hills, and the myriad cities and towns where dwell the favorites of a beneficent providence. How often does its pleasing contemplation bring vividly to mind the inspired words of the poet:

Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said,
"This is my own, my native land!"

With eternal gratitude to my dear niece for the little act which has so enriched my life and so measurably enhanced its felicity, I remain, with great affection,

Your uncle,

ARTHUR ORR.

Taxation of Alcoholic Beverages

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I append herewith an address recently delivered by Mr. Edwin B. Hock, director, Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control, State of New Jersey, and president of the National Conference of State Liquor Administrators, to the annual dinner of the Hudson-Bergen County Retail Liquor Stores Association, at the Hotel Astor, New York City.

The address follows:

The last time I had the pleasure of addressing your association was at the annual banquet a year ago at the Waldorf-Astoria. Most of those in attendance tonight will recall that your yearbook on that occasion was devoted to the theme of sincerity on fair trade and mark-up. At that time liquor administrators and the liquor industry were deeply concerned with the problem of the orderly distribution of an abundance of merchandise in the face of an increasingly competitive market and a trend toward deflationary price adjustment in commodities other than alcoholic beverages. It was feared that the heavy impost of taxes on alcoholic beverages might well place your industry in a most disadvantageous position.

Many events have occurred during the last year, however, and tonight our Nation is again faced with a national emergency. In effect, the field has been reversed. Whereas a year ago we were concerned with a trend toward deflationary economy, today we are witnessing one of the most inflationary periods in our Nation's history and are faced with a proposed across-the-board increase in alcoholic beverage taxes.

It is of this problem of an increase in taxes that I will speak briefly tonight. It is to be clearly understood that what I say here reflects only my own personal views and does not purport to represent the opinion or attitude of the National Conference of State Liquor Administrators, of which I am president, or its members.

Alcoholic-beverage laws are both permissive and prohibitive. Licensing laws are permissive in that certain persons are permitted to manufacture, distribute, and sell alcoholic beverages at designated places and are prohibitive in that they deny all others the right to traffic in liquor. Prohibition laws are, of course, supposed to prohibit. In the face of these laws, however, Licensed Beverage Industries released, only a week ago, a special study of illegal distilling in the United States high-lighting two very startling conclusions: (1) That the producing capacity of illegal stills seized by Federal, State, and local enforcement officials during 1949 amounted to almost 120,000 gallons more per day than the daily new whisky produced in that year by the legal, taxpaying, distilled-spirits industry; and (2) that illegal distilling is becoming an increasingly big business in this country.

Why does the illicit manufacture of liquor persist 17 years after repeal, and why are we now threatened with an even greater increase in this illegal activity. The answer has to do with the heavy taxes upon alcoholic beverages. In this connection, it is interesting to review the Federal tax picture on distilled spirits since December 6, 1933. On that date the Federal tax on a proof gallon of distilled spirits was $1.10. Thereafter the tax was increased to amounts as follows: January 12, 1934, $2; January 1, 1938, $2.25; January 1, 1940, $3; October 1, 1941; $4; November 1, 1942, $6; and April 1, 1944, $9. When taking into consideration other levies such as Federal occupational and rectification taxes and State and local taxes and license fees, the burden totals today nearly $12 per gallon and, if the proposed $3 increase were to be adopted, the tax burden would become almost $15 per gallon. And, of course, this does not include the costs of production, aging, bottling, blending, rectifying, and of distributing to wholesaler, retailer, and consumer.

It is generally accepted that illegal liquor can be produced and distributed to the consumer under current conditions for $1 a gallon or even less. Obviously this wide differential presents an open invitation to violation and evasion of the law. In this connection it is reported that Governor Driscoll, our former State commissioner of alcoholic beverage control, told the Association of Chosen Freeholders at its annual dinner on February 5 that a sharp increase in alcoholic beverage taxes would certainly result in more bootlegging with a resultant tax loss to the States and an increase in the cost of law enforcement.

It is interesting to note that as early as February 1935 the late Commissioner Burnett recommended, in his annual report to the Governor and Legislature of the State of New Jersey, that Congress be memorialized to reduce radically the Federal tax. In making such recommendation the Commissioner said:

"As it stands, it is a protective tariff for the bootlegger * * * As was said in the inaugural message: 'The constant demand will therefore be automatically diverted into legitimate channels, and will prove again the time-tested truth that a lower tax, widely distributed, produces more revenue than a high tax the incidence of which falls solely upon a special class.'"

This recommendation was made at a time when the Federal tax was a mere $2 per proof gallon. It may be wondered what Commissioner Burnett would think today about a proposed Federal tax of $12 per proof gallon.

In the light of our past and present experiences it is reasonable to assume that any further increase would encourage a greater increase in the illegal manufacture of distilled spirits. Obviously, both Federal and State governments would be harassed by illegal manufacturing and distribution of alcoholic beverages on an even wider scale. A natural result would be an increase in the costs of law enforcement which could bring about a need for greater tax revenues to the Federal Government and the States.

It is heartening to note that Federal officials are showing an awareness to the dangers of further increase in alcoholic beverage taxes. An Associated Press release from Washington, published in the Newark Evening News on February 19, reports Chairman DOUGHTON of the House Ways and Means Committee as stating, "Heavier liquor taxes may very likely make collections much more difficult to enforce. I think it will depend on how closely we can keep after the moonshiners. It may be that we will have to have a great many more enforcement officers."

Mr. DOUGHTON's observation is well taken. A further increase in taxes would necessarily result in higher prices to the consumer. With more and more consumers resorting to illegal sources for their alcoholic beverages the Government's revenue would not expand; it would shrink. Enactment of the proposed tax increase would not repeal the law of diminishing returns.

I believe that serious consideration should be given to the financial burden placed upon the liquor industry, particularly the small retailer. An additional increase of $3 on distilled spirits would mean that every licensee would need approximately 25 percent more money to finance his business. Obviously this would place an onerous load upon thousands of small licensees throughout the Nation and would probably force many of them to go out of business.

Substantially every State where the sale of alcoholic beverages is legalized has in its law a provision that one of the primary duties of its liquor administration is the "promotion of temperance." I am convinced that liquor administration can best carry out this duty where there is an orderly distribution of alcoholic beverages to members of the public who wish to purchase this commodity and where the licit beverages are made available at a reasonable cost. Our years under prohibition were the most intemperate in our history. Inordinately high taxes do not have the sound of prohibition but I feel sure that a further increase in Federal taxes would not result in greater temperance.

I do not believe that members of the liquor industry are lacking in patriotism. We all realize that an emergency such as our country faces today requires increased revenue to meet military needs. It does not follow, however, that a lion's share of increased revenue must fall upon an industry which already carries so heavy a tax burden. In my opinion, even greater revenue than is anticipated by the presently proposed increase could be obtained by providing greater facilities for the enforcement of collection of present taxes and by imposing more severe penalties against violators. The problem will not be solved by merely increasing the tax on a commodity when more than 50 percent of the available supply escapes without tax.

Stalin's Slave System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I include herewith an article entitled "Stalin's Slave System" appearing in the March issue of the American Federationist, written by Johannes Mihkelson, taken from the International Free Trade Union News. Johannes Mihkelson was a leading figure in the trade-union and political movements of Estonia. He went into exile when his country was grabbed by the Kremlin.

The article follows:

STALIN'S SLAVE SYSTEM

(By Johannes Mihkelson)

The truth about the Soviet system of forced labor is gradually spreading throughout the world. No longer is it possible to conceal the fact that, among the many millions of Soviet slave laborers, over 10,000,000 persons at Koloma, Vorkuta, and other educational establishments in the Soviet Arctic are slowly but surely being starved and worked to death. The absence of medical attention is only hastening that process.

All this is part of the Soviet system, which could not exist without slave labor. Communist state capitalism ends in the one-way street of terrorism which seeks its victims even among persons in leading positions.

The tempo of work in the Soviet Union is stepped up through Stakhanovite methods and incessant Socialist competitions. There is always some reason for such competitions—celebrating the October revolution, marking Red army or Red navy day, hailing the Stalinist railroad workers. But whatever the reason, the purpose is always the same—to increase per capita output at any cost.

Of late a new slogan has been forced on the Soviet people—the Stockholm "peace appeal." Over and over again, all Soviet speakers and papers refer to this appeal and call upon the whole nation to safeguard "peace."

What all this emphasis actually represents is nothing more than a summons for one and all to work still harder in increasing their production. Propaganda meetings throughout the country underscore the Soviet people's obligation to build enormous power stations at such places as Stalingrad and Kuibishev.

All Estonian metal works have received strict orders to have material for the construction of these Russian power stations. The metal works of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania must provide the new stations with technical equipment, and other plants must contribute to the goal by fulfilling their production targets 2 months ahead of schedule. Under this program, fishermen must catch more fish, collective-farm peasants must produce more fodder for livestock, workers in stocking factories must turn out more hosiery.

Moscow is being transformed into a port connected with five seas. The Kuibishev project is making the upper reaches of the Volga navigable, while at Stalingrad dikes are under construction to do the same thing for the Volga's central portions. The schedule for these undertakings calls for their completion in 1955–56. The Volga-Don Canal must be finished in 1952.

The power stations at Stalingrad, Turkmenia and Kuibishev—with the latter aimed to be the largest in the world—are intended to solve the problem of transportation and of power supply at the same time. It should be borne in mind that, because of the shortage of electric power, the Soviet Union cannot produce the most highly modernized weapons. It is therefore pertinent to ask whether the new giant construction projects will be devoted exclusively to "peaceful ends."

The Soviet actions for safeguarding peace have assumed some strange forms. At Karula in Estonia, for instance, 40 brooms and 3 wooden spades were produced, according to their makers, "in honor of peace." In another town a Russian officer of the last war proclaimed that his answer to "the imperialist warmongers" would be to finish the whitewashing of the school building "before the day of the October revolution."

The Russian-language Sovyetskaya Estonya has castigated the Estonian workers for laziness harmful to the Russian economy and rebuked the Estonian-language Communist papers for being remiss in "safeguarding peace" and in unmasking the secret plans of "the American imperialists." It has demanded that the Communist Party tighten its controls over all Estonian publications.

The Soviet "love of peace" is exemplified in Estonia by establishment of the army's voluntary auxiliary corps, a country-wide body which has been assigned the task of organization and training Estonian youth in marksmanship, motor maintenance and transportation, radio and telephone mechanics, and other auxiliary services.

In addition to labor exacted for "safeguarding peace," the Soviet workers are confronted with another vast job—that of clearing up the ruins of the war-devastated cities. This work is without remuneration and is done on Sundays or holidays and after regular working hours during the week.

As a rule, such efforts are voluntary, but it is unnecessary to explain that no workers would dare to stay at home when the personnel of his plant or enterprise is collectively ordered out for clearance work.

In Estonia alone last year 4,700,000 unremunerated hours of this kind were worked, resulting in the clearance of 76,700 cubic meters of ruins and 525,400 square meters of surface.

Another form of unremunerated work among Soviet workers is that of the "chiefdom." This is an "honor" conferred on each major factory enterprise, making it the head of a kolkhoz (collective farm), thus imposing on its employees the obligation of assisting that particular kolkhoz. Usually the workers are taken out to their kolkhoz on Sundays or holidays by trucks to help in harvesting or other types of agricultural labor. Since all this work is "voluntary," there is, of course, no compensation for the workers so "honored."

It need not be pointed out that in democratic countries collective bargaining agreements contain detailed provisions concerning payment of workers for overtime, shift work and night work. It would be unthinkable for a worker in a democracy to be ordered out for unpaid labor at any time. In the Soviet Union, however, such proceedings take place in quite a normal way since Soviet trade unions have no influence in protecting the interests of Russian workers.

The Soviet trade unions can only help in propagandizing those actions which are ordered and organized by the Communist Party leadership. Collective agreements in Russia stipulate more duties than rights for the workers.

The Stockholm "peace appeal" is essentially a propaganda campaign to accelerate the tempo of work and to improve the output of the Soviet heavy armament industries. The fine slogans and public declarations to the Russian masses are only a disguise for the completely different purposes harbored by the Soviet dictators.

The American Merchant Marine, Life Line of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith for publication in the Appendix of the RECORD the following very illuminating address delivered at the San Francisco Bay Area Ports and Transportation Conference, recently held in San Francisco, by Vice Adm. E. L. Cochrane, United States Navy, retired, Federal Wartime Administrator:

Gentlemen, it is well known that only a poor mechanic quarrels with his tools; and that it is only a poor speaker who refuses to face up to his assigned subject. There are, of course, two lines of escape for these poor speakers. One course is to change the subject to suit one's own fancy, but the second avenue is more effective, if less artistic; namely, to ignore it entirely.

To be doubly sure I plan to use both methods.

As you see by the program, I am scheduled to speak on The American Merchant Marine—Life Line of American Port Commerce.

I'll stand on the American Merchant Marine part of that title, but I want to shorten the second half from Lifeline of American Port Commerce by scratching the final n on American and scratching the last words completely, thus, the American Merchant Marine, Life Line of America.

I know that I am speaking at a Bay Area Ports and Transportation Conference, and I am all for better ports and better port facilities, and more business for San Francisco. As a matter of fact, I saw on Monday afternoon two of the finest pier developments I have seen in this country. But, gentlemen, if the debate today is on the subject Resolved That the Merchant Marine Is for the Benefit of Ports, I am on deck to take the negative side.

The merchant marine is for the benefit not only of our own great Nation but for western civilization, and I will grant that the ports are an indispensable link between the ships and the nations which they serve.

It is inspiring to see so many organizations and so many people here today devoting themselves to the development of the ports of the bay area. I regret that it has not been possible for me to attend all of these sessions for yours is a subject of critical and increasing importance if we are to get the most from our ships. Days in port are lost days in the earning year of a ship. As ship speed increases, turn-around times should be shortened if the real benefit of sea speed is to accrue.

Our ports for several reasons are not as efficient as they might be—but it is not my intention to dwell on that score today. You are far better qualified in that field than I.

It is always pleasant for me to return to California, my native heath. It is doubly pleasant to come here to look at ships and shipyards and to talk to shipping men and to shipbuilders, for my whole life has been spent in that association.

I had retired from active duty in the Navy in 1947, to be sure, but not because of loss of interest in ships. I admit very frankly, too, that I resisted with full earnestness being drawn back to Washington to become Maritime Administrator. I came finally only after I became fully convinced that our country faces a threat more serious than any it has faced before in its history.

I am not one who holds the situation to be hopeless by any means. It is crystal clear to me, however, that unless we establish ourselves in such strength that the Commies will not risk an attack and unless we make it so clear to them that we are taking no more nonsense on the fringes, they will continue to whittle at the edges of western strength until it is exhausted.

It must, also, be held continuously in mind that it is not enough merely to fend off military attack from outside our borders. We must so husband our economy that our way of doing business outlasts theirs; for clearly, if our economy breaks down, they could win the war without firing a shot.

But what has this to do with ships and ports? Ships are truly the life line not only of America but of democracy. We are not sufficient unto ourselves. Nothing could be more dangerous to us than an attempt to withdraw into a shell like a giant hermit crab.

We need the raw materials of the world. We need markets for our products and outlets for the talents, ingenuity, and enterprise of the generations of young Americans who are coming behind us. Those seem like trite truisms, but I am confronted today with the possibility of having to see that bulk cargoes to the volume of over 15,000,000 tons are moved at sea.

This over-all job of development of America must be better done than the British did their job over the last 100 years. It is shocking to contemplate that in winning two world wars, with help, to be sure—but still winning them—Great Britain has lost an empire. They relied upon the hypotheses that history repeats itself—that they could continue to muddle through, that they could continue to knock off for tea each afternoon at 4. We are breaking ships out of the Reserve Fleets today to move shiploads of coal to England. They awakened during the war to discover that their technology had not kept pace—to find our ships out-steaming, out-shooting, out-maneuvering theirs—to find their factories not adequate to handle the war demands. They still have courage and ingenuity and I agree with Winnie Churchill that we cannot discard them. My point is solely that complacency has even less place in a nation in 1951. No more in the United States than anywhere else.

Our position in the world—a position forced upon us, to be sure, by circumstances, demands courage. It requires progress. We have staggering world responsibilities. We cannot desert the Western European nations from whence the American family has sprung. No more could we survive without ocean transport to the outposts of the world than we could survive were all the means of land traffic between the States and cities obliterated. The recent "sickness" of the switchmen on eastern railroads has given us a clear picture of the mess which would result.

The more progress is made in developing the resources of the backward areas of the world, the better off both they and we are—but only if the development is wisely done. Exploitation will react adversely. Wise assistance will bring untold dividends.

Ships are the backbone of this traffic of development. Air lanes are essential, too. We learned how essential the ships are in 1914–18 (World War I). We taught this lesson to South America during World War II. They are today demanding support for their ships in various schemes. One had difficulty in quarreling with their desires when we ourselves were forced into building so heavily in 1914 to 1918, and again in 1939 to 1945. Surely, in all of this, we must be convinced, even if a few of our countrymen are not, that America must continue to own and operate its lifeline of ships.

Since this is my first visit here since the establishment of the two new maritime agencies to replace the Maritime Commission, I want to give you a brief report on what's been done during that 6-month period.

You will recall that the President's Reorganization Plan No. 21 did away with the five-man Maritime Commission and transferred its duties to the Secretary of Commerce. Under him two new agencies have been established, the Federal Maritime Board and the Maritime Administration, to which the maritime functions have been delegated.

This arrangement is working exceedingly well. The jobs of these two agencies are those of the old Maritime Commission—the administration of the basic shipping laws. The new set-up is, however, better geared for action.

You must remember that the Maritime Commission had a chance to function under favorable conditions. Administration by committee has been tried many times. It has, so far as I can recall, never continued to run when the first blush of enthusiasm has faded.

After the honeymoon period of scarcely 2 years in 1937–38, during which action was being taken to lay down a modern merchant fleet, along came the war in Europe, abruptly changing the emphasis. From that time on through VJ-day the old commission's job under "Jerry" Land was to help win a war. Joining hands with the shipbuilding and ship-operating industries, that mission was accomplished with typical Jerry Land-Howard Vickery success.

Then the Maritime Commission settled down to face the painful postwar complexities of cutting back a major arm of warfare to peacetime size through a period of postwar uncertainties from which you gentlemen have in many cases not yet been freed.

Even a well-thought-out organization would have its hands full. Gentlemen, the old Maritime Commission had my sympathy, and I speak from an intimate knowledge of both its achievements and its shortcomings. To a member of the President's Advisory Committee, appointed to look into the Nation's merchant marine problems in 1947, it was very apparent that such an organization could have no assurance of continued success.

The Chairman of the old Commission had responsibility without authority, and even the simplest administrative problems were pitched on the table for discussion when action was the need. On matters of review, the clear-headed deliberations of a quasi-judicial board are vital. But in the day-to-day operations of a big business corporation, the board of directors cannot usurp the duties of its president. The wonder is that the Maritime Commission accomplished as much as it did—and I should like to take off my hat (my two hats) to many of its accomplishments.

On the Federal Maritime Board we now have three members. Under the new rules, we are able to have men who know something about ships and shipping.

Right here let me say that one of the great contributions the west coast has made to the American Merchant Marine was in providing the Government with Al Gatov, so well known to all of you here as the recent president of the Pacific American Steamship Association.

His very practical and thorough knowledge of shipping has supplied a sound base for many important decisions made by the Federal Maritime Board, and on the theory that if I could wear two hats, he could too, he has agreed to serve also as a special assistant to the Maritime Administrator. His advice and counsel have gone into every phase of our planning for a National Shipping Authority, of which more later.

The second member of the Board also contributes greatly toward a balanced team. He is Mr. Robert W. Williams, of Baltimore. Bob Williams is a widely known and highly respected admiralty lawyer. You can well imagine the value of such a gentleman to the Board.

The third member can at least speak in a vocabulary understandable to shipbuilders, in strength as well as in technical phraseology.

While the Federal Maritime Board is charged with the regulatory powers of the old Maritime Commission, plus the sensitive and debated responsibility of determining the subsidies under the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, the Maritime Administration inherited the administrative tasks, the housekeeping chores of its predecessor.

We have had a thorough reorganization. But we have retained the valuable men of the old Maritime Commission staff, and are striving to provide them a better environment in which to work. Some new faces have been added, and I am happy to say that the whole staff is responding. They have made great progress.

I am proud of our accomplishments in 6 months' time.

I came to Washington under no great desire of my own. The academic life at MIT, watching the development of these youngsters who are the very future of this country, was completely satisfying to me. But the call to duty was too much for an old fire horse to resist.

My immediate and temporary predecessor, John Koehler, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, had been putting the new machinery together, and even before I arrived in Washington we had to use it, not for the long-haul peacetime program, but for breaking out ships for the Korean emergency.

As you know, we have maintained the pattern of private operation to handle this job, and have added to the privately operated fleet a total now of 130 Victory ships under bareboat charter to the industry for use by the MSTS.

I am proud of the fact that never, since the show started, has MSTS been delayed by the lack of a ship on berth which they had requested from us. As a matter of fact, we have them ready in advance of their needs many times, and are in that situation today.

Over the last 6 months we have added to our troopship capacity. The construction of new passenger ships has eased somewhat the immediate need for troopships. Other troopers are already in service under the MSTS; still others are in the reserve fleets. There is a bank of passenger ships now in operation under the American flag and under the flags of the other nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Right at this point, I imagine no San Francisco audience could fail to surmise, "What about the Mariposa and Monterey leaning up against the docks in Alameda?"

I looked over those ships yesterday, and may say at this moment that we are well aware of their value as troopships. The Navy has requested us to requisition them, but there are several matters—each with a dollar sign in front of it—that must be resolved before they can return to sea again.

Now we come to the third, and a most important, activity in which we have been engaged during the past 6 months; new ships.

With the rapid break-out of vessels for the Korean campaign, it became crystal clear to me that we needed more and faster ships behind the reserve supply of Libertys in the laid-up fleets.

I had the privilege of serving, while at MIT, in company with a number of scientists, at the request of the Navy, on research work dealing with the effect of new weapons upon seapower. I break no confidence when I say that atom missiles, modern subs, new torpedoes and new bomber planes force a reevaluation of the chances of survival of the slow-moving convoys used in the last wars.

Some Americans—those who look at numbers and not at facts—believe that we have plenty of ships. But even a cursory analysis of these ships shows that they are today entirely inadequate to carry critical cargoes of men and munitions into the forward areas in time of war because they are too slow and too vulnerable.

Even the Victory's are not fast enough, and we have been reactivating them at such a pace that we can see the last of them going into service very shortly. This will leave us with only the 10-knot Liberty's, and that just will not do. Out of this the new Mariner class grew, and just 6 months to the day after I took the oath of office contracts to build the first 25 of them were awarded. They will be fine ships and will put us in the lead in the dry-cargo type.

Twenty-five is not a large number—but the interest of our congressional leaders and those within the administration has been heartening indeed. We are on our way.

No; the west coast yards did not get any of this first block. For this I make no apologies, for I know that with a little reflection, you will understand why none were allocated to the west coast yards. In the first place, we are not yet allocating ships for construction. In the second place, prospective west coast bidders were not sharpening pencils quite enough to meet the competition.

I can understand the disappointment of your municipalities, your labor organizations, your shipbuilders—but if you are disheartened, you are not the kind of people I am sure you are.

The west coast can, and did, build good ships and plenty of them, and they can, and will, I hope, build them again. But it must, in the last analysis, be you, out here, who will find the way. We will help to the best of our ability, but in the end it will be capital and labor working together out here who will decide to get into this pilot program leading the way to a real shipbuilding effort in this country.

We want west coast shipbuilding; I am confident that we shall have it.

More has been happening. We are well advanced in our mobilization planning of the American merchant marine to ready it for possible war service.

In spite of the fact that American boys are dying in Korea by enemy bullets, the Nation has not had the psychological kick—the Pearl Harbor attack—to jolt us out of a peacetime economy into a wartime operation. We don't know our own strength. We have been conducting this affair overseas, and at the same time maintaining the greatest peacetime production the world has ever seen. This fact is recognized and we have very able men led by Charles Wilson steering our enormous industrial potential into a new area. In the merchant marine, we are meeting the demands of the Defense Department for shipping, but at the same time handling an expanding commercial activity.

But much of that expansion is in a category not entirely disconnected from our national defense, for it is concerned with the welfare of friendly countries, with partners in a free community of nations which must battle the common enemy. This, plus the obvious probability of increased military demands, calls for the organization of the United States merchant marine to fill its proper role in our security effort.

In other words, we had to put together the over-all organization that would enable the merchant marine to function as the fourth arm of national defense, in company with the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

In World War II, this was called the War Shipping Administration, which after its duties were discharged, was disbanded. The agency now being readied is the NSA—the National Shipping Authority.

The merchant marine, unlike the Armed Forces, does not have an organized reserve. For its manpower we must rely upon the maritime industry—management and labor. We met with both groups, and based upon the nucleus of manpower within the Maritime Administration, have put together the names of many of those qualified men who will serve when needed. I have selected a highly qualified member of our own staff, Charles H. McGuire, to head the NSA when it goes into active operation.

Already, one vital segment of the merchant marine is organized and operating during this transition period to provide essential service to the Armed Forces. A voluntary tanker group composed of practically every tanker operator in the industry has pooled its qualified tonnage. This group, headed by an able tankerman, Mr. William Dunning, can and will easily gear into the NSA operation when needed.

One big task in particular is just over the horizon which may start typical NSA-type operations in a matter of days—that of carrying grain to India, and returning with cargoes of essential ores. All the programs will apparently call for activating 30 to 40 ships a month for a considerable period. For this purpose we intend to use the Liberty ships in the reserve fleets. This, I do not need to remind you, will bring more activity to the ship repair yards. The chances are that we will operate these ships on general agency agreements, utilizing American shipping companies as Government agents.

The National Production Authority has listened very attentively to our needs, and has approved the provision of approximately 9,000 tons of steel products monthly during the second quarter of this year to shipyards for the repair and conversion of seagoing vessels.

I am tempted to go further with a list of the activity now taking place back in Washington, but we must be running out of time. I do want to say that we haven't forgotten in the rush of mobilization needs the all-important job of administering the subsidy laws and regulatory responsibilities with which we of the Maritime Administration and the Federal Maritime Board are charged.

This is the type of work, gentlemen, which those of us in Washington know all too well makes no headlines, but generates headaches. Nevertheless, it is the unhappy foundation for building a merchant marine under the American flag in many routes. I don't have to remind you of the troubled waters in which the old Maritime Commission found itself. We have got to pilot the new agencies through those waters, and I can report that our charts show increasingly improved navigation.

The new world situation, our manifest leadership in world affairs, combine to make evident the need for wise and sound administration of existing laws, and some deep and constructive thought on the need for modification of these laws. I believe that I can report progress in making more realistic our calculations of both steamship-operating subsidies and construction subsidies, and in overcoming the criticisms leveled in the past at the methods of administering these all-important subsidies.

Gentlemen, I want to wind up this talk with a very simple message. The times in which we live are very complex; but their complexity is based upon the grave responsibilities thrust upon us as a nation—the responsibility of leadership. We must not—and with God's help we will not—lose confidence in ourselves to meet them. We have production potentials greater than we can imagine. We have the climate of freedom and of great conviction in which that production can flourish.

In terms we of the American merchant marine can understand, we have the ships, and the means of producing more ships, and we have the men to sail these ships. We are better prepared than our enemies may suppose. With courage and confidence we can point today to a maritime strength which, I believe, need yield nothing to the readiness in any other field.

I am proud to be associated with it, to be even a single fiber in the life line of America.

Veterans' Administration Payments of Benefits to Recipients in Satellite Countries Frozen Pending Proof Payees Will Receive Full Value

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. O. C. FISHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, it is of interest to know that the Secretary of the Treasury is now withholding in the Treasury proceeds of United States Government checks payable to claimants who live in the satellite countries behind the iron curtain. The Treasury Department is to be commended for taking this step.

During a trip to Europe last fall a congressional group, of which I was a member, found evidence indicating that through exchange manipulations and certain actions by Communist regimes, recipients of benefit payments from the Veterans' Administration were actually getting but a portion of the actual value of their checks. On February 20, 1951, I called this to the attention of the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration. A week later, on February 27, the Secretary of the Treasury ordered all such checks to be withheld pending a determination of "a reasonable assurance that the payees will actually receive such check or warrant and be able to negotiate the same for full value."

The letter from Hon. Carl R. Gray, Jr., Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, giving information on this subject, follows:

MARCH 2, 1951.

Hon. O. C. FISHER,
House of Representatives,
Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR MR. FISHER: In response to your inquiry of February 20, 1951, I have had prepared the attached tables showing in some detail the number and amount of check certifications by the Veterans' Administration for payment to beneficiaries residing in Russia and the satellite countries during the calendar years 1948, 1949, and 1950. Certain observations on the information included may be helpful to you.

In the first place, the countries included in the list are those commonly regarded as satellite countries, except that the Russian zone of Germany, including the Russian sector of Berlin, has been omitted. Our records do not differentiate between addresses in Germany, but it may be assumed that any payments in the Russian zone would be negligible, since they may not be made to German citizens or nationals residing there. No attempt has been made to determine when the individual countries became, or ceased to be, satellite countries. Accordingly, China and Yugoslavia are included in the summary for the entire 3-year period.

Our information is derived from records of check certifications, which do not always reflect actual payments. You will recall that Public Law 828, Seventy-sixth Congress, authorizes the withholding in the Treasury of proceeds of United States Government checks "in any case in which the Secretary of the Treasury determines that postal, transportation, or banking facilities in general, or local conditions in the country to which such check or warrant is to be delivered, are such that there is not a reasonable assurance that the payee will actually receive such check or warrant and be able to negotiate the same for full value." In such cases, payments continue to be certified by the Veterans' Administration, but the proceeds of the checks issued are deposited in a special account in the Treasury. At different times during the past 3 years, some check proceeds have been so withheld, as indicated in the summary at the end of this letter.

I am sure that you will also be interested to note that the Secretary of the Treasury has just made such a determination for prospective application to Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Russian zone of occupation of Germany, and the Russian sector of occupation of Berlin, Germany. This determination is incorporated in supplement 7 to Treasury Department Circular 655, and may be found on pages 1818 and 1819 of the Federal Register, volume 16, No. 39, dated February 27, 1951.

In answer to your question about the procedure followed in the payment of such benefits, the Treasury checks are delivered to the Department of State, where they are dispatched by pouch to the United States Embassy, Legation, or consulate serving the area in which the payee resides. Our consular officials in turn forward the checks to the individual payees, or, if circumstances warrant, and the request is a reasonable one, they may ask the individual payee to come to our consular office to receive the check in person. This entire procedure has, however, been varied in some cases. Reports that beneficiaries were forced to convert dollar checks to foreign currencies at artificial rates of exchange in some countries, have led the Treasury occasionally to follow a different disbursement procedure. I am advised that disbursement vouchers certified by the Veterans' Administration for payment to beneficiaries in some satellite countries, have been forwarded to our Embassy disbursing officers abroad where checks have been drawn in the currency of the country for the equivalent of the dollars due, computed at the official rate of exchange. Full information on the extent to which this procedure has been utilized should, of course, come from the Treasury Department whose responsibility it is to make disbursements upon proper certification.

In your perusal of the attached tables, you will note that the average payments in 1948 were in general much larger than in 1950. This is due primarily to the settlement of accrued amounts due many beneficiaries in the earlier year, following the withholding of check proceeds during World War II under Public Law 828. (In the case of Russia, such settlements were still being made in 1949 and 1950 in sufficient numbers to keep the average payments relatively high.)

An important factor in the decline of the total number of payments in 1950 was an action necessarily taken by the Veterans' Administration. As you know, it is required that we obtain information from time to time bearing on the continued eligibility of the beneficiary to receive payments (e. g., reports of physical examination, reports of income, etc.). As might be expected, it has become increasingly difficult for the United States Foreign Service to conduct investigations and obtain such necessary information in Russia and the satellite countries. It has therefore been made a matter of established policy that in any case where the Department of State has been prevented from obtaining information requested by the Veterans' Administration, the award is terminated.

The data you requested are set forth in detail in the attached tables. You may find convenient, however, this simple summary of the information for the 3-year period 1948 through 1950:

Total certifications all foreign countries:

Number	2,593,095
Amount	$191,812,261.11

Total certifications U. S. S. R. and satellites:

Number	30,849
Amount	$3,265,116.54

The amount actually paid to benficiaries in Russia and the satellite countries is less than the total certifications would indicate, since the proceeds of checks to Albania have been withheld in the Treasury since October 7, 1948 and of checks to Bulgaria since March 1, 1950. Furthermore, the difficulties leading to the finding of the Secretary of the Treasury published on February 27 have resulted in a considerable number of checks being now on file in the Treasury. I am advised that the total actually paid during the 3-year period in these countries is probably nearer to $3,000,000 than to the $3,265,116.54 shown by our certifications.

I hope that you will find this information adequate. It comes to you with my personal best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

CARL R. GRAY, JR.,
Administrator.

Soviet Officials in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 7, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter and tabulations:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 20, 1951.

The Honorable THOMAS J. LANE,
House of Representatives,
Washington.

MY DEAR MR. LANE: Reference is made to your letter of March 1, 1951, acknowledged by telephone on March 9, 1951, forwarding for the Department's comment a copy of the remarks which you made in the House of Representatives on March 1. In these remarks you recommend that the official personnel which the Soviet Government sends to the United States and the travel of this personnel in the United States be placed on a reciprocal basis with regard to the number of official personnel of the United States in the Soviet Union and the travel privileges of American official personnel in that country.

Your remarks refer to two important questions concerning United States-Soviet relations which are under continual consideration in the Department. The comments of the Department with regard to these matters are presented in the following paragraphs.

The exchange of official representatives between two governments is rarely susceptible to treatment on a numerical parity basis. In almost every instance one country or the other will require a larger official establishment. Actually the variety of functions which the American Foreign Service is expected to perform, including complex visa and passport services and a wide range of reporting on political and economic subjects, is so great that the diplomatic and consular offices of the United States in any foreign country tend to be larger than that country's official representation in the United States.

An analysis of the number of Soviet officials in the United States reported to the Department of State by the Soviet Embassy up to March 5, 1951, and comparable American personnel in the Soviet Union as of the same date indicates that Soviet and United States official representation is practically on a parity basis. This analysis includes Embassy officials, correspondents, and commercial representatives of the two countries. It excludes Soviet representation to international organizations in the United States which have no counterpart in the Soviet Union.

There are enclosed two sheets which present United States official personnel in the Soviet Union and Soviet personnel in the United States as of March 5, 1951. You will note that the Soviet list carries a comparative list of Soviet personnel in the United States as of July 1, 1950. While on the face of these lists there appears to be a numerical disparity in representation in favor of the Soviet Union, an analysis of the figures gives a different picture. On March 5 the United States Government had official personnel numbering 101 with 16 dependents assigned to the American Embassy in Moscow. The Soviet counterpart of this figure is official Soviet personnel numbering 83, with 125 dependents (70 wives and 55 children) assigned to the Soviet Embassy in Washington. Thus, the United States has 13 more official employees in the American Embassy in Moscow than the Soviet Government has in the Soviet Embassy in Washington. Since no international organization of which the United States is a member has its headquarters in the Soviet Union, there can be no United States personnel in the Soviet Union comparable to the Soviet personnel assigned to the United Nations; namely, 121 (52 official employees, 38 wives, 31 children). If from the 381 total Soviet official personnel in the United States, there is subtracted 121, which is the Soviet representation, including dependents, to the United Nations, and 153 which represents Soviet dependents in the United States other than dependents of Soviet United Nations employees, the total Soviet official employees in the United States would amount to 107, 6 more than the 101 United States official employees in the Soviet Union, minus dependents.

With regard to Soviet restrictions on the travel of foreigners, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is divided into "free" and prohibited areas for diplomatic and consular personnel of foreign nations in the Soviet Union. Foreign officials on duty in Moscow may not travel more than 50 kilometers from the city limits with the exception of three points of historic interest to which foreigners may travel after appropriate notification to the foreign office. In general, all border areas and all of the central Asian republics, the Caucausus with the exception of Tbilisi, the Baltic States, and the western areas of the Ukraine and Belorussia including the capital cities of Kiev and Minsk are within the zones prohibited to foreign officials. Although most of the Siberian areas is technically "free," in practice it is greatly restricted owing to the fact that the important cities are forbidden areas. In order to travel to "free" areas foreign missions must notify the foreign office in advance of the name and the itinerary of the traveler. Under this procedure, members of the Embassy's staff in Moscow have been able to make frequent trips to "free" areas during the past 2 years.

The question of applying travel control measures to Soviet official personnel in the United States is under constant review by the United States Government agencies concerned. Restrictions upon the travel of Soviet officials will be imposed whenever it is evident that such action is in the over-all interest of the United States.

Sincerely yours,

JACK K. MCFALL,
Assistant Secretary.

American Aid to Yugoslavia Is Achieving Its Objective

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. O. C. FISHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include excerpts from a letter I recently received from an American official in Yugoslavia relative to the distribution of American food under the Yugoslav aid program. It will be recalled that during the debate on the bill some Members were apprehensive that there would be faulty distribution and that many recipients would not be informed where the aid came from. The information contained in this letter should, therefore, be welcome:

As I see it, the Tito government is the only government Yugoslavia has got and under present conditions if that government were permitted to fall, the most likely alternative would be a government set up by the Kremlin. * * *

By way of informal information, I can tell you up to this point that the American observers-supervisors operating in the country are receiving every facility and cooperation from the Yugoslav Government. These men are spotting around in key centers throughout the country from which they radiate by jeep to outlying areas. Their individual and independent reports to date indicate without exception that the Yugoslav officials at all levels are fully cooperative, that the receipt and distribution of American food stuffs is being carried out with a high degree of expedition and efficiency with no apparent evidences of discrimination. Favorable publicity continues to flow in substantial volume. I am confident that every Yugoslav knows that they are receiving American food through the generosity of the American people, and that they understand, at the same time, that this donation of food is not intended to saddle more firmly a Communist regime on their backs. * * *

A quick check this morning shows that something over 138,000 tons of American-supplied foodstuffs have entered Yugoslavia up to February 1. The bulk of this, 91,000 tons, is flour from Italy and Germany, with the balance of 19,000 of this item to arrive within the next week or 10 days. Other items that have arrived are: Beans, 16,800; Mexican canned meat, 900; powdered eggs, 3,300; corn, 8,500; barley, 9,000; lard, 8,500. We anticipate that the remaining 110,000 tons of stop-gap aid will arrive during February, with the congressional part of the program filling in closely behind.

All in all, it appears that the relief program is accomplishing its purpose up to this time. As recognized from the outset, however, the critical period will likely be the spring months when they begin to scrape the bottom of the barrel of domestically produced foodstuffs and before new crop food becomes available in any substantial quantity. One essential factor that we must bear in mind is that roughly one-third of the entire crop area of Yugoslavia is customarily planted to corn which is not harvested until late September and early October. Moreover, two-thirds of the potato crop is late planted, and like cabbage and onions, is usually not available for consumption until August and later. It is quite clear, therefore, that while our food supply program will likely have been completed by early May, the Yugoslavs will not be out of the woods until autumn, assuming a good crop year.

Mr. Speaker, I have been informed in recent days that Yugoslavia has been blessed with normal rainfall during recent weeks and that the prospects for a return to normal crop yields over there appear good for this year. Normally, Yugoslavia is an exporter of food and other agricultural products. The American aid from our surpluses appears to be accomplishing what was intended, stop-gap assistance to help tide those people over during the worst crop failure and drought that has occurred there in 50 years.

Location of Defense Plants

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. GLENN BEALL
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, under date of March 19, 1951, an article appeared in the Cumberland Evening Times, Cumberland, Md., by the columnist Peter Edson, in which he stated:

Plant location. There is today no area in which a new defense plant can be put to draw on surplus labor. Every new site selected in the future will have to be determined by a shift of labor from nonessential industry, as well as by availability of power, transportation, raw material, and housing. Projections. So far there have been no tables prepared on how many men will be needed for defense production, when and where. Projecting the employment and draft curves to show total manpower requirements is a first job of Government agencies operating under Dr. Flemming's directives.

If the Department of Defense is considering areas where there is surplus unemployment, I would like to call their attention to the present situation in Cumberland and Allegany County, Md., where there are approximately 5,000 unemployed persons at this time. In this total there are skilled, semiskilled and unskilled workers such as machinists, carpenters, chemists and chemical laboratory technicians. When these people apply to the Unemployment Compensation Division they are advised to go to other areas to seek employment. This, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, is not good either for the community or for the worker himself because 90 percent of these unemployed own their homes and naturally when they leave the local community their homes will be unoccupied and they will create a housing problem in industrial areas.

Cumberland and Allegany County are ideally situated for the establishment of a defense plant. Not only do we have ample labor but we are located on the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio and the Western Maryland Railroads with an adequate water supply from the Potomac River and the North Branch of the Potomac River and many ideal factory sites are available.

I think it would be well for the Department of Defense and the Real Estate Divisions of the Army and Navy to look into the availability of this community which is approximately 150 miles from the Nation's Capital and close to the Atlantic Seaboard.

Ethics of Public Life Seem To Be Lacking in RFC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE MEADER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Ann Arbor (Mich.) News of March 14, 1951:

ETHICS OF PUBLIC LIFE SEEM TO BE LACKING IN RFC

One thing in all walks of public life is above the law. That is ethics, the ability to tell the good from the bad, right from wrong. Nothing exactly illegal, it is said, has yet been proved in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation investigation. Maybe not, but there is abundant evidence that men—and women—used positions of public service to which they had been appointed for the sake of personal profit.

Private advantage has no place at all in the handling of the people's business. Those who find themselves so placed as to see in their responsibility for governmental operations incidental opportunity for self-enrichment have only two alternatives. The first is to lean over backward not to avail themselves of such opportunity, however innocent it seems on the surface, and to pursue the sole purpose for which they were entrusted with power—the greatest good of the greatest number.

The second alternative is to resign, recognizing that self-seeking motives may be overpowering and that their interests may be properly pursued in private life. In the latter alternative, the incumbents must forego the honor and confidence implied by acceptance of public service.

There is no law to control the inner recesses of the human conscience. There is no law that says, in so many words, the right hand should know what the left is doing. But where the law in its methodical and sometimes slow process of following society's interests leaves off, something higher which we are wont to call ethics carries on.

Personal profit is not, according to our code of ethics, consistent with governmental obligation. Do we want to see a blunting of democratic standards on which the country was founded until we expose it to the nicking and hacking of every private, selfish gain? Integrity that is rock-ribbed to the point of self-denial is the cornerstone of American political life.

Enthusiastic Milwaukee Girl Scout Leaders Doing a Great Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES J. KERSTEN
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. KERSTEN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, last Monday was the thirty-ninth anniversary of the founding of the Girl Scouts. It is well known what a worth-while work the Girl Scouts are engaged in. Today the total Girl Scout membership of the United States totals about 1,500,000 girls, ages ranging from 7 to 17.

The Girl Scouts of Milwaukee County are a particularly active council and this year again, as in the past, their entire membership of 14,000 girls—4,459 brownies, 5,911 intermediates, and 517 seniors—is busy selling Girl Scout cookies from March 10 to March 16. This year's funds will be used to equip a camp site located at Saukville, Wis., and to help finance 9 days of primitive camping for 80 senior Scouts at a site near Escanaba, Mich. Adult membership of the Milwaukee County Girl Scouts is well over 3,500 and includes leaders, assistant leaders, troop committee members, council members, district and functional members, associate scouts, and the professional staff. That so many women take part in this work indicates the excellent value of Girl Scout activities is well recognized in Milwaukee. I should like to include here an article from the Milwaukee Journal of March 1, 1951, telling of the experiences of some of the Milwaukee Girl Scout leaders:

GIRL SCOUT LEADERS FIND RESULTS WORTH THE TIME—UNDERSTANDING FAMILY SEEMS TO BE AMONG PREREQUISITES FOR A GOOD TROOP CHIEF

Daughters and an understanding husband are among prerequisites for a Girl Scout troop leader, the example of six volunteers seems to indicate.

They are among the 1,200 leaders and assistants who organize and direct troop activity for some 10,000 Girl Scouts in Milwaukee County. On the average, the little-known planners give 4 to 10 hours a week to the job.

Mrs Weikko Leppanen, 1921 North Thirty-second Street, says she owes her start in scouting to one of her three daughters. About 3 years ago Patricia, now 17, was ready to "fly up" from Brownie to intermediate status. Patricia discovered, however, that there was no intermediate troop in the neighborhood in which she could enroll.

TWO ORGANIZE TROOP

Long interested in scouting, Mrs. Leppanen decided it was time she "got in the swim" herself. She and another woman took the 16-hour course in group leadership necessary for Girl Scout leaders. Then they organized an intermediate troop.

Since that time Mrs. Leppanen has had another daughter, Jean, 15, in her intermediate and senior troops. She now has Susan, 9, in the Brownie troop, No. 141, that she supervises at St. Thomas Aquinas' church.

Mrs. Leppanen says that each age level offers a particular challenge. "I miss my big girls now because they're so full of the dickens," she relates. "But I love the Brownies. They are so loyal and you don't have to give them 50 good reasons for one move."

The charm of intermediates is that they are beginning to assume responsibilities, according to Mrs. Leppanen. "They learn to think for themselves and work toward a self-realization."

Scout leadership has been her college education, Mrs. Leppanen said. "I've taken so many courses that I could paper a room with my qualifying cards. It's been a satisfying job."

CALLS IT RECREATION

In addition to leading the Brownie troop, Mrs. Leppanen is neighborhood scout chairman and serves as a counselor at a summer Girl Scout day camp.

How many hours does she give to all her scout duties? "My husband would say every hour," she retorts. She believes that the scout organization should initiate a "husband appreciation night."

For Mrs. George Graetz, 618 Hawthorne Avenue, South Milwaukee, who grew up in scouting, leadership of an intermediate troop in South Milwaukee is recreation. Her oldest daughter, Susan, 10, is in her troop.

Her other daughters are Mary, 8, who is a Brownie, and Sally, 4. "Even Sally has had some scouting experience," Mrs. Graetz tells. "With the rest of the family she went to Girl Scout day camp last summer. But she stayed in the nursery."

TAUGHT PHYSICAL EDUCATION

Before she was married, Mrs. Graetz was an instructor of physical education. She entered scouting when she was 12 and became a leader in 1930 in Duluth, Minn. She droped out to raise a family after her marriage in 1938. She resumed troop leadership in 1944.

Mrs. Graetz feels that Girl Scouting has drawn her closer to her daughters. "It's a deep common love," she said. Her husband declares he has decided that she will be in scouting the rest of her life.

DEVOTES 8 HOURS WEEKLY

Five daughters, a seven-room house and an ambitious schedule of community volunteer work have not discouraged Mrs. Charles Rupp, 2376 South Seventy-sixth Street, West Allis, from troop leadership. She has an intermediate troop at Jefferson school.

Her family includes Darlene, 13; Renee, 11; Bonnie and Vicki, 8-year-old twins, and Jenee, 4. All except the youngest are in scouting. Mrs. Rupp says that her daughters got her interested in the movement.

"Scouting has taught me to organize my own family," she says. "We all have duties and work on a kind of alarm-clock system."

She spends at least 8 hours a week on leadership duties. Also, she does volunteer work for the West Allis health department, is a neighborhood chairman for the Girl Scouts and solicits funds for the March of Dimes.

"I couldn't do any of it without a cooperative husband," she said.

For Mrs. Melvin Petrie, Girl Scout leadership filled a lonely hollow caused by moving from Minneapolis 10 months ago. She had lived there for 25 years. She now is at 1040 South Thirtieth Street.

"My youngsters and I felt right at home when we heard the familiar scout songs," she declares. "It was like coming home."

LIKES LITTLE FOLKS

Her youngsters are Marie, 8, a Brownie, and Maja Lisa, 11, an intermediate scout. Mrs. Petrie has been working with a Brownie troop at Doerfler school and now is helping to organize an intermediate group.

In Minneapolis she worked with a Brownie troop for 2½ years. She likes the little folks because "I can give attention to children who don't get enough of it at home."

She says her husband is a tremendous help. "He does carpentry work when we need it for a play or a troop investiture," Mrs. Petrie said. "And best of all, he doesn't complain about late meals."

Troop leadership is the hobby of Mrs. Smith N. Brickhouse, Jr., 2608 South Shore Drive. She got into the work because her children seemed to enjoy Scouting so much.

ORGANIZED MARINER TROOP

Her daughters, Beth, 12, and Barbara, 11, are both intermediates, and a son, Smith, is a Cub Scout. She never has had her daughters in a troop because, she says, "They get enough of my ideas at home."

Mrs. Brickhouse has charge of Brownie Troop, No. 245, at the Trowbridge Street School. She also is a neighborhood chairman in the South Shore district.

She spends about 10 hours a week on Scouting duties. "My husband enjoys having me do it," she says.

Living smack on the ocean at Marblehead, Mass., gave Mrs. Kenneth Johnston, 3265 North Summit Avenue, an early love for the sea and sailing. She put this love and scouting together by becoming a Mariner Scout.

Last year Mrs. Johnston organized the second mariner Girl Scout troop in Milwaukee. The group now is busy learning to tie knots, chart sea courses, identify parts of a boat, and pass required swimming badges.

Mrs. Johnston, 24, is one of the younger adult leaders. She has a daughter, Deborah, 16 months old. She was graduated in 1948 from the University of Wisconsin, where she majored in political science.

She believes that all women should have some activity outside the home. And her husband agrees. In addition to her scout leadership, Mrs. Johnston does volunteer work at the junior league blood center.

Jewish Youth Week

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH J. ADDONIZIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, March 23–30, 1951, has been designated as Jewish Youth Week in the United States by the National Jewish Youth Conference. The conference is a permanent Nation-wide body which represents over 300 local Jewish and young adult councils, regional youth and young adult councils and national Jewish youth organizations. The conference is sponsored by the National Jewish Welfare Board. The purpose of Jewish Youth Week is to focus the attention of the entire community on the activities of its young people.

"Learning through Jewish living," the theme of this year's Jewish Youth Week, reveals significantly the fact that American Jewish youth has learned the art of working together around areas of common interest for a healthier, happier, more positive community. Through youth and young adult councils—which in most cases are representative of all organized Jewish youth in the community—they have been able to develop constructive programs.

Clearly reflected in the theme is the recognition by Jewish youth of its role in the growth and development of the American Jewish community. Across the Nation, young people have taken their seats on boards of Jewish community centers, Jewish community councils, and Jewish welfare organizations such as the National Jewish Welfare Board.

During Jewish Youth Week the searchlight of the communities will be focused on the major advances which Jewish young men and women have been able to make by working together. Through such events as cultural festivals, youth Sabbath services, exhibits, rallies, conferences, forums, institutes, pageants, athletic and social events, radio and television programs, Jewish youth will demonstrate its abilities, accomplishments, role and responsibilities and needs. They will demonstrate during this week the fruitful results of concentrated efforts to build a better community and Nation.

Our Jewish young men and women have willingly accepted their responsibility of citizenship and service and have given generously of their time and efforts in working for deserving projects. On a national level, for example, the National Jewish Youth Conference served as an active member of the advisory council on youth participation of the recent Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth. The conference played an important role in stimulating the participation of youth and young adult councils in the work of the State and local White House Conference committees throughout the United States.

Youths of all faiths are needed for the future leadership of America. The splendid achievements of our Jewish youth in the past warrants a hopeful prediction that they will more than measure up to the responsibilities that will face them in the crucial days ahead.

The theme of Jewish Youth Week is described in an article written by Mr. Arnulf M. Pins:

WE LEARN THROUGH JEWISH LIVING

(By Arnulf M. Pins)

The theme of Jewish Youth Week, March 23–30, 1951, is Learning Through Jewish Living. Jewish Youth Week, conducted annually by the National Jewish Youth conference, aims to focus attention on the activities, hopes, abilities, and plans of Jewish young people today.

The National Jewish Youth Conference, which is sponsored by the National Jewish Welfare Board, can serve as an excellent example of "learning through Jewish living." It reflects the aspirations, hopes, and plans of American Jewish youth in the critical days through which we are living.

The National Jewish Youth Conference was set up as a permanent body in 1948, "to provide a self-governing representative body of organized Jewish youth which can develop a service for meeting the needs of American Jewish young people." Local and regional Jewish youth and young adult councils, some 300 in number, and most of the national Jewish youth organizations are members of the NJYC.

The purposes of the National Jewish Youth Conference are: To exchange experiences and program ideas on the youth and young adult levels; to initiate programs nationally which could aid local communities; to act as a sounding board of youth needs; to stimulate and aid in the development of youth and young adult councils; to facilitate relationships with other cultural and ethnic groups; to serve as an instrument for cooperation between Jewish youth in America and youth all over the world; to stimulate means of cooperation and exchange among American youth and Israel; to provide opportunity for development of leadership through actual experience; to provide a medium for democratic representation from youth and young adult councils on a national and international youth serving bodies and to develop a medium of cooperation between national Jewish youth organizations and the local youth and young adult councils.

In the 2 years the NJYC has done much to carry out these objectives. Through its annual assemblies, quarterly meetings of the executive committee and work of its standing committees, the NJYC has begun to meet the needs of local youth councils and national organizations and has begun to be a unifying force in American Jewish youth life. It has been an experience of youth accepting its responsibilities and working for a better, more meaningful, and creative American Jewish community. It has been an example of youth serving youth.

In order to acquaint more people with the purposes and activities of the various national Jewish youth organizations, the conference published a directory of these organizations, as well as a listing of nonfee organizational speakers who are available for talks, forums, and lecture programs. The NJYC is also preparing a radio script which will explain in dramatic form the objectives of the various Jewish youth organizations in this country.

The National Jewish Youth Conference has been in close contact with youth in Israel. It has distributed magazines, articles, and other publications published by the Jewish Agency, Jewish National Fund, and the Keren Hayesod. The NJYC published and distributed widely a complete listing of all the different youth "Tours to Israel" which were held during this past year. A "reciprocal adoption project" between local youth councils and settlements in Israel has been undertaken for the current year.

In order to enhance the exchange between youth councils, a directory of Jewish youth and young adult councils has been published; a directory of Jewish youth-council newspapers is now in preparation. Special bulletins of program suggestions for youth councils are sent periodically to the councils throughout the country. They have covered such subjects as Youth Conferences on Israel, Social Action, and others.

A Jewish-youth lecture service has recently been established by the conference. It lists youth speakers throughout the country who are able to speak before youth and adult audiences on specific topics. The conference also publishes a paper called the National Jewish Youth Review. The conference also publishes a news service, which gives items about and of interest to Jewish youth for use by local and national youth and community newspapers.

The conference cooperates with other agencies to encourage the celebration and to prepare and distribute materials for Jewish Book Month, Jewish Music Festival, Jewish History Week, Hebrew Month, and United Nations Day. The National Jewish Youth Conference has also stimulated special programs such as career conferences, youth sabbaths, join a jewish youth group campaigns, and others.

The conference's week-long annual assemblies held during each summer provide a setting where young people get together to consider matters of concern to Jewish youth, learn new skills, and get new ideas for their local programs, and have the opportunity to participate, in a democratic fashion, in deciding the future services and activities of the National Jewish Youth Conference.

The National Jewish Youth Conference represents Jewish youth in the Young Adult Council of the National Social Welfare Assembly, a national coordinating body of all the major youth organizations in this country, and through it has actively participated in the work of the World Assembly of Youth, UNESCO, and other international agencies. The conference also took an active part in the Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth recently held in Washington, D. C.

These are but a few of the concrete and visible things the National Jewish Youth Conference has accomplished during the first 2 years of its existence. However, some of the accomplishments of the conference, of equal importance, are of a different nature. For example, the National Jewish Youth Conference has given many individuals an invaluable experience in working with people of different backgrounds and varying interests as well as getting new insights into the needs of the American Jewish community. Through their participation in the work of the conference young people have gained a community outlook, they have learned that there can be unity without uniformity. In other words they have begun to prepare themselves, through actual experience, for their future responsibilities as adults.

The efforts of the National Jewish Youth Conference in the past 2 years are more than mere activities, projects, meetings, or publications. There is deep underlying purpose and direction to all the work of the National Jewish Youth Conference. The National Jewish Youth Conference is working toward an American Jewish community which will be positive in attitude, democratic in structure and creative in its program, by preparing young people for their future responsibilities in Jewish life in America and Israel. To achieve this goal, youth must gain the knowledge, understanding, and experience in Jewish affairs, and must learn to work together, to share views and develop necessary skills.

In reality, the National Jewish Youth Conference has been and will continue to be training for community leadership. Jewish youth is learning through doing; the conference is a good example, of learning through Jewish living.

Post Office Appropriation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 15, 1951

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to find in the recommendations of the Appropriations Committee items which will permit the extension of the research and development program which was inaugurated by the Post Office Department pursuant to Public Law 231, Eighty-first Congress. I introduced the bill which became Public Law 231 following a visit to one of the large post offices in the United States in connection with a study made by the Post Office and Civil Service Committee in 1948.

It was clear that the postal service was being impaired by a lack of funds and a lack of a coordinated program for research and development in items that are peculiar to the postal service.

It is virtually impossible to get private organizations to conduct research of this type for the postal service because in the event they might develop some item which would be of benefit, the Department must then ask for bids in which all manufacturing organizations can participate without regard to whether they participated in the development period or not.

I note that this bill carries an item of $250,000 for original research and development on new machines, procedures, and methods. There is also an additional item of $500,000 for improvements on existing equipment that has already passed through the initial experimental stage.

The Post Office Department has reported with regard to the research and development program, and I believe the Members of this House would like to know that a wide field for improvement in the postal service is being developed. Already under the authority of the research and development law the Department has made many advances. The work incident to the establishment of the new money-order system which is expected to go into effect on July 1, 1951, is well advanced. This new money-order system proposes to replace the present postal note and money order by a machine record card prepunched to expedite the accounting procedures. The Postmaster General testified before our committee that he expected the savings in this new system to virtually eliminate the deficit the Department is now experiencing in handling money orders which amounts to approximately $30,000,000 annually.

The Department has installed improved garage equipment and experimented with highway post-office vehicles. These latter vehicles, incidentally, are proving a good substitute for the hundreds of branch lines that the railroads have found necessary to discontinue because of reduced revenues.

The Department is negotiating for research into parcel-post packaging. This will be of benefit not only to the postal service but to all of those using the facilities of the post office. I might mention that during our study of the postal service it was developed that in San Francisco alone 20 full-time employees were required for rewrapping packages that were broken in handling on the parcel-post conveyor equipment. You see, it is not only a question of adding mechanical equipment to handle parcel post, but the addition of mechanical equipment creates new problems such as the packaging problem I have just mentioned.

The Department is improving the unit-cost system and proposes to institute a unit-factor system which will have a material effect on the management of such offices taking into consideration the units of work produced.

Much has been accomplished under this program in research into sorting equipment for letter mail. The Department is also experimenting with and intends to install in some of the larger post offices a simplified sorting system similar to the one developed in the Dallas, Tex., post office.

Mail distributing machines have been constructed and a study has been initiated into the development of a machine for facing mail prior to cancellation.

The Department is also conducting research in payroll machines, postmarking machines, stackers, improved hand-postmarking devices, portable conveyors, electric tractors, small motor vehicles for city carriers, city carrier carts, magnesium hand trucks for parcel-post carriers, plastic carrier satchels, microfilm, labels for packages and sacks of mail, check signers, magnetic counting devices, twine, and coin-handling machines.

The Post Office and Civil Service Committee, of which I am a member, is currently holding hearings on postal rates. These hearings have developed the very serious need for a more constructive approach to the manner in which postal rates are set. The postal rate structure is one of the most complicated sets of rates, and has a more far-reaching effect than virtually any other single transportation rate structure. Yet the Post Office and Civil Service Committee is expected to examine into the rate structure and come up with recommendations to the Congress which will be fair in all respects. This is a most difficult task and the net result in revisions are seldom accomplished.

Under the research and development program, a Division of Rates is being set up. This Division will conduct continuous studies into the postal rate problem and will be able to provide more complete data with regard to the necessary postal rate revisions, and possibly will result in recommendations with regard to revised rate-making procedures that will be workable and acceptable to the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in closing may I say I am gratified that the research and development program is recognized and is being continued by means of appropriations contained in this bill.

Proposed Increases in Federal Automotive Excise Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, March 20, 1951

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include by request at this point in the RECORD the following resolution on proposed increases in Federal automotive excise taxes:

RESOLUTION ON PROPOSED INCREASES IN FEDERAL AUTOMOTIVE EXCISE TAXES

Whereas Secretary of the Treasury Snyder has proposed that the 7 percent manufacturers' excise tax on automobiles be jumped to 20 percent, and the Federal gasoline tax from 1½ cents to 3 cents, in addition to the nearly $1,500,000,000 which highway users are now paying annually in Federal automotive excise taxes; and

Whereas this doubling of the Federal gasoline tax and tripling of the tax on new automobiles will add, according to the Secretary's estimate, about $1,265,000,000 in additional Federal automotive excise taxes which would result in highway users paying almost 42 percent of the total revenue expected from all new excise tax increases; and

Whereas Federal automotive excises are discriminatory and unfair because, (1) they select one type of transportation for general tax purposes (only highway transportation is singled out for such taxes); (2) they are imposed upon products essential to modern transportation; (3) they bear heavily on the small income groups; and (4) they result in multiple taxation; and

Whereas in addition to these Federal automotive excise taxes, motor-vehicle owners contribute their fair share of all general taxes in the support of Government and pay special imposts to the States and localities for use of the highways at an annual rate in excess of $2,500,000,000, thereby building and maintaining the road network which is indispensable to the Nation's defense; and

Whereas passenger cars are no longer a luxury to be taxed as such but instead are used daily by farmers, workers, professional, and business men in the pursuits of their livelihood which are essential to a strong supporting civilian economy for our defense effort; and

Whereas the proposed increase in gasoline tax excises alone would not only increase the cost of operating passenger cars and privately owned commercial vehicles essential to the defense effort, but would add so much to the cost of bus and truck operation that higher fares and rates would result in ultimate higher prices to the consumer; and

Whereas there is pending in the Congress a bill known as H. R. 1652 to impose Federal registration fees on motor vehicles: Therefore be it

Resolved, That while the undersigned organizations, members of the Massachusetts Highway Users Conference, stand ready to make the contributions and sacrifices necessary in the defense effort as demonstrated by the withdrawal of our demands for repeal of present Federal automotive excise taxes when the first shot in Korea was fired, we are nevertheless unalterably opposed to any proposals to further increase or add to these taxes for the forestated reasons; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution shall be sent to our congressional delegation.

Amendment of Internal Revenue Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill today similar to H. R. 3168, introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CAMP].

During this period of high taxes and with the possibility of even higher taxes in the offing, it is of the utmost importance that the Congress be alert to correct inequities which arise under our complicated tax laws.

The bill which I am introducing is one of a number of corrections which should be made in our tax laws.

In 1932 the Treasury Department requested an amendment to the internal revenue laws to provide that the basis of property should be reduced not only by any depreciation properly allowable but also by any depreciation allowed if it exceeded the amount allowable. The sole purpose was to prevent injustice to the revenue by the restoration to bases of excessive depreciation claimed where taxes had been reduced by the excessive deductions and the statute of limitations had run against the collection of the taxes properly due.

Instead of using the section only to protect the revenue against injustice the Commissioner with the sanction of a 5-to-4 decision of the Supreme Court, has used the statute to inflict the grossest injustice upon innocent taxpayers. This should not be permitted. Nowhere else in the tax laws is a taxpayer bound, in computing income in future years, by an error in a prior return which did not affect tax liability. It is only simple justice that an innocent and harmless error should not increase tax liability.

Congress, in amending the basis provisions in 1932, intended no exception.

My bill does not open any statute of limitations. Closed years are left closed. But it does in all open years permit computation of basis by the deduction only of depreciation allowable, except where depreciation in excess of that allowable has reduced tax liability and the statute of limitations has barred collection of the taxes properly due.

Altoona, Pa., Local of the American Federation of Labor Opposes the St. Lawrence Seaway Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the American Federation of Labor representing the shopmen employed by the Pennsylvania Railroad at Altoona, Pa., are against the proposed St. Lawrence seaway project.

There is no community in the United States that depends more upon coal and railroading for its economy than does the city of Altoona. Destroy this economy as the St. Lawrence seaway will and you will destroy the jobs of the many thousands of good Americans employed in Altoona by the Pennsylvania Railroad.

The resolution recently adopted by the local federation of the American Federation of Labor, Altoona, Pa., follows:

Be it resolved, That the local federation of the American Federation of Labor, Altoona, is opposed to the bill approving the agreement between the United States and Canada relating to the development of the resources of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin for national security and continental defense of the United States and Canada, providing for making the St. Lawrence seaway self-liquidating, and for other purposes.

1. That this proposal at the present time is a threat to the economy of the entire northeastern part of the United States and would reduce the tonnage of both the merchant marine and the railroads.

2. That the project would cover 2,687 miles of which 345 miles would be in this country and 2,342 in Canada.

3. The proposal would cost between $800,000,000 and $1,350,000,000 and yearly operation would cost approximately $20,000,000 and adequate defense would probably come to another billion.

4. Vital materials for the war effort would be used and could not be spared at the present time.

5. The project would take at least 4 to 7 years to complete and could be crippled by one bomb, rendering it useless.

6. The St. Lawrence River is icebound for virtually 5 months out of the year and during the spring and fall, and even in summer is blanketed by fog.

7. Only 9 percent of the merchant marine vessels could use the seaway, and smaller vessels would have the advantage.

8. It is estimated that the international section alone would take 140,235,000 manhours when manpower is so vital to the national defense.

Italian Peace Treaty

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday March 15, 1951

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the existing Italian Peace Treaty is today completely outmoded and sadly in need of revision. The conditions which existed at the time the treaty was written no longer hold true and the situation has so changed that immediate action appears to be called for. Today, while we in the Congress, are debating the various proposals and methods by which a real and lasting peace can be secured, and while we are attempting to best implement the Atlantic Pact, we are overlooking a decided and impelling force toward such a peace by continuing in effect the Italian Peace Treaty of 1947.

This treaty imposed drastic limitations on the Italian army, navy, and air force and greatly curtailed military training in that country. Because of these restrictions Italy is now prohibited from fulfilling her obligation under the Atlantic Pact. She is denied the right to contribute to the full extent of her capability to the defense of Western Europe. At the same time it forces the United States to carry an undue burden in supplying additional combat manpower to make up for that loss.

It seems evident to me that for our own best interests, we here in America should immediately negotiate a new treaty of peace with Italy and permit her to assume her responsibilities among the free nations of the world. For these reasons I have today submitted a bill to the Congress which would authorize the negotiation of such a new treaty.

Conservation and Development of Forest Resources

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT L. F. SIKES
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to submit for the consideration of the Congress the following resolution which was unanimously adopted by the Forest Farmers Association, with headquarters at Valdosta, Ga., during their tenth annual meeting recently completed:

RESOLUTION PERTAINING TO FEDERAL PROGRAMS CONCERNING THE CONSERVATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF FOREST RESOURCES

Whereas forest farming is dependent on the same biological sciences as other agricultural crops; and

Whereas the biological scientists, concentrated in the Department of Agriculture and working on problems in the growing of cultivated crops, grasses, and trees, have associations and facilities there that are mutually helpful and advantageous to the country; and

Whereas a large proportion of the forest land of the South and of the Nation is in farm woodlands; and

Whereas the United States Forest Service, as the Federal agency responsible for the forest program, has for many years worked successfully with the other agencies in the Department of Agriculture in developing the science and art of forest farming, and in disseminating information to forest farmers and other woodland owners: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Forest Farmers Association go on record as recommending to the President of the United States and to Congress that the Federal programs concerning the conservation and development of the forest resources be concentrated in the United States Department of Agriculture; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to each Senator and Representative in Congress.

Address of Hon. Sean MacBride

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the stirring address made by His Excellency Sean MacBride, S. C., T. D., Minister for External Affairs of Ireland, to the Society of the Friendly Sons of Saint Patrick of the City of Philadelphia on Saturday, March 17, 1951, at the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel, Philadelphia, Pa.:

Mr. President and gentlemen, you will know how honored and happy I was to receive the invitation sent to me some months ago to be the guest on this occasion of the Society of the Friendly Sons of Saint Patrick of the City of Philadelphia. In the midst of heavy duties I considered that this was an invitation I must accept. All the more so because your society is celebrating this year an anniversary which recalls, in a very special way, the closeness of its association with the historic origin and the political development of this great Republic. It happened, Mr. President, that the Society of the Friendly Sons was founded in this city in the year in which the last monarch to rule in this part of North America ascended the British throne. The American frontier was still ablaze. Mason and Dixon had not yet been employed to fix the boundary between the Colonies which were to become the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland. From that early time, members of your society have been closely associated with the history of your country. They stood sponsors at the birth of the Republic; they financed the War of Independence; they sat amongst the founding fathers; they marched with Washington from Philadelphia down to victory at Yorktown. They signed the Declaration; they framed the Constitution of the United States. They were the first to proclaim and promulgate the sacred documents of the new predestined Nation which, in an interval almost precisely coterminous with the life of this society itself, was to become the leader of the world. And through all the years between, they have been the stanchest supporters of the principles and ideals which have motivated the peoples of the United States and of Ireland in their struggle for unity and liberty.

Therefore on this one hundred and eightieth foundation anniversary I heartily congratulate you on the story which is so closely woven into the history of America. And I congratulate you also because it was here in Pennsylvania that the first attempt was made in North America to frame an instrument of practical government under which the human rights of religious liberty and of equal citizenship were safeguarded, and made basic in its law. It was the spirit of that daring and seemingly futile experiment which, when freedom finally came, gave its character, its directives and, to some extent its form, to the Constitution of the United States. At the outbreak of the Revolution there was nowhere in America a legislative body more democratic and more firmly opposed to the tyrannical exercise of royal prerogatives than the Assembly of Pennsylvania. No other part of this great country can claim so fully as this to have been the inspiration of the events through which your emancipation was achieved. But there is yet one other feature which is of vital import. I am referring, Mr. President, to the part played by the State of Pennsylvania when the unity of this Nation was imperiled and the integrity of its territory sought to be destroyed by Civil War. Six days after the bombardment of Fort Sumter two regiments of Pennsylvanian troops marched into Washington—the very first to arrive—in defense of the national capital and of national unity. Only twice during the Civil War was your State raided. But, nonetheless, it was the high tide of the Confederacy which rolled into the Cumberland Valley in that July of 1863, the second famous July in your calendar, to be stopped and turned back at Gettysburg.

I wish here to pay my tribute to the members of your Society who played so great a part in providing the most striking proof in all modern history that freedom and unity are essential to the life and ordered progress of Nations, new or old. In this connection the history of the United States shows two other things very clearly. It shows that national freedom, however powerfully challenged, can always be won and secured by an enlightened and determined people. At one stage in American history there was a proposal that an actual union should be formed between Ireland and America. If the plan of Benjamin Franklin had been followed Ireland would have become a partner in the confederation. In July 1775 Benjamin Franklin proposed to the Continental Congress draft Articles of Confederation by which Ireland could join. Of the hundred members of the Annual Congress which was to govern this confederation, forty were to be assigned to the representatives of Ireland. The proposal was not acted upon but it is an indication of the closeness of the ties which existed between our two nations.

In those early days when the people of Ireland and the people of America first began their struggles for the establishment of democracy and liberty in their respective countries, Republics were few and far between; democratic principles as we know them today were then practically unknown. Our respective peoples were not only fighting for the freedom of their countries but they were struggling also for the establishment of democracy and the assertion of fundamental human rights. The ebb and flow of this battle has not been an even one. You in the United States won your battle long before us. Indeed we have not yet won ours fully, for a portion of Ireland still remains cut away from the rest of the country against the will of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people.

As on St. Patrick's Day our thoughts naturally turn towards Ireland you will probably expect to hear from me on account of how Ireland is faring. It is nearly 30 years ago since we obtained control of three-quarters of our country. The task which faced the successive Irish Governments was a tremendous one because it involved, in effect, the complete reconstruction of our economy. Under favorable circumstances and in normal times this would have been a difficult task; but circumstances were very far from normal.

In the first place, the industrial area in the country, the northeast, was retained by Britain; this created an unbalance in our economy. In the second place the civil war retarded progress; apart from the material damage which resulted, the divisions set up prevented, for a long period of time, the objective planning which was so necessary. Following upon the civil war we had to fight an economic war with our neighboring island which lasted practically until the outbreak of World War II.

Despite these difficulties considerable progress has been made in every field of economic activity, particularly in recent years, and I would like to pay tribute to the work of the Government that preceded the present one for the part it played in the task of national reconstruction. The task of reconstruction involved three different fields of activity:

Firstly, the utilization and development of our land resources. This involved: land division of big estates that had been owned by the absentee landlords, improved farming and agricultural methods, and better organization of marketing facilities. Apart from farming and agriculture proper, vast schemes for land drainage, for afforestation and for turf utilization have been undertaken. Vast areas that hitherto were unproductive will thus be utilized for production of food, timber, or fuel. Generating stations are being built in the center of the large bog areas for conversion of turf into electricity, so as to reduce our dependence on imported fuel; when the peat has been cut away and utilized, the land that lies beneath it is being reclaimed and will become available for agricultural purposes.

The second field of activity concerned the creation of industries. While agriculture is the basic industry of the country, it is essential to develop industries to provide employment for our people at home, to supply the needs of our population and, if possible, to produce an exportable surplus. The number of new industries created is increasing daily and industrial employment and production are rising steadily. The year 1950 has been a record year of progress in our economy. This improvement in our economic position has been reflected by the fall in unemployment and emigration and the increase in our national income.

The third main task which had to be undertaken was that of reorganizing the practically nonexistent Sicla services which we took over. New hospitals, sanitation schemes, houses had to be constructed. Within the next 5 years we are confident that these tasks will have been practically completed. At present, measures for a comprehensive social-security scheme and health service are being considered by our Parliament.

From this brief account you will realize that considerable progress has been made. Equally important is the atmosphere of hope and confidence which exists in our population.

In the political field, too, much progress has been made. There is now, since passage of the Republic of Ireland Act, complete unity regarding all questions affecting our national sovereignty and concerning the unification of our national territory. We may differ on many matters of internal policy and administration but where the question of Ireland's sovereignty or unity is involved the leaders and members of all parties stand shoulder to shoulder together.

In the field of international affairs Ireland has been playing an active part. In the Council of Europe and in the OEEC (the European Economic Organization) our policy has been to further the concept of closer cooperation and unity among European states. We have approached these questions not from any narrow, nationalistic, or insular viewpoint but, on the contrary, we have been prepared, far more readily than many other nations to make our contribution toward the unification of Europe which we believe to be essential for the economic and political survival of our civilization. While we are prepared to surrender portions of our sovereignty on a basis of reciprocity with other European nations we are not prepared to submit to the domination or exploitation of one nation.

As regards international organizations we have been precluded by Russia from becoming a member of the United Nations on the grounds, if you please, that we are not a democratic and peace-loving nation. [Laughter.]

As regards the North Atlantic Pact organization we indicated clearly our agreement with its objectives but could not enter into a military alliance with the power which, in effect, was claiming and enforcing jurisdiction within our shores. Furthermore, we pointed out that the defense of a small island such as Ireland can be undertaken effectively only by a single central authority having at its back the firm support of a decisive majority of the people. There is, of course, a natural resentment among our people against the continued denial of the application of the democratic principles in the case of Ireland. In our view the continued partition of Ireland against the will of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people is an example of the very type of evil which it is the object of the Atlantic Pact to oppose and prevent.

Our attitude in this matter is in no way activated by feelings of hostility toward Britain based on past wrongs. On the contrary we are most anxious to develop genuinely friendly relations with Britain. Such friendly relations would be in the interest of both countries and once partition is removed it is inconceivable that Ireland should ever constitute a source of embarrassment to Britain in time of war. Indeed the very contrary would be the case. A friendly and united Ireland on Britain's western approaches is in the interest not merely of Britain and Ireland but of all the countries concerned with the security of the North Atlantic area. Constructive and sincere statesmanship would point to the necessity of the withdrawal of Britain's territorial claims in our island. By so doing Britain would be making a contribution toward strengthening the internal harmony and cohesion of the nations concerned with the security of the North Atlantic area. She would, too, relieve herself of the charge of violating the principles upon which democracy rests.

If we are proud of the part our people have played in the building of your great Nation, we are also very grateful for the sympathy and help which you have given us in the course of our struggle. Not least are we grateful for the message which George Washington sent to us in 1796 which it seems only proper that I should quote in this historic city:

"Patriots of Ireland. Champions of liberty in all lands. Your cause is identical with mine. You are calumniated in your day. I was misrepresented by the loyalists of my day. Had I failed the scaffold would have been my doom. But now my enemies pay me honor. Had I failed I would have deserved the same honor. I stood true to my cause even when victory had fled. In that I merited success. You must act likewise."

We have acted likewise and will continue to so act until Ireland is free from shore to shore.

Admiral Morton D. Willcutts

REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3282) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments and funds available for the Export-Import Bank of Washington for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1952, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time out of order to call to the attention of the House a news report which appeared in the newspapers this morning announcing that on April 1 Admiral Morton D. Willcutts, the head of the Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Md., will retire from active duty, after having served his country and all humanity ably and well for 34 long years.

Many of the Members of the House know Admiral Willcutts and appreciate his fine qualities and his great ability as a surgeon and as a physician, and the exceptionally remarkable services he has rendered this Nation as an officer in the Navy of the United States. I believe all Members of the House will join me in paying tribute to this great American and outstanding naval officer. I am sure we all wish Admiral Willcutts well upon his retirement to private life. It is our hope he may enjoy many years of good health and pleasant days in the future. Of him we can well say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

We've Missed the Goal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under consent given me by the House, I am including an editorial from the Wichita Eagle, of Wichita, Kans., entitled "We've Missed the Goal." The editorial is one that contains a considerable amount of food for thought. It is worthy of the consideration of not only the Members of the House but of the American people as well:

WE'VE MISSED THE GOAL

As an average citizen you must be concerned over the state of the world, and just how your own country will emerge from the present situation which is often referred to as a crisis. As the average citizen you can see only one solution of the problem. Without world peace there can be no security for the United States or any other nation. Continued rumors of war, while not as costly perhaps as actual conflict, will prevent this Nation from achieving its destiny, and continue as the citadel of freedom. If our thoughts and efforts are to be centered on war it will mean neglect of the better things which can come only with peace.

Peace, then, is the prime necessity. That admission alone seems to have done little to bring it about. There is no general agreement among our own leaders on how to attain peace. On one hand we are being urged to make the United States so strong in a military way that none will attack. Others hold to the theory that we should do just the opposite, withdraw to our own shores, and forget the other free peoples, leaving them to their own fate.

Before becoming too critical of either method ask yourself this question: Do you have a solution of your own? If the job of solving the situation was left to your own devices would you tackle it with any assurance that your way would be effective? The point, then, is that no one seems to know what to do. The state of concern over the future is no greater than the doubt that is in every heart. That mankind in general has somewhere along the way missed the goal which could have been his ultimate destiny—peace on earth, good will to all men.

The Case for Western Democracy Against Russian Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Virgil M. Hancher, president of the State University of Iowa, before the American Association of Junior Colleges, Des Moines, Iowa, March 6, 1951:

THE CASE FOR WESTERN DEMOCRACY AGAINST RUSSIAN COMMUNISM

(By Virgil M. Hancher)

I trust that you will forgive me if I invite you on this occasion to participate in the most unpleasant task that one citizen can invite another to share. I invite you to think.

Someone has observed that when we believe ourselves to be engaged in thinking, more often than not we are merely engaged in rearranging our prejudices. I can illustrate that point. We are met in the Middle West. During two World Wars this part of the United States was remote from the scenes of conflict. Therefore, many people residing here believe that we shall be remote from the scenes of conflict if there is a third world war. Is this true? If we fight Russia, must the attack come through Germany and Europe and across the Atlantic, or through Korea and Japan and across the Pacific? If Russia decides to fight, it will be because she believes she can destroy our strategic areas and defenses just as we can destroy hers. If she attacks us, where will the attack be made? Detroit, Chicago, Pittsburgh, New York, Washington seem obvious possibilities. Are they the only ones? I doubt it. The men in the Kremlin can be incredibly stupid and incredibly wise, but it is never safe for us to count on stupidity; and unless they are incredibly stupid, the possibility that they will make other strategic attacks is obvious. Such attacks might call for the destruction of the bridges across the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, and the immobilization of transcontinental and local rail and truck transportation which would result.

Notwithstanding the ominous silence about it, or perhaps because of that very silence, other attacks might call for biological warfare to be waged against humans, animals, and crops in this, the richest and most highly concentrated agricultural area in the world. If Detroit invites attack because of its automotive industry, surely Iowa invites attack because of its agricultural production. The rise of air power has put the northern United States on the new frontier, but this is an exceedingly unpleasant prospect, and, therefore, instead of thinking about it and planning for it, we tend to rearrange our prejudices and ignore it as much as possible.

So it has been in our consideration of communism. For more than 30 years we have avoided thinking communism and have merely rearranged our prejudices. We have assumed that because we did not like communism, it must necessarily fail. Perhaps it will, but no longer can we afford the luxury of error. If western democracy has a case against communism, we should know what it is. I invite you to think about this subject during the remainder of my remarks.

No task could be more congenial to me than that of presenting the case for western democracy against communism in response to the invitation extended to me by your executive director some months ago. I do this with the greater willingness because I believe that we are often in error; first, in our estimates of the strengths and weaknesses of communism; and next, in our understanding of our own civilization and way of life.

Perhaps the most significant feature of the attitude of the western nations toward communism since the Russian revolution of November 1917 has been their sincere and utter belief that it could not endure. Yet a movement which has lasted for 32 years is no passing fancy, especially when it appears to be stronger at the close of that period than at any other time during the period.

What have been the factors contributing to our disbelief in the capacity of communism to endure? The first and most obvious was pointed out by John Maynard Keynes more than a quarter of a century ago. It is that we mistook the Russian revolution for an economic movement, and because we deemed its economic basis fallacious we thought that the movement must fail. This was an error. To evaluate communism, especially the communism of the U. S. S. R. in terms of economics alone, is to misjudge it fundamentally. As Keynes pointed out with insight and clarity, the bad economics of primitive Christianity did not cause that movement to fail. On the contrary, the zeal and faith of its adherents permitted it to exist and grow despite its bad economics. So it has been with communism. The zeal of its devotees has enabled it to exist and grow in defiance of its economic doctrines. Those who looked for its early collapse on this ground were doomed to disappointment. Unless we are prepared to see in it more resemblances to a religious than to an economic movement, we are in error of misjudging communism as completely and as tragically today as we have misjudged it every year since 1917.

Up to this time we have misjudged the staying power of Russian communism. In part we have done so because we have gaged its acceptance in the U. S. S. R. by western rather than by Russian standards. If anything is demonstrably clear, it is that Russian communism has not produced as high a standard of material well-being for the people of the U. S. S. R. as is enjoyed by the people of the United States or even by the people of Western Europe. Because of this, we have expected the Russian people to be dissatisfied and to revolt. But here again we have deceived ourselves. By the devices of the iron curtain and of nternal propaganda, the party has been able to control the information received by the Russian people concerning conditions outside the Soviet orbit, and to a very considerable degree to control their thinking on the information they have received.

But in another respect we have overlooked the fact that for the masses in Russia, communism probably represents an advance from the economic conditions prevailing under the Czars. The Russian standard of living may be grossly inferior to that of Western Europe and America, but the better-informed opinion seems to be that it has improved in relation to the only standards which the Russian people have ever known. The whole propaganda technique of the Kremlin is directed to this fact, to the fact that communism is the wave of the future, and that, once the enemies of communism have been destroyed, the proletariat will come into his own. I once asked an English friend of mine, who had lived through the revolution in St. Petersburg, why the Russian people accepted the revolutionary regime. His answer was, "Why not? What did they have to lose?" Is it not clear, then, that in considering the acceptability of the Russian regime to the Russian people, we must not think of the problem in our own terms and according to our own standards, but rather in terms of the background, experience, and expectations of the Russian people? The more we divorce ourselves from our own peculiar outlook on life and on the world, the less we shall expect an early dissolution of Russian power from within.

One of the major handicaps to international understanding is the assumption on the part of almost every nation, people, or race that its particular religion, philosophy, culture, or way of life is superior to that of every other. This lay at the bottom of the Chinese dislike for foreigners, the seclusion of the Japanese, the racial theories of German extremists, the alleged or real arrogance of the British, and our own conviction that we live in God's country and somehow are under a special dispensation. This common national shortcoming is a barrier to true international understanding. In this respect we are no more guilty than many other nations, and perhaps we are no less guilty. There is nothing about it that should make us desire to give up Coca-Cola, automobiles, television, our standard of living, or any other part of the material basis of our culture. At the same time, we stand in a peculiar relation to the non-Communist world, and that relation places upon us a fearful responsibility to assess correctly the power and the durability of the Russians and their satellites and allies. In that assessment we must not assume that, because we loathe the tyrannical practices of communism, other peoples will necessarily share the loathing.

We should remember that the Russian people, in common with all the peoples of Asia, lack the traditions of freedom and justice and democracy that we possess. In his book, I Write as I Please, Walter Duranty tells a story to illustrate the difference between the psychology of the Russians (many of whom are basically oriental) and of Western Europeans and Americans. During one of the periods of food shortage in Russia in the 1920's, there was a surplus of wheat in one part of Russia and many people starving in another part. Although orders had been given for the surplus wheat to be shipped, it somehow failed to pass through a bottleneck in a certain junction town, and shipments were held up interminably at that point. A high Soviet official from Moscow went to a nearby city to investigate. Telegrams to the junction were sent out. There were no replies. Others were sent and still there were no replies. Finally the official himself went to the junction town. Finding the minor official who, in obedience to a stupid rule, had filed the telegrams without reply, he caused the man and his two superior officers to be taken forthwith to the courtyard of the railway office and shot. There was no trial, but the procedure was effective. The railway employees knew what was wanted. They knew that the shipments of wheat were to be expedited and that there was to be no more delay. To a Western European or an American, nothing could have been more unjust than the shooting of those men. But to the Russians, it was an action that they understood. They knew that Moscow meant business. Thereafter the wheat came through without delay and without fail.

But, perhaps our gravest error in evaluating the strength of communism has been our failure to realize that the Marxist philosophy undertakes to give a complete account of the origin of the universe and of the development and destiny of human society and of man. Marx, Engels, and Lenin all sought an ultimate reality, something on which to base a philosophy that would account for everything in the universe. In seeking this goal, they developed the theory of a universe springing from ceaseless motion and chance, first quantitative, then qualitative, until the earth and finally man himself was created. Marxist acknowledged that in olden times men had to use the hypothesis of God in order to understand the universe, but today they reject this attitude and regard religion merely as the persistence of a prescientific attitude in the minds of the people. They regard belief in God as a kind of cultural lag, characteristic of backward and unscientific persons.

Paul B. Anderson, a member of the International Committee of the YMCA, and a long-time student of Russian ideology and tactics, has pointed out that:

"There are four cornerstones in the Marxist structure: First, a philosophy of reality in which motion, change, is the central idea; second, a body of men integrated into and directing this process of change; third, the relegation of God and religion to the status of an anachronism; and fourth, the view that man becomes a real man only after he has consciously identified himself with the Communist interpretation of the creative process." [1]

On these four cornerstones rests the Communist ideology, a kind of godless theology (contradictory as that may seem which presents to the satisfaction of the Communists a complete account of the origin and existence of the universe and of man and of all past and contemporary phenomena. It even has its counterpart of those who are "saved"—that is, workers and others related to the creative process—and those who are "damned"—that is, capitalists and functionaries of capitalism who are outside the creative process. Apparently it also had its organizational counterpart of those who are nominal members of the church, that is, the rank and file of the party, and of those who are "the elect," that is, those who regulate the stream of motion which is our universe and have it within their power to dominate the creative process. These elect are the Politburo, the political bureau of the party.

Now we may deplore the vicious aspects of the class struggle and the emasculation of religion which restricts it exclusively to the experience of man's relationship to his God; we may deplore the oppression, the tyranny, and the slavery practiced by the dominant political group; but the fact remains that the most striking feature of the Marxist ideology is its resemblance to a religion without God. It has its dogmas; it has its organization and its hierarchy; it has its devotees and its communicants; it has its martyrs and its saints; it has its missionaries. It, too, has obeyed an injunction to go into all the world and preach the gospel—to preach, as some say, sacrilegiously perhaps, the gospel according to "St. Marx."

Unless one accepts Marxism in these terms, as in effect a religion without God, how does one account for Fuchs and Gold and many other self-confessed believers in and tools of communism whose conduct seems as eccentric and inexplicable to us as the conduct of the Christian martyrs must have seemed to the solid citizenry of imperial Rome? The faith of the Marxists that their ideology presents a world view, that it is the wave of the future, that ultimately it must and will prevail, constitutes the gravest threat that communism has to offer to our way of life, a threat more grave than atom bombs or hydrogen bombs or dark and treacherous conspiracy, because it is a threat in the realm of the spirit, and in the realm of the spirit ideas can be dangerous to the established order, as Christianity has proved in more than one of the last 20 centuries.

Finally, it must be remembered that to millions, even hundred of millions, of people who have never known the standard of living enjoyed by the poorest 10 percent of the population of the United States, communism offers hope. In Russia, in China, in southeast Asia, its appeal is one of hope for the future, for a more abundant life under the dictatorship of the proletariat, for a part in that world revolution which, according to Marxist dogma, will inevitably overthrow the kingdoms of this capitalistic world and usher in the utopia of the classless society. To those who have lived without hope, the appeal of the Marxist dogma must be enormous. What have we offered, what can we offer, to the hungry millions of distant lands to offset the appeal of the Communists?

II

As I take up the affirmative task of presenting the challenge of western democracy to imperialistic communism, it seems appropriate to delimit the task by a definition of terms. I take it that the term "western democracy," as it is used in the title of these remarks, refers not so much to politics and political organization as to the total political, economic, social, and cultural organization and way of life of the people of the United States; for, notwithstanding the great traditions of freedom and justice and the dignity of man, which are common to the cultures of Western Europe and America, there are other differences which are broad and deep. I need cite only two. In an article in the Atlantic Monthly for March 1951, Dr. Perry Miller points out fundamental differences in the academic traditions of Western Europe and America that grow out of the concept of education for a cultural elite on the one hand and the concept of education for a free and open society on the other. Moreover, European capitalism, like capitalism in all parts of the world outside the United States, is dominated by the concept of a closed market wherein the capitalistic enterprise, through monopoly or cartels, seeks to eliminate competition in order to increase profits without recognizing any corresponding obligation to increase the wages of labor and hereby enlarge the market and create a greater number of potential buyers of goods. In these and other respects, the differences between European and American thought and practice are so fundamental that they cannot be treated within the limits of this address; and, therefore, the points which I shall make should be tested for their truth or falsity by consideration of the American scene, with a full awareness on my part that they may not be equally applicable, or that they may not be applicable at all, to the nations of Western Europe.

Now in presenting affirmatively the challenge of western democracy against imperialistic communism, I am impressed by the fact that far too often we have failed to understand our own society and way of life. As we stand in this time of testing and trial, we must be clear about our own society and way of life. Without clarity of understanding in ourselves, we cannot communicate its distinctive features to others. The writings of Henry Steel Commager, of Gerald W. Johnson and of many others are clear evidence of our struggle toward such an understanding. Perhaps one of the most significant efforts—because it came from a quarter in which it might not have been anticipated—appears in the February 1951 issue of Fortune magazine, whose entire contents are given over to an interpretation of our way of life under the heading "U. S. A.—The Permanent Revolution." This spokesman for the rich and powerful, for the leaders of finance and industry, reminds us of what is often forgotten by the foundering sons of the founding fathers—that our independence was won as the result of a revolution, that we are the descendants of revolutionaries, and that our progress and development have depended upon revolutionary departures from traditional modes of thought and action, from the establishment of a republic rather than a monarchy in our earliest days to the adoption of the techniques of mass production and high wages for labor in our later days. This freshness of outlook, this creativeness of mind, this unwillingness to accept any problem as insoluble, this indomitableness of spirit, in short the American Revolution itself, constitutes our first, and one of our very greatest, challenges to communism.

In the field of politics and political institutions, not only are we the heirs of the great tradition of freedom and justice and the dignity of man, but we have translated those great concepts into the practical realities of representative government, of the federal principle in governmental organization, and of the right of judicial review as a protection against the tyranny of man over man and the tyranny of government itself over the liberties of the citizen. In our enthusiasm over these great accomplishments, we must not claim perfection for ourselves. We, too, have sinned and fallen short of our goals. Does anyone suppose that the democracy of Chicago in the Capone era, of Kansas City under Pendergast, of Pennsylvania under Penrose and Vare, and of New York under Tammany offers a challenge to communism that would appeal to the peoples of India, China, or Russia? Would the nullification of representative government, by the disregard of constitutional provisions for reapportionment, from Connecticut to Oregon, constitute an appeal? Will the introduction into government of those old-fashioned principles of industrial organization that call for the centralization of power and authority constitute such an appeal? We must remember that freedom and justice and the dignity of man are not the product of the centralization of power and authority. On the contrary, they are nourished and protected by a kind of "pluralism" unique to our society—a kind of pluralism which makes it possible to have clubs and associations, charities and foundations, churches and schools, colleges and universities, manufacturers' associations and labor unions existing under every form of organization and sponsored by every kind of group interest. Some are wise. Some are foolish. Some are pernicious. But, on balance, the contribution which they make to the understanding, the variety, and the stability of our way of life is beyond price. And, likewise, on balance the weakness as well as the strength, the alleged inefficiency as well as the efficiency of our political institutions are not only safeguards of freedom and justice and the dignity of man; they are as well a challenge to the tyranny of communism.

Another revolutionary departure from traditional modes of thought and action occurs in one of the least understood features of our way of life—the unique nature of our industrial order. There is no apt word to describe it. More often than not it is referred to as capitalism, but every student of capitalism knows that our industrial order has features that distinguish it from capitalism elsewhere in the world. As I have pointed out above, capitalism in Europe means monopoly and cartels and a closed and limited market. In Asia it means exploitation. In Asia it means the exploitation of labor, the exploitation of natural resources, and the siphoning off of wealth so that the native populations remain poor and enslaved in order that the few may live in luxury.

Throughout the nations of Asia, capitalism shares the stigma of the "white man's burden." Both suggest the dominance of the foreigner and the subservience of the native. The revolt of native Asian populations against foreign political domination carries with it a revolt against foreign exploitive capitalism as well. This explains the strong movement of many Asiatic nations toward socialism or even communism. It is a reaction, a revulsion, from the exploitative capitalism to which the Asiatics have been subjected for many decades. Thus the description of our system as capitalistic plays directly into the propaganda schemes of the Communists and adds fuel to the flames of hatred against America so carefully fanned in Asia by Communist propaganda. To be sure our system is capitalistic, and in my judgment should remain so, but to describe it as capitalistic is to miss the point that it is unlike the capitalism of Asia and even unlike the capitalism of Europe. It is to miss the point that our system has certain unique characteristics that distinguish it from capitalism elsewhere in the world. It is to miss the point that the distinctive characteristics of our economy are the mass production of goods and services in industry and agriculture and high wages and high living standards for the people as a whole.

Obviously one of the great appeals of communism has been the purely materialistic promise of a higher standard of living. It is an appeal to the exploited and downtrodden. "Arise ye slaves who know starvation. Shake off the curse that binds the earth," says the "Internationale," the international anthem of the Communists. It is an appeal to the hungry, the homeless, and the foresaken. The promise of communism is the promise that the proletariat shall come into its own, that the hungry shall have food, that the homeless shall have shelter, and that the downtrodden shall be raised up.

So far this promise of communism has not been fulfilled in any part of the world. Only in the countries of Western Europe and America has it been demonstrated that the elimination of hunger and poverty is not a fanciful dream of the philosophers. We have come close enough to the fact to know that, for us at least it can be done. And we have come to that point by mass production and by the distribution of the results of that mass production into a high standard of living. What more powerful appeal could we make to the hungry, the sick, and the homeless all over the world than the promise that what we have done may be adapted to help in the solution of their problems? If ever their hunger and poverty and distress are to be relieved, here are instruments to their need. But too much of the time this powerful challenge to communism is kept carefully wrapped in silence, while we invite the resistance and ill-will of Asiatic peoples by praise of a capitalism which to them means exploitation or slavery.

The continuance of our material well-being is impossible without mass production and high wages. It is impossible without gigantic aggregations of capital and labor. We cannot have the one without the other. Yet in peace our people seek to fetter the genius of our industrial organization, and in war or danger beg it to bring its knowledge and resources to our defense. How can we present our way of life to our allies, to the non-Communist world, or to the peoples behind the iron curtain, unless we understand it and believe in it ourselves? Here we have at hand a powerful weapon in the war against communism, but it will never serve us unless we ourselves comprehend its unique characteristics and learn to use it as a weapon.

Another revolutionary departure from traditional modes of thought and action, another challenge which our western democracy offers to Russian communism, lies in the challenge of a free and open society. True enough, this is a goal that we have never completely achieved. True enough, discriminatory practices and race segregation are flatly contradictory to our goals. But who would dare to say that our intolerances, however great, are to be compared with the intolerances of the Russian regime in its mass trials, its purges, and its enslavement of millions of people in prison camps and Siberian wastes? What shall it profit a man to escape a penalty for the color of his skin, only to incur a penalty for the color of his views? Each is wrong, but who shall say that the first wrong is greater than the second?

Only a free and open society can be tolerant. Its frontiers are open to the free interchange of ideas. Its occupations are so diversified and complex that everyone, whatever the nature or the limitation of his talent, can find a useful and satisfying calling. As W. H. Auden has said:

"Such a community would be tolerant because it found every kind of person useful, and its members socially responsible because conscious of being needed."[2]

Thus everyone who functions effectively at the level of his capacity will be needed and respected. He will be deemed a worthy member of society whether he be street sweeper or president.

Implicit in the concept of such a society is the idea of universal education. Again this must be at the level of the capacity of the individual. Not equality, but equality of opportunity is the goal; and there can be no equality of opportunity unless the doors and windows of the mind are thrown open to the light of knowledge. Universal education has not been achieved. Admittedly it is a goal. But it is an indispensable goal if we, with inferior numbers, are to stand firm and secure against the hosts of communism. In his Farewell Address upon leaving the presidency, Washington said: "Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened." Universal education is an indispensable goal if we are to present a free and open society as a challenge to the closed and stratified society of the Communists, if each individual is to develop in response to his desires and capacities rather than in response to the needs and the politics of the state. Never in our history has it been so important that our schools and colleges and universities be dedicated to freedom—in order that truth may be discovered and may prevail, to justice—in order that it may be our "set and constant purpose to render to every man his due," [3] and to the dignity of man—in order that man made in the image of God may tread the earth without fear.

Another revolutionary departure from traditional modes of thought and action, another challenge to imperialistic communism, lies in the incorporation and commingling of the spiritual values of the Jewish and Christian tradition into the very fabric of our daily lives. The Jews have been called a "God-intoxicated people." The Old Testament is the record of their long, long search for the one true God and for a knowledge of His law. Both Jews and Christians among us cry out in their hearts for righteousness. Nevertheless, we have been called a materialistic people. Our civilization has been called a materialistic civilization. To the extent that the accumulation of money has become the sole or even the predominant goal of individual members of our society, to that extent we are a materialistic people. To conclude from this point, however, that our civilization is devoid of spiritual values is a superficial judgment. It is true that we talk about money and material values, oftentimes to the distress of our friends in other parts of the world, but to assert that we place greater value on them than do Europeans or Asians is to close our eyes to obvious facts. Nowhere in the world can one see a more fixed determination of the poor to become rich or of the rich to stay rich than can be seen throughout the Orient. And it is often suspected that the privileges of party leaders in Russia are the equivalent of great wealth.

To call our civilization materialistic and money-minded is to leave unaccounted for the endowment of great hospitals and foundations, of schools and colleges and universities, of churches and charities, and of a hundred and one other things that bring to our common life a kindly and humanitarian spirit unprecedented in the long history of mankind. If our people are not visibly moved in their daily lives by a burning religious zeal, at least they live in an afterglow of a religious faith, that commands them to love their neighbors as themselves. Both Jews and Christians among us hearken to the commandments: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Much that we do falls short of the perfection called for by these commandments, but no one can understand us who does not know that the spiritual values implicit in these commandments are woven into the very texture of our being and permeate both the form and the direction of our society.

Perhaps in this respect we do not even understand ourselves. Perhaps we do not understand the forces of our own American Revolution. Our actions are permeated with wisdom and goodness, but we may have lost sight of the fact that wisdom and goodness are the goals of living. If that be true, we must seek once more to know what wisdom and goodness are. Contrary to our accepted beliefs, the most deadly challenge of communism lies in the fact that it presents a philosophy. Life has a goal. Life makes sense. To its adherents, the Marxist philosophy gives meaning to life. We can meet this only with a greater challenge. We can meet this with a world view which gives a meaning to life transcending the materialism that stands at the heart of communism. We are the heirs of a tradition possessing such a meaning. We must seek to apprehend that tradition anew, because our political, economic, and social structures and actions, permeated, enlightened, and strengthened by the highest spiritual values of western man constitute our last and mightiest challenge to the theories and forces of communism.

Shall we stand in terror before the challenges of communism or shall we, possessing a giant's strength and conscious of that strength, be strong and of good courage?

The choice is ours. The challange is before us. Upon our wisdom and faith and courage may depend the course of civilization for a thousand years. In this crucial hour we must not fail.

Economy in Military Manpower

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WATKINS M. ABBITT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. ABBITT. Mr. Speaker, recently I wrote Gen. George C. Marshall, Secretary of Defense, the following letter:

We all are cognizant of the great importance of the defense effort and the necessity of building up an adequate military organization. However, in doing this it is necessary that the economy of our country be maintained on a strong level because it is just as important that we remain economically strong as it is that we become militarily strong and remain so. Both must be correlated if we are to accomplish the purpose of the program that we believe will serve to maintain the peace in the world today.

In these trying times, and especially in view of the tax burden already on our people as well as the huge additional tax burden contemplated to be added shortly, it seems to me that now as never before it is necessary that we have economy in the use of our military manpower as well as financial economy.

The general feeling among those people whom I have contacted appears to be that the several branches of the Armed Forces are more or less in a race to build up their strength without due and adequate consideration being given to proper utilization of this strength in the so-called housekeeping or office work of the various branches. We all realize that a certain amount of office work must be done by the personnel of the several branches of the service. It would appear, however, that a great amount of this type of work could be done by civilians at considerable savings in military manpower as well as monetary.

It seems to me that a searching survey should be made by the Defense Department, going into all phases of this important matter so that wherever possible those members of the Armed Forces who are physically fit and trained may be utilized as such rather than to have them doing work that civilians or limited-service personnel could do just as well.

Recently the Agriculture Committee of the House of Representatives, of which committee I am a member, went fully into the manpower situation as it affects agriculture and related industries. Apparently this vital phase of our economy is or will be shortly facing a serious manpower shortage for several reasons. Many workers are being drawn into high-paying defense projects and, of course, many of these workers are being taken into the Armed Forces. Other industries apparently also will be facing critical shortages in the near future.

Necessarily, potential military manpower is relatively scarce due to the high standards set by the Armed Forces and the comparatively small group which they have to choose from. With this in mind, it seems to me that a reevaluation of the situation should be made by the Defense Department. Lower standards wherever possible should be adopted as to mental capacity, and certainly some of our manpower in the approved group with minor deficiencies could be used in the so-called housekeeping work of the Department, thus allowing able-bodied, physically fit, and well-trained personnel of the Armed Forces to be counted among the field forces.

I have heard it said, unofficially, of course, and not from an authoritative source, that the military has more personnel in the Pentagon today than it had at the height of World War II. If it will not give aid and comfort to the enemy or adversely affect the defense effort, I would like very much to have a comparison between the present military strength at the Pentagon and as it was at the height of World War II. I would also like to know the exact number of officers and men who are members of the Armed Forces now on duty at the Pentagon, by rank. I am wondering if there aren't a number of physically fit and trained personnel being used there and elsewhere as chauffeurs, office workers, and handy men, more or less, and if these positions could not be filled by the women of our country or men who are not physically fit for full military duties.

I would appreciate hearing from you in regard to these matters.

Since writing this letter my investigation, which, of course, was very cursory, convinces me that the armed services, in many instances, are operating in utter disregard of proper utilization of manpower, as well as financial economy. I believe it is going to be necessary to have a searching inquiry on the part of Congress into this matter before adequate relief can be expected. After the Easter recess it is my present intention to initiate such a proposal.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a letter that I have recently received from a young man who is a member of the armed services and whom I have known all of his life. He is a splendid young man, well educated and entirely reliable. The letter is as follows:

As this diatribe progresses, I hope you will not think I've taken the term "servant of the people" too seriously. My many letters to you are a result of my confidence in your ability and personal integrity.

Today I went back to work for the Army and worked about 4 hours for which I was paid a little over $7, plus quarters for my family, my food, and clothing, and a form of security. Now I realize that some of us are paid for experience and ability and that higher pay is an inducement to greater effort and, in fact, the pay would be well earned, if our time were well used. What I am trying to say is: Why curbs, shortages, and restrictions in civilian life while we waste time, material, and manpower? Today the Army cries for all of these, yet I would estimate that considerably less than a majority of these is put to a good use.

Sometime ago there was a great clamor to economize—brought to a halt by the Korean incident, but why not save while economy is a greater virtue than ever? Why not make the Armed Forces and other Government services live within their budgets instead of letting them spend more and more per unit, even in time of comparative peace?

Since the channel is being put to more uses and more fantastic results are being accomplished, why not budget small units on the channel plan? Small units cause the expense; and here is a typical example: This morning five trucks took about 50 of us about 8 miles for a class in wire installation. Equipment needed consisted of wire, pliers, and tape. Any locale that contains trees, which abound 20 feet from the barracks is suitable, but we went to a special location, consuming 50 man-hours per hour for 3 hours, the equipment and the wear and tear on vehicles. This venture, I estimate, cost the taxpayer about $80.83, while the same could have been accomplished for about $33 and would have released 50 men for the 2 hours consumed in travel.

Well, now you have an idea of what I mean and why I wonder when I hear talk of another billion or so here and there.

As I mentioned, an individual is a voice in the wilderness, but since free speech prevails and since the combined voices of the citizens of our country determine our actions—let us hope.

Venereal Disease Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include an article by Dr. E. Gurney Clark, of Columbia University, reporting the present status of venereal disease control in our country:

IS VENEREAL DISEASE NO LONGER A PROBLEM?[1]

(By E. Gurney Clark, M. D.[2])

A wave of optimism pervades medical and public health circles in respect to the status of venereal disease control. "Penicillin, the panacea, is at hand. Venereal disease control is imminent." In accordance with one of our objectives, "to disseminate authoritative information," this hypothesis should be critically examined by the American Venereal Disease Association to determine if the optimism is warranted, or is possibly premature.

To this end the following questions are raised:

(1) Is venereal disease now a problem? If so, why, to whom, and to what extent is it a problem?

(2) Is venereal disease control imminent?

(3) If so, how can control be maintained?

1. Is venereal disease now a problem? Yes, syphilis is a problem because of the character of the causative agent, because of certain human characteristics, the nature of the disease, and the character of the environment in which people live. The organism is one that requires moisture to live and is thus associated with the moisture of intimate contact and thus is linked with sex and sex attitudes, with the result that infected persons hide their infections. It is a problem because of certain human characteristics: lack of interest in health, lack of knowledge, and willingness to take chances with mild, painless lesions. It is a problem because of the nature of the disease itself: the interaction between the host and the parasitic agent, symptomless infection, evanescence of early signs. It is a problem because of environment, particularly the social and biologic environment, differences in educational attainment, standards of living, cost and availability of medical services. Gonorrhea is a problem because it is caused by an organism with similar biologic requirements and is thus related to sex. It is a problem because in women the disease frequently goes symptomless for many years. Yes, venereal disease is now a problem.

To whom is venereal disease a problem?

(a) To the patient? No, provided there is early discovery and adequate treatment. However, according to estimates, syphilis is a problem to more than half of the people who acquire it, since more than half the cases are undiscovered during the primary and secondary stages.

(b) Is it a problem to the physician in practice? Not from the standpoint of treatment, despite the fact that we cannot define "adequate" treatment for each individual case. There is no problem provided the patient remains under observation. Yet, until the many unknowns about this disease are solved, it will be a scientific problem as long as a case remains. The causative organism of syphilis has not yet been cultivated. We have no vaccine. We know very little about the natural history of the untreated infection; the duration of infectiousness; the mechanism of immunity; the mechanism of infection in utero; the selectivity of the disease for certain tissues; the nature of reagin upon which our nonspecific serologic tests are based. These gaps in our medical knowledge make syphilis a definite problem to the physician.

(c) Is it a problem to the health officer and the community? This can be answered by quoting from remarks made by Dr. W. H. Aufranc, of the Venereal Disease Division, United States Public Health Service, at a recent meeting devoted to the subject: Are Venereal Diseases Disappearing? He pointed out that in 1949 syphilis: (1) infected 150,000 persons in the United States, 80,000 of which cases went undiscovered; (2) sent 6,000 persons to mental institutions; (3) infected prenatally 14,000 innocent children; (4) killed 13,000 people. He also stated that it has been estimated that if the population of the United States were tested today, 3,000,000 people would be found to have positive serologic tests for syphilis. It is, then, a definite problem to the health officer and the community.

2. Is venereal disease control imminent? Eighteen years ago Parran said, "Syphilis can never be controlled while more than one-half of the cases are not recognized for more than a year after onset." What is the situation now? There has been an encouraging decline in the numbers of cases of primary and secondary syphilis reported by States and Territories from 1946 to the present. More recently, a slight decline has been noted in reported cases of early latent, but none in late and late latent and congenital syphilis. These latter facts are discouraging and disturbing. The diagnosis of early latent, late, and late latent syphilis means the diagnosis of cases which were not recognized during the first year, or indeed the first several years, of infection. These represent our failures in case finding at a most critical time in the course of the disease. A rough estimate of the extent of the failure may be made by allocating a portion of reported cases of early latent syphilis in any one year to previous years when, as primary and secondary, they were not discovered. This approximation reveals that in only 1 year, 1947, did the discovered cases of primary and secondary syphilis exceed those not discovered. Furthermore, approximately 120,000 late and late latent and 16,000 cases of congenital syphilis are reported each year. These must be added to our failures. It is an old epidemiologic principle that successful control of communicable disease depends upon the recognition and the elimination of sources of infection. We are still missing more than we recognize. It can be stated without question that at the present, 18 years after Parran's statement, still more than one-half of the cases are not recognized for more than a year after onset.

3. If control is at hand, how can it be maintained? There are and have been areas of so-called low prevalence in the United States and in other parts of the world. By critical analysis of the maintenance methods used in these areas, we should be able to apply immediately the most effective ones so as to insure safety from the venereal diseases forever. Have we studied critically these methods? Do we know what to do? The first step should be to test the assumption of low prevalence by thorough use of all case-finding methods, reaching as many people as possible in the population in question. If the low-prevalence assumption is correct, then we can test certain hypotheses as to maintenance programs. If not, a careful analysis of the data will yield information to assist in defining areas of true low prevalence.

There is additional information needed to plan an effective maintenance program. What to include in such a program will depend upon the effectiveness of measures previously used. What do we know about these measures individually? Have we evaluated them sufficiently to know which measures are responsible for our present accomplishment?

Any program of syphilis control or maintenance must take into account the biologic characteristics of this particular agent-host relationship. These characteristics make it impossible: (1) to eliminate the organism in the physical environment; (2) to eliminate contact; (3) to immunize; and (4) to practice mass quarantine except by treatment. Therefore, maintenance efforts must be directed toward methods which continue the reduction of effective exposures to the treponema pallidum such as: (1) a continued reduction of total exposures by decreasing promiscuity; (2) prophylaxis; (3) maintenance of adequate treatment and follow-up requirements; and (4) a further reduction of periods of infectiousness by early recognition of infection. This latter means case finding. Those methods of case finding which will best serve a maintenance program remain to be found.

SUMMARY

1. The venereal diseases, particularly syphilis and gonorrhea, are still public health problems of the first magnitude.

2. Considerable progress has been made in their control, but from present criteria control is not imminent.

3. Information relating to adequate low-level maintenance measures is lacking.

CONCLUSION

The present optimism in respect to the immediate control of the venereal diseases in the United States as a whole cannot be substantiated in fact.

Civil-Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES T. PATTERSON
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the Marine Corps Reserve Officers' Association:

CHAPTER CONTACT

One of the greatest services members of the Marine Corps Reserve Officers' Association remaining at home can render to the Nation at the present time is active participation in the civil-defense effort of the community in which we reside.

The training experience you have gained as officers in the Marine Corps has qualified you to render excellent service to the Nation in the Civil Defense Corps.

Civil defense can no longer be looked upon as a fad, hobby, or as a social gathering. America for the first time in her history faces the probability of attack, by an enemy nation, of her industrial areas and population centers.

It is no longer sufficient to build up the Nation's military strength and war production. Attacks by the enemy with modern weapons will be aimed not only at destroying our war production but also designed to break the morale of the American public.

We must organize to protect our home front, to minimize destruction and casualties, to learn all about the effects of atomic weapons in order to dispel the fear that breeds from the unknown and the resultant panic and hysteria which may cause as many casualties as the enemy attack itself. We must all learn the safety measures that can be taken to insure our own personal safety and we must pass these on to others.

This organizing and training must of necessity be voluntary. There is neither money or manpower to organize a paid civil-defense effort. The very principles of civil defense are self-help, both individual and community; mutual aid or help from others when disaster is so great that the community cannot cope with it.

Teaching this "self-help" and organizing the civil-defense program will require considerable sacrifice. It is comparatively simple to go out and enroll volunteers—that is, to get the names. Providing the organization which will direct the efforts of these volunteers and establishing a training program to make their services more effective will require considerably more effort and sacrifice of time.

This is where the men and women of the Marine Corps Reserve Officers' Association can be utilized to the best effect. Your previous training has emphasized the need for instruction and leadership. Your experience has provided you with these qualifications.

You say "Nothing will ever happen to my community." Perhaps you do not live in a critical target area—that does not mean that your community has no part in the civil defense effort. It merely indicates the type of planning and organization you must undertake to assist other communities which are in critical target areas in furnishing mobile civil defense support and mutual aid. We all hope and pray that there never may be any occasion for using the civil defense organization but we can't afford to take the chance of being unprepared.

A trained organization ready to meet emergencies will save thousands of American lives and may spell the difference between victory and defeat should war come. The word "survival" has become almost synonymous with civil defense. Whether we survive may actually depend upon the efficiency of the home front preparations and our readiness in the event of disaster.

Considerable study has been made of all phases of civil defense. A number of official pamphlets and books have been published. Among these are United States Civil Defense, which outlines the problems which must be met and serves as a guide for organization to meet these problems; Survival Under Atomic Attack, which outlines what everyone should know relative to safety measures; Health Services and Special Weapons Defense; The Medical Aspects of Atomic Weapons, and many others. These booklets all give authentic information on the subject of civil defense and are available either through your local civil-defense authorities or from the Government Printing Office.

Civil-defense organization will differ with the requirements of the community. It may be that your community can use your entire chapter in one activity—your community plan on the other hand may be such that it can only employ the individuals within your chapter in several activities. Whatever the requirements are you owe it to yourself and your community to render whatever service you can.

Remember that an attack if it comes is directed against the people of the United States and the people must be prepared to meet it. It cannot be met if we "let George do it."

We hear much about lack of funds for this and that. It is true that civil-defense operations will eventually require considerable money. However there is a great deal of work to be done in organizing and training prior to the actual need for money. Marines have always known how to operate on a shoestring so this will be no new problem to conquer for you.

Every chapter is urged to immediately contact the civil-defense authority in your own community and offer the services of the membership in whatever phase of the civil-defense effort they can be most effectively employed, or in the event no civil-defense organization has been established, to take the necessary steps to organize one under the constituted authorities.

Reconstruction Finance Corporation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE MEADER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

JACKSON CITY BANK & TRUST CO.,
Jackson, Mich., March 14, 1951.

Hon. GEORGE MEADER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN MEADER: I have read in the press in the past few days that there is a movement to abolish the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I, for one, should very much dislike seeing this brought about. Notwithstanding the fact that a lot of unfavorable publicity has come out during the current investigation, I feel that the RFC, over-all, has done a very good job and should be continued.

This bank has handled more RFC loans, I understand, than any other bank in Michigan, and there has never been a loss.

The banks in the large cities have been prime movers for abolishing the RFC, saying that there is no longer a need for it and that they are capable of handling all applications. However, if we take an application to a large city bank and ask them to participate with us in a loan which would run for a term of years and wherein there is real estate and other collateral involved, they quickly step aside and say that they are not interested. If we take to them an application from a company which shows a wonderful financial statement and perhaps wants to borrow money for from 3 to 6 months, they will, of course, be very glad to handle all or any part of such a loan.

I feel that there is a distinct need for the RFC, especially for the small business which needs term money for fixed assets.

Very truly yours,

C. F. SPAETH,
President.

MARCH 19, 1951.

CARL F. SPAETH,
President, Jackson City Bank & Trust Co., Jackson, Mich.

DEAR CARL: Thank you very much for your letter of March 14, expressing your views on the present need for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The work I did with the Fulbright Committee—before resigning last August to run for Congress—led me to the tentative conclusion that long-term loans on fixed assets for small businesses did not seem to be available from private credit sources, except at extremely high interest rates. It was my hope that the study of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would lead to the development of sound practices for processing applications for loans of this type and servicing them, which might lead the way to the development of an attractive field in private financing which now seems to be neglected. I am somewhat familiar with the benefits to small enterprises, arising from Reconstruction Finance Corporation financing, wholly aside from the financial relief granted.

Frequently small-business men neglect to give attention to accounting and planning, to the extent they ought to for their own good. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, through its processing of applications and subsequent servicing of loans, frequently helps such small concerns to establish more businesslike procedures. Banking institutions, generally, cannot afford to maintain the staff of engineers, examiners, etc., through which consulting and advisory functions are performed, and through which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in my judgment, has been able to modify and reconstruct the business operations of an applicant so that a loan to him is a safe business risk.

Therefore, it is my feeling, which is contrary to the position of the Republican policy committee of both the House and the Senate, that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation ought not to be abolished until the problem of providing financial assistance to small-business enterprises has been dealt with more effectively than it has up to the present time. I appreciate that the relief afforded through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation falls far short of equalizing opportunities for expansion as between small and large concerns. However, what little relief there is to the small concern ought not to be taken away until something has been found to substitute for it. Furthermore, a period of conversion to defense production, on which we are now entering, will inevitably cause dislocation intensifying the need for financial aid. This will be most difficult for the small concerns. Our procurement program seems to be founded upon huge prime contracts with large business. Small business gets only the defense crumbs that fall from the table of large business, as an overflow, before any appreciable volume of defense work is subcontracted to small business. Therefore, there will inevitably be a time lag of several months. If no financial aid is available to small business during this period of conversion to defense production, such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is able to provide, the business failures and the impact on our economy through unemployment will be far more serious than it needs to be.

I was very glad to have your letter for another reason. I had been shown letters from banks all over the country which were answers to a questionnaire supplied by the American Banking Association, in which all but a very few expressed the opinion that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was wholly unnecessary, since any loan applicant entitled to credit could obtain all the money it needed from private banks, and that larger loans could be handled through participation with correspondent banks.

I am convinced that Congress needs to go much more deeply into this problem before taking drastic action.

Sincerely,

GEORGE MEADER.

The Real Victim

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the loose morals of the New Deal administration are now coming to a head. The American people who have been taken in by the New Deal propaganda can now see the price which they have to pay when they become indifferent to the affairs of their Government.

Under leave to extend, I am inserting an editorial which appears in the Wall Street Journal of March 22, 1951, with reference to a few, and only a few, of the high-handed rackets within the Government and without the Government:

THE REAL VICTIM

In dark days of March 1933 the leaders of the Federal Government were in a bustling hurry. The slogan was, "Act now and worry about the legality later." Out of that attitude came the bank holiday and after a while the NRA, the old AAA, and a host of other acts that skirted the law for expediency.

In the same days there crept in another philosophy, that the Public Treasury belongs to him who gets there first. Probably at no time in our history was there such a wild scramble to get up projects to be paid for out of the public till. Out of that attitude toward the public moneys came finally another slogan, "Spend and spend, tax and tax, elect and elect."

This March the days of 1933 seem dark again in retrospect, although for a different reason. This March beholds the spectacle of wholesale investigations into the conduct of people who also believe, in a different way, in acting first and considering the legality later and of people who believe that the Public Treasury is there for them to tap.

The progress from March 1933 to March 1951 has been a slow one. In 1933 there was no lack of personal probity among trusted public officials. They did not skirt the law for personal gain nor did they dip into the Treasury to put money in their own or in their friends' pockets.

But it was there that there was sown, subtle and insidious, the general disregard for the statute books and the orderly processes of law that have brought public morality to its present state. It was there that was sown the philosophy that since the Treasury is being touched anyway "we might as well get ours."

If this seems to be too heavy an indictment of public morality, consider for a moment who it is that is really being exposed in this parade of investigations.

In Washington one investigation is making considerable scandal of five-percenters, lobbyists, negotiators, and fixers who have taken the RFC for millions not yet counted. But however evil their machinations, the larceny—if that is the word for it—would have been impossible if the morality of the officials had been such that they were unapproachable.

The interesting fact is that whole investigation is that so far no criminal act has been disclosed. What has outraged the public sense of propriety has been nothing more than the acceptance of deep-freezes and the doing of favors for cronies—it only seems more startling here, and less comic, because bigger sums are involved.

It seemed funny when one official got a deep-freeze and offered only friendly favors in return. It isn't funny when another official accepts a luxurious week-end in Florida and the quid pro quo is a million-dollar loan. But one grows from another. If the first is viewed jovially in high places, why should there not be hurt surprise at the indignation over the second?

In Chicago, in Kansas City, in New York there proceeds another investigation, this time into the activities of the underworld. To no one's great surprise this investigation discloses that there is an underworld. There are gangsters, gamblers, racketeers, and murderers in the world after all.

What has caused the surprise, and the indignation, is the disclosure of the size and organization of their operations and the clear suggestion that they could not operate so without at least the tacit consent of those holding public office.

The gangsters—the intended victims—have hardly been touched by the probe except for side malfeasances, such as concealment and lying. The real victim is public morality.

The spotlight of this investigation has touched sheriffs in Louisiana, political bosses in Missouri, police officials in Illinois, a mayor in New York, a dead governor, and a live diplomat. They in their turn have raised suspicion that the lines of connection go farther and higher.

The progression seems to us not a surprising one. A President skirts the law from the noblest of motives, but once the idea of skirting is morally accepted the evil grows too familiar. Who should expect more scrupulous regard for it from ward leaders and policemen than from Presidents?

Public moneys are used for the noblest of purposes. Since they are to be spent anyway it seems a small matter to weigh their spending so as incidentally to help and get votes from large pressure groups. Soon it is a little matter also to spread it through friends and in return for favors.

Favors are accepted from shady characters, shadows between the world and the underworld, for the noblest of objectives. After all, a politician must be elected before he can do good. You do not inquire too closely into your city machine supporters, and soon they are not inquiring at all into the little favors done for the cop on the beat. You begin with the virtue of loyalty to your friends and pretty soon friendship becomes the greatest of virtues.

Between the beginning and the end there is, of course, a wide difference. But once there is a loosening of the attitude toward the public treasury and the public laws, no one should be surprised when a rot sets in. If public officials dismiss with a wave of the hand so grave a charge as treason to one's country, who should be surprised that lesser officials go unmoved by slot machines and $2 bets on the horses?

The beginning of all this is the thought that one need not be too scrupulous in the protection of the public moneys or in the observance of the law so long as the purpose is to do good. The progression is disregard for the law and no regard for money. The end, if it goes that far, is the end of public morality.

Brooklyn's Man of the Week

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Jeanne Toomey from the Brooklyn Eagle of March 18, 1951:

BROOKLYN'S MAN OF THE WEEK—BOSS OF ARMY BASE HERE CALLS BOROUGH "TOPS FOR LIVING"

(By Jeanne Toomey)

Brig. Gen. Edward H. Lastayo, commander of the New York port of embarkation, including the Brooklyn Army Base, has seen the world, but he still ranks Brooklyn tops as a place to live.

Ask why he was selected for West Point from the New Jersey National Guard in July of 1918, he will answer mildly, "On the basis of service."

"Hard work, not romance," is the way he sums up 34 years of military duty.

A handsome, quiet-spoken man of 53, General Lastayo lives at Fort Hamilton with his wife, the former Virginia H. Dillard of Chattanooga, Tenn. He has two married daughters—Ann, whose husband, Lt. John D. Howard, is serving with the Third Division in Korea, and Virginia, wife of Shane Riordan of Dobbs Ferry, a former infantry sergeant.

BOSSES ATC'S BIGGEST BASE

Head of the largest United States installation of the Army's Transportation Corps, General Lastayo describes himself as "not a combat soldier," and has no recollection of any "exciting moments" in his career.

Tracing his life, however, shows this statement to be dictated by reserve rather than accuracy.

He transferred from the Field Artillery in 1942 after 22 years with that branch and left with an invasion convoy for his Transportation Corps assignment in England. From May to October of that year he commanded the third port at the Bristol channel ports, England. In November he left for North Africa.

"We took over the port of Oran and operated it until March 1943," he said in his office at the Army base the other day. General Lastayo commanded the port during that period. Later he was transportation officer for both the Mediterranean and Peninsula Base Sections. Charged with the loading of invasion forces and the landing and transporting of men, equipment and supplies as Chief of Transportation of the Mediterranean Theater of Operations, the Army chief had an unparalleled opportunity to study and appraise American youth.

His conclusion? "I think that, on an average, the boys of today are the same as the boys I was with in 1917 and 1918."

With this attitude, the general is understandably popular with his subordinates at the Army base.

LOADED ANZIO INVADERS

While in Italy he supervised the loading of forces, both American and British, who made the Anzio landing. In September 1944, he was charged with the responsibility of loading the Seventh Army for the invasion of southern France from Naples. In June 1945, he returned to the United States.

In the field of transportation, the port of embarkation head believes that the LST and LCT may be the greatest contributions made during World War II because they enable troops with equipment to debark directly from the vessel to the beach.

Prior to World War II, while with the Field Artillery, he served in Kentucky, the Philippines, Virginia, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Florida, Maryland, and Texas.

"I saw so much heat I got used to it," he commented.

In all his Army career he spent only a few months in his native New Jersey while with the Sixth Field Artillery at Camp Dix, from August 1921 to January 1922.

He was born in West Hoboken, October 4, 1897.

TAUGHT ROTC AT CORNELL

From 1925 to 1929 he taught physics and astronomy at West Point and in 1939 and 1940, as a major, was an instructor in ROTC at Cornell.

Of his own career as a student at the Point he is characteristically modest.

Asked whether he had any favorite subjects, he replied, "Like most boys I took the course of study because I had to."

He was not an athlete and did not participate in sports. Among his classmates were Gen. Ewart Gladstone Plank, who commanded the New York port of embarkation from June 1946 to May 1949, and Maj. Gen. Clovis E. Byers, Deputy Assistant Chief of Staff, G–1, who was wounded in New Guinea in 1942 carrying a tommygun in the attack on Buna Village.

General Lastayo has great affection for the Point and plans to attend the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary ceremonies there July 4, 1952.

After his return to this country the transportation officer was Chief of the Highway Division, Office of Chief of Transportation, in Washington. From February 1946 to June 1949, as deputy port commander and chief of staff of the New York port of embarkation, he first fell in love with Brooklyn.

PRO-BROOKLYN JERSEY MAN

"I like Brooklyn," he declared. "I was a Jersey boy, and you never hear any good about Brooklyn in Jersey. I disagree with the Jersey view. I like Brooklyn extremely well and think it is a fine place to live."

His younger daughter, Ann, was graduated from Fort Hamilton High School in 1948 while her father was stationed here.

A year intervened between that hitch in Brooklyn and his present assignment here. From June 1949 to August 1950 he was Assistant Chief of Transportation in Washington.

As boss of the largest American installation, he looks out his window from the administration building of the Brooklyn Army base at a scene of bustling activity, but security prevents his discussing his present task and responsibilities.

However, he will talk about his two granddaughters like any proud grandpa. One was born only a few Sundays ago.

His own father was not in the Army and the family "seems to run to girls," but General Lastayo still has hopes for a future general.

Patriot Wanted

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK E. SMITH
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, there is no finer group of patriots in our country than the devoted Americans who are today serving in the thankless role of membership on their local draft boards.

Without compensation, and too often with no sign of public appreciation, they perform a vital task in the mobilization of our defense. The United States owes an everlasting debt of gratitude to these fine citizens.

Under unanimous consent, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post:

PATRIOT WANTED

We are indebted to one of our readers for an interesting advertisement clipped from the Dickson County (Tenn.) Herald. "Wanted," says the ad, "one draft board member." Then it lists the requirements for the job. Among them are these: "He must sign two or more waivers of pay or compensation; he must be prepared to take plenty of cussing with a smile, both publicly and privately; he must not have too much sense, because, if he does, he will not take the job." The salary offered is set forth as follows: "All compensation paid for duties in this position is exempt from income taxes for the reason this position pays no salary, wages or compensation." "Reasons for taking job," the ad goes on: "Somebody has to do it under the present law and whoever does it has the satisfaction of knowing that he is doing his patriotic duty, and the further satisfaction of knowing that all registrants registered with his board will be treated alike under like conditions."

We have no doubt that the Dickson County Draft Board will fill its vacancy. It will find some devoted American who, like the 39,340 other volunteers now working without compensation in the Selective Service System all over the country, will find satisfaction in the knowledge that "he is doing his patriotic duty." The response that free men make to a call of this kind is a measure of their sense of responsibility and of the vitality of their society. The United States has always been able to count on a full and generous response.

Membership on a draft board is an onerous and exacting assignment. It is not easy to make the decision that requires the son of a friend or a neighbor or a business associate to go into military service. It requires often the judgment of a Solomon and the patience of a Job to weigh the claims of conscience, the considerations of family hardship, the pleas for deferment to finish a course of education that are presented in an infinite variety of forms by the young men called up for induction. The work demands long hours, and it imposes on the men who perform it a sternness—in the national interest—that necessarily sets them apart, in some degree, from their fellow men. Some draft board members have been doing the job steadily for a decade. They have won small acclaim. But they deserve the warm gratitude of all Americans for an indispensable public service well and faithfully and selflessly performed.

Peanut Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. GRANT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. GRANT. Mr. Speaker, last fall the House passed and sent to the other body a bill dealing with peanut marketing quotas and acreage allotments. This was a good bill. It sought to do equity and to alleviate a situation that exists in Alabama and Texas, and to a lesser degree in several other States. The Eighty-first Congress adjourned without any action being taken by the Senate. I am not here to censure any group or any individual for failure to take action, although I know some action should have been taken. By reason of this failure the House several weeks ago again passed similar legislation. Monday of this week the Senate amended the House bill by striking out everything in our bill and inserting a new amendment. This amendment reduced the 79,000 acreage increase to 34,900 acres. Senator HOEY, who was handling the bill, had this to say, and I quote:

In the House bill there was a provision for 79,000 acres increase for Texas and Alabama to correct an injustice heretofore existing. The Senate bill reduces to 34,900.

The Senator also said, and I quote:

Furthermore, I may say that the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry decided that this was as far as they wish to go, and therefore it is not desired or intended to ask for the appointment of conferees but to let the matter rest on the bill as reported to the Senate by the committee.

I do not censure the Senator for his action. He did this in good faith in an effort to bring out some legislation. He approved of the legislation as enacted by the House. However, on handling it on the Senate floor, he was necessarily bound by the action of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

This is an unprecedented action to think of one body of this Congress saying to the other: "We refuse to sit down with any conferees that the House might name and work out a bill. Yes; we know that an inequity and injustice does exist, and we will make a half correction."

It is a tragedy that we who know the justice of our case are barred from even being allowed to talk the matter over with representatives of the other body. This is not conducive to good legislation. It is a departure from the good relations that have heretofore existed between the Senate and the House, and especially between the House Committee on Agriculture and the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It is setting a bad precedent.

As much as I regret to admit it, it is a fact that we are caught between the "devil and the deep blue sea." The Senate by its action has refused to do anything further and has passed the ball back to the House.

I am convinced that if objection is made to agree to the Senate amendment that the farmers of my State will be further penalized. Certainly a half loaf is better than none at all, and I am, therefore, withholding my objection to the passage of this bill with the hope that a more equitable bill can be worked out at a later date.

The farmers of my section are about ready to plant. Action on this bill has already been too long delayed. We cannot afford to wait any longer. I know that Senator HOEY and the Senators of my State have done everything that they could to have their body adopt the House bill. I am sure that they will continue their efforts toward securing the enactment of just and equitable legislation.

Tribute to Coach of Indian Basketball Team

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, recently the papers have been filled with stories of bribery and poor sportsmanship in basketball. It is most heartening to look at the other side of the ledger and to praise those who follow the game in a spirit of honesty and clean play.

One of the finest examples of how fine the game may be is offered by a high-school team in my district. The Red Lake team, coached by Russ Smith, is composed of Indian boys from the Red Lake Indian Reservation. I think the following article, written by Charles Johnson of the Minneapolis Star in its issue of March 6, is well worth the attention of all the Members of the House:

CHARLES JOHNSON'S LOW-DOWN ON SPORTS

By the end of this week when the eight participants in the Minnesota State high-school basketball tournament are known, we'll hear this statement not once but many times:

"I can pick eight teams that aren't coming to Minneapolis that could beat the eight that will participate."

This cry goes up every year when strong combinations that have played brilliantly all season are edged out of the tournament because of off nights or bad breaks.

There undoubtedly is some justification for such claims, but there isn't any way to change the situation.

We agree that the teams that are playing the best basketball at tournament time—district or regional—usually earn the right to battle for State honors.

Up in the north country unprejudiced basketball fans are singing the praises of the Red Lake team, coached by Russ Smith. This fine aggregation was nosed out in the district meet 59–54, by Bemidji which has won that event for the last 14 years for some sort of a record.

Red Lake is a tiny spot with a limited high-school enrollment and many Indian students.

Everyone in that district, even those in Bemidji, are talking about the Red Lake team and its coach.

"If Red Lake had been able to nose out Bemidji, which also has a well-coached team under Bun Fortie, it would have been the sweetheart outfit of this or any other tournament," one admirer writes.

"I think coach Smith has done the greatest coaching job at Red Lake this season I have seen in this area in a long time.

"First, Smith has a well-coached, smart, and clean-cut group of Indian boys. They are outstanding young men who show it by their dress, conduct, and appearance on and off the floor. They are good students, too.

"On a recent visit to the reservation I saw basketball backboards everywhere. They are all talking the sport. The townsfolks are backing the team to the limit.

"Coach Smith has gone into the homes of the boys, talked to the parents and dined with them to create a new spirit and interest which has been lacking in the past.

"They used to blame the Red Lake Indians for fights, brawls, and arguments at games that drove spectators away. No longer do you hear them accused of damaging cars or responsibility for other pranks that don't set too well with the residents and certainly don't help sports.

"Russ Smith has made the community so proud of its high-school athletes that women arrange dinners for them after the games. They have increased interest of the public in their activities, and Smith has made them better boys and that means better citizens when they grow up.

"Smith has taught the Indians good sportsmanship. That goes for the players as well as the spectators. He had a clever little Indian princess, dressed in beaded buckskin outfit with tribal headdress as the cheer leader," our Bemidji informant went on.

That's the kind of a story we love to hear about our amateur athletics. Coach Smith apparently is a man who is using our fine competitive sports to make better citizens, a stronger community and sound leaders for the future.

That should be the No. 1 aim of every coach. Accomplishments of this type are much more important than championships or victories of any kind.

VA Backdown on Regional Office for Brooklyn Recognizes Injustice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. ROONEY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Brooklyn Eagle of March 18, 1951:

VA BACKDOWN ON REGIONAL OFFICE FOR BROOKLYN RECOGNIZES INJUSTICE

Only 3 days after the Veterans' Administration announced that parts of the Brooklyn regional office would be transferred to Manhattan mounting criticism here has brought a change of opinion on the part of Administrator Carl R. Gray. This followed his receipt of information that sufficient space is available in Brooklyn to house the complete regional activity. Orders have been issued to secure that space at once.

This comes as welcome news throughout the borough, but particularly to the major veterans' organizations, which with the members of the Brooklyn congressional delegation and the Brooklyn Eagle, have been fighting to block this move which would have caused such great inconvenience to large numbers of veterans seeking information and guidance.

Despite the fact that three of the nine floors in the building would have remained available for the veterans office, the removal of the records to Manhattan would have seriously impaired service here.

In a wire sent to Administrator Gray just before he changed his mind the local congressional delegation stated that "we refuse to let Brooklyn become the stepchild of the VA."

We are glad to see that our Representatives did not hesitate to use the very descriptive word "stepchild." If Washington, Albany, and City Hall were to have their way on some occasions, that is just what Brooklyn would become. We have used the word recently in describing the effect of the treatment accorded some of our local projects by the city administration—and City Hall didn't like it. But it is a word that tells a story and we intend to use it, as our Congressmen did, whenever it fits a situation.

We are informed that there are 427,000 veterans in this borough. A large proportion of them find it necessary to go to the regional office on Ryerson Street occasionally. Some of them have been wounded or otherwise disabled. It seems to us thoughtless and inexcusable on the part of the Veterans' Administration that it was willing to force these men to take a long trip to Manhattan when there was no compelling reason for them to suffer such inconvenience.

But favorable action has now been taken and Brooklyn's regional VA office will be retained here. We trust that there will be no further change of mind at Washington.

Inflation and Government Rubber Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. AYRES
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter to Mr. Eric Johnston, Economic Stabilization Administrator, from Mr. John L. Collyer, president, the B. F. Goodrich Co., Akron, Ohio:

THE B. F. GOODRICH CO.,
Akron, Ohio, March 3, 1951.

Subject: Inflation and Government rubber policies.

Mr. ERIC JOHNSTON,
Administrator, Economic Stabilization Agency, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JOHNSTON: Following is an extract from the Economic Stabilization Agency's General Ceiling Price Regulation dated January 26, 1951, which was signed by you and with which I am in complete accord:

"Since June 1950 the country has been in the throes of a mounting inflation. What is most alarming is the violence and rapidity with which prices are rising throughout the economy. Since the outbreak in Korea, basic commodity prices have risen almost 50 percent, farm prices about 16 percent, wholesale food prices 12 percent, and industrial prices about 14 percent. Wholesale textile prices have advanced over 30 percent, chemicals over 25 percent, building materials and metals and metal products about 10 percent.

"The cost of living is now at an all-time high and is rising sharply.

"These increases in prices have added billions to the cost of the defense program and many more billions to the cost of living of the general public."

The inflation in prices of raw materials used by the rubber industry has been far greater than the percentages quoted above. And the inflation will continue indefinitely if our Government should enter into a rubber price cartel with the crude rubber growing areas or into fixed-price contracts with private crude rubber producers.

Rubbers are by far the major item of cost in the rubber manufacturing industry. Today, the Government bears almost total responsibility for the price of rubbers—both for the American rubbers produced in Government-owned facilities and for the crude rubber imported into this country. The future price of all of these rubbers is dependent almost entirely upon governmental policies.

By May 1, when all plants are operating at capacity, over 90 percent of the American rubbers will be produced in Government-owned plants retained by Government under the Rubber Act of 1950. On December 7, 1950, the Government increased the selling price to industry of its general purpose American rubber 32½ percent, or from 18½ cents a pound to 24½ cents a pound.

The greatest price increase has been in crude rubber. The delivered price in New York for No. 1 ribbed smoke sheets advanced from 18¼ cents a pound at the beginning of 1950 to a high of 90 cents a pound during the year. The present world market price is about 80 cents, an increase since January 1, 1950, of almost 340 percent.

Our Government became the sole importer of crude rubber for this country on December 29, 1950, at which time the price was 70 cents a pound. The stated purpose was to obtain a materially lower price by eliminating competitive buying between private companies for consumption and our Government for stockpiling. There has been no decrease in the world price of crude rubber since then; instead, the price has increased about 15 percent.

The total cost of crude rubber produced by reasonably efficient growers is about 10 cents a pound delivered in the United States. The average total cost of all producers of crude rubber is probably not in excess of 16 cents a pound.

The rubber position of the United States at present reflects the serious supply problems which we have faced in both the crude rubber and American rubbers, resulting from the unprecedented levels of demand for rubber for current consumption, the scare buying following Korea, the acceleration of buying for strategic stockpiling purposes, both by our Government and by other nations, failure of the Government to maintain the output of American rubbers at the levels recommended in 1948, and the Government's delay in reopening the American rubber facilities which had been placed in mothballs.

During the last year the American people as consumers and as taxpayers for the defense program have paids tens of millions of dollars more for rubber products than would have been the case if our Government had followed the recommendations of the B. F. Goodrich Co. and the rubber industry for sound policies in rubber.

In a letter addressed to Mr. C. E. Wilson, Director, Office of Defense Mobilization, dated December 30, 1950, we said:

"Proper perspective on the problem of supply requires that we go back to October 1948 when the rubber industry made a report to Government recommending steps that should be taken to safeguard the rubber security interests of the Nation. The industry report, completely documented statistically, recommended a crude rubber stockpiling program by Government which could have resulted in a combined Government and industry stockpile of almost 900,000 long tons by June 1950, when the Korean War broke out. It further recommended that production of general purpose synthetic rubber by Government should not be permitted to fall below 34,000 long tons a month, and that any excess of production over current synthetic rubber consumption be stockpiled by Government in order to conserve crude rubber in the early stages of any national emergency that might arise.

"None of these recommendations was followed. Crude rubber stockpiling took place at a considerably lower rate than that recommended. No stockpiling of general purpose synthetic rubber was attempted. The production rate of general purpose synthetic rubber was allowed to decline to a postwar low of only 18,100 long tons in January 1950, and working inventories were kept low.

"Alarmed over this precarious supply position, the B. F. Goodrich Co. and the rubber industry early in 1950 urged a rapid step-up in the rate of synthetic rubber production and in the rate of crude rubber stockpile accumulation. Later, on May 8, 1950, the B. F. Goodrich Co. recommenced the immediate reopening of one additional GR–S plant, and shortly thereafter, the reopening of all stand-by GR–S plants. It was not until after the outbreak of the Korean War—in July, actually—that reactivation of one synthetic plant was authorized, and not until September that the remaining stand-by plants were directed to be reopened. To the present time, little substantial relief has resulted from the reactivation of these facilities and it is now estimated that full scale production cannot be attained before April 1951."

It is our conviction that if our Government had carried out the recommendations made in 1948 and those made early in 1950 by the B. F. Goodrich Co., the rubber-supply position of the United States and of the world would now be such that the price of crude rubber would be far more realistic in relation to production costs than the prices prevailing during the last 9 months.

Our company has frequently commented on the exorbitant cost to the American taxpayer of previous cartels in crude rubber organized by foreign governments, which have always resulted in extortionate prices to the consuming countries, of which the United States is by far the largest. Long-time experience dictates that our Government should not participate in any rubber price cartel or fixed-price arrangement.

It is our conviction that the world rubber-supply situation is not nearly so serious as has been publicized and is improving so rapidly that a much lower price for crude rubber will result within the next few months, provided that—

(a) Our country is not involved in a war with Russia;

(b) Our Government does not enter into price cartels with crude-producing nations or into fixed-price arrangements with private producers; and that—

(c) The adequacy of the crude-rubber stockpile already accumulated is realized.

Great progress toward the solution of the rubber-supply situation has already been made. American rubber policy must give full weight to this progress and to its future effects.

Proper evaluation of the facts and estimates stated below will bring policy changes that are needed.

1. THE SUPPLY-DEMAND OUTLOOK FOR 1951

Here are our estimates of world supply and demand for rubbers in 1951. (See table.) These estimates show a world surplus of over 600,000 long tons of rubber this year, after all consumptive needs for both military and civilian products have been filled. Because the United States stocks are already adequate, the indicated surplus should be more than sufficient to supply the possible stockpile requirements of foreign countries.

Estimated world new-rubber supply and consumption, January to December 1951

[Long tons]

	Supply			Consumption [1]			Available for stocks and stockpiling

[1] Includes rubber estimated to be consumed in 1951 in the manufacture of military as well as civilian products.

NOTE.—The final disposition of the 625,000 tons apparent excess of world supply over world consumption requirements will depend upon the stockpiling policies pursued by individuals and governments.

These estimates are made on the assumption that war or other events will not interfere with crude rubber production in 1951.

2. THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA CRUDE RUBBER STOCKPILE OBJECTIVE

The stockpile objective is the keystone of United States of America rubber policy. This objective should now be materially reduced in the light of changed conditions, which differ greatly from the conditions existing when the present objective was established.

These factors are constantly working to make us less dependent on crude rubber.

(a) The present objective includes a provision for sufficient crude rubber to meet consumption requirements during the period when the American rubber plants were being taken out of mothballs. Now that the American rubber facilities are achieving capacity production, this provision is no longer necessary.

(b) Rubber now being converted into finished military products is not being withdrawn from the stockpile but is being supplied from current imports. We estimate that in 1951 there will be 150,000 tons of all types of rubbers used in military products for the defense effort, most of which will not be put into service. That matériel represents a stockpile in being and its rubber content should be included in stockpile totals.

(c) The performance of products made from American-made rubbers is constantly being improved. New types have been developed. "Cold rubber" is now in mass production and usage. New compounding materials have been discovered. New components are available. New techniques have been tested. The result is that American-made rubbers can now replace crude rubber much more effectively than during World War II. This statement can readily be confirmed by a review of industry and Government test results.

2. INCREASE IN UNITED STATES OF AMERICAN-MADE RUBBER CAPACITY

Our company has already recommended that our American-made rubber capacity be increased by 200,000 tons a year. This increase might be obtainable from existing facilities more quickly and with less expense than if new plants were built. This desirable safety factor would give us protection against bombing and could, during a war, give us capacity to supply the needs of our allies, many of whom have been stockpiling crude rubber.

In summary, the 1951 world supply of new rubber will be by far the largest in history—2,800,000 tons. World consumption needs for both military and essential civilian rubber products in 1951 of 2,175,000 long tons are well within the limits of supply. The great current inflationary force in the crude-rubber market is that of fear-buying of stocks, mainly for strategic purposes, as nations bid against each other for the 625,000 tons surplus. So far as the United States is concerned, such strategic stock accumulation above present stockpile levels is largely based on outdated premises. A realistic current appraisal of strategic stockpile needs, and the provision of a 200-000-ton safety factor in American rubber capacity, would permit natural market forces to eliminate much of the costly inflation now present in the crude-rubber market.

It is for these reasons that the United States should by all means avoid entanglement in a rubber price cartel with the crude-rubber-growing areas or in fixed-price arrangements with private crude-rubber producers. Such arrangements would simply legalize and perpetuate much of the gross inflation now present in the crude-rubber market structure to the continuing detriment of consumers, manufacturers, and defense production, not only in the United States, but throughout the free world.

This problem is of such immediate importance to our entire defense mobilization and economic stabilization programs that prompt understanding and action are essential. We suggest that a meeting be called by you before March 14 in which informed Government and business people may join to consider the facts, to appraise them realistically, and to stimulate action along the lines indicated herein. Copies of this letter are being sent to other interested persons.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN L. COLLYER.

Legislative Program of Regular Veterans Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 22, 1951

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the Members to the legislative program of the Regular Veterans Association of the United States. This program was adopted by the annual convention of the association last September. There are many points in this program which deserve careful consideration as their enactment would react to the greater benefit of the people of this Nation.

The program follows:

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM OF THE REGULAR VETERANS ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES ADOPTED BY ITS 1950 NATIONAL CONVENTION, SEPTEMBER 23, 1950

NATIONAL DEFENSE

1. The immediate enactment of a universal military training law.

2. Mobilization of all material resources for war.

3. Legislation to effectively curb war inflation during the present emergency.

4. An effective national organization for civil defense.

5. Creation of a national committee for the conservation of natural resources.

6. Issuance, by the United States, of an appropriate medal for service in the present Korean campaign.

7. Issuance, by the United Nations of an appropriate medal for service in the present Korean campaign.

8. Appropriate United Nations rank for the present commandant of the United Nations forces in Korea.

9. Relentless war on Communist aggression.

10. Extension of all provisions of the GI bill of rights to all veterans of the Korean campaign.

11. Federal income-tax exemptions, the same as was extended to Armed Forces personnel during World War II, for all personnel engaged in the present Korean campaign—said exemptions to be retroactive to the beginning of hostilities and to continue for 1 year after they shall have ended.

12. Free postage for all service personnel during the present Korean campaign

13. Immediate restoration of the World War II allotment system for the dependents of all service personnel.

14. Legislation prohibiting strikes, or mass work stoppages, in time of war or during military campaigns such as the Korean campaign.

15. Extension of Federal old-age and survivors insurance coverage to all members of the Armed Forces, drafted for service, with the Federal Government paying the contributions.

16. All commissaries, exchanges, and ship's service stores to be operated strictly on a nonprofit basis and all merchandise sold in them to be exempt from Federal and State tax.

17. National service life insurance to be supplanted with a flat $10,000 death gratuity.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

1. Continued support of the United Nations.

2. Vigorous fulfillment of our international commitments and agreements.

3. Restricted and screened immigration.

4. Continued cooperation with all nations for the promotion of international peace and the development of backward areas.

AMERICANISM

1. Legislation outlawing the Communist Party, and all other groups who advocate the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence.

2. Unequivocal denial of the right to vote and to hold public office, or to enjoy public employment, to those who are known to oppose our form of government.

3. A stronger Voice of America program and greater efforts to penetrate the iron curtain by educational means.

4. Deportation of all known alien and foreign-born Communists.

5. Praise and continued support of the Federal Bureau of Investigation for its effective war on communism and subversive groups.

VETERANS AND THEIR DEPENDENTS

1. Parity in pensions and disability compensation for all persons who served honorably in the Armed Forces of the United States at any time and parity in all widows pensions—and in all pension payments to the dependents of deceased disabled veterans. (S. 727 and H. R. 303.)

2. Service pensions for all veterans who were engaged in hostilities against the hostile natives in the Moro Province and in the islands of Leyte and Samar from July 4, 1902, to January 1, 1914. (S. 432 and H. R. 368.)

3. Vocational rehabilitation for all honorably discharged disabled veterans of the Armed Forces regardless of when the service was performed.

4. Civil service preference, United States Employment Service preference, and preference on relief projects—when they exist—for all honorably discharged veterans of the Regular Establishment.

5. A uniform law and uniform regulations applicable to all disabled tubercular veterans regardless of the date of service. (H. R. 1038, 77th Cong.)

6. Legislation to reduce to 10 percent the disability requirement for entitlement to additional compensation for dependents of veterans.

7. Service pensions for veterans of World War I, and World War II at age 55, in the amount of $55 a month with an increase of $2 a month for each year thereafter.

8. Legislation to increase pension income limitation to $2,000 for veterans, or widow without dependents, and to $3,000 for veteran or widow with dependents.

9. Legislation to exclude commercial insurance payments from consideration as income in determining eligibility for non-service-connected death pensions.

10. Legislation, or an executive directive by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, requiring the Veterans' Administration to accept as evidence, for rating purposes, examinations made at any hospital approved by the American Hospital Association.

11. A substantial raise in pay to VA hospital attendants, especially to those in mental hospitals and contagious disease wards in VA hospitals.

12. Opposing any plan to take from the Veterans' Administration, or its immediate jurisdiction and control, any function of government having to do with veterans.

13. Continued hospitalization, in VA hospitals, for non-service-connected disabilities when facilities are available.

14. Out-patient treatment and medication for veterans receiving part III benefits at VA hospitals.

15. An identification card and lapel button to be furnished all service-connected disabled veterans by the Veterans' Administration.

16. Rescission of VA Circular 25, March 7, 1947, prohibiting VA employees from taking part in veterans' organizations.

17. Legislation requiring the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to issue explicit instructions that each and every decision of the VA in its agencies of original and appellate jurisdiction be supported by an adequately detailed recitation of the basis of finding of fact and to contain a statement that the policy of resolution of reasonable doubt has been considered.

18. A rating of permanent and total disability for all veterans who have a lung removed.

19. Amendment of R. & P. R. 2676 (b) 4 to permit acceptance of lay testimony in determining service connection for malaria.

20. The establishment of a VA hospital, for Negro veterans in Franklin County, Va., the birthplace of Booker T. Washington.

21. A minimum of 2 prosthetic appliances a year to eligible veterans.

22. A national cemetery in each of the 48 States.

23. Adapted housing for helpless disabled veterans of the Regular Establishment.

24. Adjusted service compensation for veterans of World War II, and the present Korean campaign, in the amount of $5 a day for foreign service and $3 a day for home service.

25. Legislation authorizing official representatives of veterans' organizations, accredited by the Veterans Administration, to appear before any unit of the Federal Government on behalf of any veteran when properly empowered by the veteran to do so.

26. Maintenance of the United States soldier's and naval homes in their present locations.

27. First priority for Philippine veterans and their dependents in the settlement of all World War II claims.

28. Compensation and pension for service-connected disabilities are rights and not gratuities. The Regular Veterans' Association of the United States, therefore, urges the immediate enactment of legislation to subject all decisions of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to Federal court review.

National Commander.

Postal Workers Find Themselves in Economic Strait-Jacket: Pay Adjustments and Service Restoration Should Have Immediate Consideration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 21, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a letter I received from Mr. William C. Doherty, president of the National Association of Letter Carriers, and an article appearing in the March edition of the Postal Record, the official publication of the National Association of Letter Carriers, written by Mr. James J. Doran, former chief post office inspector, who calls for restoration of postal service curtailed last year.

The letter and article follow:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1951.

Hon. MELVIN PRICE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRICE: There is herewith attached a reprint of an article appearing in the March edition of the Postal Record, the official publication of the National Association of Letter Carriers. You will note that it is written by Mr. James J. Doran, the recently retired postal executive who succeeded the present Postmaster General in the office of the chief post office inspector. In the light of existing conditions, Mr. Doran's article is both thought-provoking and timely. He clearly indicates in the article that the postal-curtailment orders issued under date of April 17, 1950, were unnecessary and that a report in the hands of the Postmaster General 1 month prior to that date (March 15, 1950) "contradicts the assertions that savings could only be made through curtailments."

On March 6 and 7, 1951, Postmaster General Donaldson appeared before the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee in support of the pending rate bill, H. R. 2982, which is designed to increase postal revenues by $163,000,000 annually. When interrogated by committee members as to whether the increase in rates would permit the restoration of postal services to the high standard which prevailed on April 17, 1950, the Postmaster General answered in the negative. He was also queried at considerable length as to whether the rate increases contemplated granting much-needed upward wage revision to the 500,000 postal workers in the field service. Once again his answer was in the negative. In fact, he made the positive statement that neither the requested increase in postage rates nor his budgetary estimates included any provisions for service restoration or pay increases to postal workers.

In view of the foregoing, it is quite apparent that the only hope for restoring the postal service rests with Congress. Accordingly, this association firmly believes that H. R. 2982 and S. 1046 should be amended so as to provide specific instruction to the Postmaster General which would give to the American people the type of postal service to which they have been accustomed over the years.
